At one point in my career at boarding school I used to share a room with David. He had been circumcised neatly, with a particularly prominent glans rim. We used to indulge in mutual masturbation and as I had an exceedingly long foreskin at that time we used to do what, I’ve since found out from Acorn, is known as docking. I would retract my foreskin, we would put our glans tip to tip and I would then pull my foreskin right forward. It would not only cover my glans but it was so long that it reached almost all the way over his glans. As he had been circumcised as a baby this was a new sensation for him which we both enjoyed.

We were also friendly with George. He was the youngest of three brothers, and I had noticed in the showers that he was the only one of the three to be uncircumcised. One afternoon when we were on our own the subject turned to willies and we decided to get ours out. He got mine out first and promptly pulled my foreskin back remarking, “Oh, you can pull yours back OK!” I said, “Why, can’t you?” “If you hurried up you would find out!” I eventually got his disentangled from his underpants and out it popped. On inspection I found out that he had a long, thin, pale willy with a foreskin tapering to a narrow point. Naturally, I tried to pull his foreskin back – but no such luck. It would not even expose the tip of the glans, but the hole in the foreskin end was wide enough for him to pee. Our mutual inspections revealed that he suffered no discomfort, his foreskin was long enough for him to obtain a full erection without stretching, and, as I soon found out, he could masturbate easily and frequently by massaging the outer skin. At this point David appeared and joined in. So we had a ‘set’ – one circed, one retractable skin and one tight skin!

George and I used to meet frequently, and although I tried on many occasions to pull his skin back, it would never so much as show a millimetre of glans. He wasn’t keen on being circumcised as his condition caused him no difficulties. He had no idea why he hadn't been done as a baby when both his brothers had been. It makes one wonder how many people are in a similar state with the reluctance to circumcise over the last 50 years or so.

Female Circumcision

I was particularly interested to read in 7/93 the letter from K.J.

Some thirty years ago I was involved with a young Jewess, Sadie, who had been circumcised. She was always ready to discuss the subject and give her views, which consisted essentially that many more women would benefit from being circumcised, that all male babies should be routinely circumcised at birth, and that no cavalier would ever be allowed to have full sex with her.

She discovered that at the time of her puberty she started to enjoy masturbation but found that her clitoris became sore and irritable when caressed, leaving her feeling frustrated as she approached climax, and the problem was becoming worse. She was unable to diagnose the problem herself and so after much thought she decided to raise the matter with her mother who recommended that she contacted the local mohel (Jewish circumciser), with whom they were friendly. Upon inspection he found that the hood of her clitoris was long and thick, and that secretions were collecting under the hood causing irritation to her small clitoris. He recommended that the hood should be divided to allow her to wash the area more easily. She agreed to have this done under local anaesthetic. The result was an immediate improvement together with an increase in the size of her clitoris. With the aid of a mirror she was now able to examine this area and found that the two flaps of the divided hood looked untidy and unattractive. She became concerned that this would probably repel any future partner. She returned again to the mohel to explain her problem who agreed that a full circumcision was the only answer. This was duly carried out, the area being sore for some days.

Again she found the improvement considerable; in particular when horse riding, which she enjoyed for a number of years. She found that when galloping she could bring herself to orgasm quite readily, and that there was one horse called Sam who seemed to sense that as her orgasm was approaching he was able to give an extra short burst of speed to make her orgasm that much more intense. Three or four climaxes during a riding session were not uncommon, and she found herself returning to the stables exhausted but well satisfied.

There is no doubt that her circumcision had considerably increased her libido, and that horse riding was her prime passion. Anything else was subsidiary. I often wonder if she still enjoys horse riding and if she was ever able to settle with one partner. It is not always correct when one reads articles to the effect that men are more interested than women in sex!

Get Stretching

In my late teens my foreskin slipped back to cover half my glans (half-mast), where it remained when flaccid for a good many years. One day when taking a shower I noticed four boys who were pals opposite me. They must have been in their early twenties. What struck me were their long foreskins. They each had at least an inch overhang. I thought how nice they looked. I decided there and then to do something about mine. So I started stretching exercises. Ten years later I have a foreskin that not only covers my glans but have nearly an inch overhang. So all you who have short foreskins, get stretching. After all, foreskins were made to be stretched, and you're only putting them back to where nature intended them to be. The result is a silky sensitive glans and a foreskin full of nerve endings.

American Trial

I've been sent this clipping from the Daily Telegraph of October 18th. 1993:-

A religious leader convicted of having sex with a young follower has won a new trial because a juror read out a Bible passage about circumcision during deliberations.

Circuit Judge Virginia Gay Broome, who threw out the conviction of Clarence 'Brother Bill' Williams, ruled that consulting a Bible during jury deliberations breaches the separation of church and state guaranteed by the US Constitution.

Williams headed a religious group, called The Way, for 18 years. A follower, now aged 20, told a Florida court that he began having sex with her when she was 14.

Williams' accuser had testified that he is circumcised. His wife said that he is not.

One woman said she quoted Genesis 17:10 to an undecided juror, "Every male among you shall be circumcised." They then voted to convict Williams.

Wife's Feedback

I'm writing to give my views in response to your request for feedback from the wives of Acorn members. I prefer to remain anonymous so as to avoid embarrassment to my husband, although if he guesses who it's from so be it!

Firstly, I really can't understand it when women write in to say how strange or unnatural the circumcised organ looks. Any half-way attractive girl is far more likely to see a bare acorn right from the start, even if the guy's uncircumcised, since he'll usually be erect and stripped for action anyway. A roundhead looks very similar when erect, and it's only when the action is over and the organ reverts to droop-mode that the cavalier's flip-top goes back into place over his knob, whilst the roundhead's stays bare. So she'll be quite used to seeing a bare knob, and the fact that it's hanging down rather than standing upright makes little odds.

This is not to say that she won't find the thought of a highly sensitive surface being permanently exposed to the outside world makes her eyes water a trifle. Thinking about how I'd feel if my clit tip was denuded all the time – no thanks!

Before I talk about my husband though, a few words about myself. I was about eight when my dad walked out on my mum, leaving her alone to look after me and my younger brother. Mum had to take in dressmaking to make ends meet, while I was left to look after my brother, feeding him, bathing him and putting him to bed. I'd always been a keen onlooker when Mum used to bath him, particularly when she used to pull his skin back to wash his willy, although it made her embarrassed and she latterly left it for him to do himself. When I bathed him I was going to do the same, but the little rascal held his willy out for me and asked me to do it for him. I refused, but watched with curiosity as he pulled it back himself, waving his shiny little acorn at me to play me up. I pretended to scold him, but in fact found it highly entertaining and would look forward to bath night, although we were both so interested in uncapping his willy that more often than not no attempt was made to wash it.

This really set the scene for my experience with the male organ, since all my playmates, boyfriends, and eventually husband, had foreskins.

When I first married him, my husband was sexually relaxed and gave me full satisfaction. I had no complaints at all about his organ, considering his foreskin as a natural and desirable part of it. What I didn't know was that my husband had a bit of AC/DC about him, and I discovered that, at a summer school a couple of years ago, he had a fling with another guy. Besides his natural guilt afterwards, he developed a consuming interest in circumcision, presumably because the guy he'd gone with had been done, and he joined Acorn shortly after.

To me, circumcision was unknown territory. I knew nothing about it, but with the arrival of Acorn on the doormat every few weeks, my eyes were opened, and I realised that it was a matter of total absorption for some men. Eventually, after talking about it and discussing it for a few weeks, I agreed with some misgivings that he should go and have it done. All I knew about the subject was what I'd read in Acorn and, although some men had reservations, most seemed to think it was an improvement. I told him that, as long as he was sure that it wouldn't ruin our love life, he should go ahead, although I had absolutely no complaints about things the way they were.

Now for the verdict. Quite honestly, there was physically very little difference to our love-making once he'd got over a little soreness and oversensitivity. The only points I would mention are minor ones, such as I noticed he wasn't so responsive to oral sex as before, and I did miss playing with his foreskin when getting him aroused. Cleanliness didn't come into it since he enjoys the same high standards I do.

The big difference though is his mental attitude. Before the subject came up he was happy and relaxed, but now he seems thoroughly twitched up. Although he has joined the ranks of the roundheads and got what he wanted, he is still totally obsessed by the subject of circumcision, and I do worry that he now finds the thought of other penises more attractive than what I've got. He's promised that his gay episode will be his last, but when the guy's mind is exclusively on cock I can't help wondering how long I've got before he takes off.

'David' — The Uncut Jew

The article in Issue 8/93 by an uncircumcised Muslim took me back to my grammar school days in the late 1940s. I was about 16 at the time and the ringleader of a clandestine homosexual coven of pupils. We used to gather daily in the secret hideaways and dens provided by every school premises and grounds to masturbate, fellate, copulate, fornicate, and any other sexual 'ate' which entered our randy minds.

'David', in a form two years behind me, and therefore that much younger, was known to be Jewish, a refugee from Nazi Germany. He was remarkably mature for his age and was the talk of the group for the enormity of his uncircumcised penis. Indeed, it was the incredible length of his foreskin which sticks so firmly in my mind. At that time most of us were all too young to be fully conversant with the niceties of circumcision as a religious rite and we didn't pay any particular attention to his uncut state. However, we soon learnt, without understanding the reason why, that he became easily upset when we mentioned his prepuce. What's more, it was very evident that he was much more attracted to those of us who were circumcised than those who were not. That suited me, and he and I enjoyed many good times together, which continued beyond the time when I left school and well into my days as a rent boy while at University. I was discreet enough never to comment on the length of his foreskin, though he often used it to our mutual pleasure in the erotic process known as 'docking', during which he would envelop my circumcised glans.

Eventually we lost contact, only to meet up again years later in, of all things, the loo in a four-star hotel where we were both attending different functions. I hasten to add that I wasn't cottaging and it wasn't a sexual encounter. I couldn't help noticing, though, that he was now very emphatically circumcised. He told me that his parents had left him uncut for fear of Nazi anti-Semitism and that it had been many years before he had summoned up enough courage to be circumcised in Britain. He added that until he was circumcised he couldn't bring himself to have a sexual relationship with any Jewish girl, and that that was why all his early sexual experience had been homosexual – and very actively so until his mid-twenties. When he met someone who was later to become his wife it provided the incentive to get himself cut and, thereafter, his attitude to sexuality changed completely. He became an equally active heterosexual and, in marriage, had three sons and two daughters.

After this casual meeting, we kept in touch just once a year through what was, for him, the totally un-Jewish method of exchanging Christmas Cards, with a little note about our lives during the previous twelve months. Do you know, I never mentioned again my continuous enjoyment of the gay lifestyle! It was one of the few occasions when I felt too embarrassed to do so because he seemed so happy in his hetero world.

I sent my card as usual for Xmas 1993, but the envelope was returned via the GPO. Someone had written across it, "Deceased – Family moved away". I suspect we have reached the final 'Cut off' point.

Editorial

First of all, many thanks to those who have written in praise of the new format. I'm sure our new computer technician will be happy with the appreciation.

It will only be of use however, if we have the material to put into the newsletter, and the most popular of course are your own individual views, opinions and experiences. So I would like to exhort all those who have never contributed, to take a few minutes to put pen to paper. Everyone has something to say of interest to someone else, and you wouldn't belong to Acorn if you didn't feel deeply about one or other of the aspects. And of course we would be more than glad to hear from our new members as well.

Mum's Dilemma

When I related what follows to a close friend, she showed me her husband's issues of Acorn and suggested I write for your readers' views on my problem. Unfortunately my husband is a little older and quite unlikely to appreciate your publication if I took out a subscription, but I will be able to read any response in my friend's copy.

Following the advice in childcare books, I made no attempt to retract my baby son's foreskin. All appeared to be well until this summer when, as an active four-year-old I spotted him playing pissing games with his friends at the bottom of our garden. I smiled quietly to myself, but shortly afterwards I found him in great distress with his foreskin pulled back and trapped behind the rim of his penis helmet. I soon realised that I couldn't do anything to push it forward again, so bundled him into the car and rushed him to the nearby group surgery.

Fortunately the young lady practitioner was able to restore things to normal after a short struggle, but then warned me that the problem could recur and suggested circumcision as a permanent remedy. As she had a nurse on duty at the time and they do small ops, she offered to cut him there and then.

I declined because I thought he had been through enough trauma for one day, and I felt that I should discuss it with his father who is uncircumcised. Also I have mixed emotions about the subject myself. My first and subsequent two year's regular sexual experience had been with a roundhead boyfriend, but when this broke up I met my husband and settled for something entirely different. Both have merits, but I'd come to appreciate my husband's greater sensitivity, and thought my earlier boyfriend's penis seemed a 'cruder weapon' by comparison.

We decided to seek a second opinion from a specialist, which sadly confirmed the earlier diagnosis; our son has a tight foreskin about which nothing can be done, and he should be circumcised at puberty. Meanwhile, no attempt at retraction (not even to wash?) In the event, as a result of his experience, my son won't let me anywhere near his penis, and won't attempt retraction himself. He hasn't been told yet what is ultimately going to happen to him because I don't want him to fret about it for a long time beforehand.

I feel sorry my son is going to lose his foreskin – as if I've failed him in some way, and would welcome some advice.

1) What is the best age to cut him? It's harder to explain when he's young, but it will obviously be more painful and embarrassing when he is older. I also now have the discomforting knowledge that as time goes on he is going to be quite unhealthy under his foreskin without any retraction for cleaning.

2) He was quite upset by the original incident and the specialist's later inspection. Considering this, how do I best explain to him what is involved in the operation and that afterwards his skin will always be back, permanently exposing the tender end.

3) Is there a good way of reconciling him to the fact that after the operation he is going to feel discomfort and look so different from his Daddy and his friends who will probably tease him about it. I don't know if any of them have had it done but, from what I've read, I think it will be very unlikely.

It seems likely that some of your readers will have been confronted with this situation with their own sons, and I would particularly like to hear from the mothers involved, as we are the ones usually left to cope with all the problems that arise from this procedure.

Mrs M.B. – Oxfordshire

My Reply

Thank you for your letter Mrs B., and for the trust you are putting in our views. I'm sure we will find a large response to your letter albeit a lot of conflicting views because, as you will have discovered from reading the magazine, we are not a consensus group but a forum, where everyone can express their own contrasting individual views and opinions. May I be the first to make comment, but please remember it's from a layman, not an expert in any field.

Firstly, your son would now appear to equate the sight and thought of his glans with pain, and this would undoubtedly be the first thing to overcome, for if this were allowed to carry on until puberty his sex life might be ruined forever. If he was my son, I would take him into the bath with me over a lengthy period and show him how I pull my foreskin back, wash my glans, and replace my foreskin, all in a matter of fact way without any semblance of pain. After a few times I would talk to him about his foreskin and tell him that the pain is there because it doesn't retract easily like mine, but that this can be put right quite easily and painlessly by a doctor. You're lucky here inasmuch as your husband has a foreskin.

Secondly, both the G.P. and the specialist are not up with current thought on the subject. There have been newspaper articles published on the technique some doctors are using now of making a small slit going backwards from the front of the foreskin and sewing it together again transversely with a couple of stitches. In this way all that happens is that the hole in the front of the foreskin is made wider and a normal foreskin is attained without any loss whatsoever. As you appear not to be in favour of circumcision, a few inquiries might acquaint you of how you can obtain this almost painless method, which can be done at any time, and is over completely in three or four days.

Now to your specific questions. The best age to circumcise him is certainly not at the moment with the feelings he has. Many people advocate at the change from primary to secondary school at the beginning of the summer holiday when he will have got completely used to it by the time school starts, the prospect of the new school taking precedence in his mind. It isn't necessary to worry too much about being healthy under his foreskin. If you have trouble getting under there, so do any outside germs and bacteria, and urine is a cleanser anyway. We've had it on good authority in the past that the normal Spanish boy doesn't start retracting his foreskin until somewhere around the age of seventeen. I also know a man of nearly seventy who has a tight foreskin and has never had it retracted in his life. He says that he has never had any trouble with sex or any other part of life, is quite happy about it, but knows that he would have lost it if he had had to go into the forces. See also Group E of 'German Soldiers'. To allay your fears until something is done, I would keep an eye on his penis for any sign of inflammation and ask him to tell you if it hurts or itches badly at any time.

With his present frame of mind, I doubt whether it would be a good thing to mention the full facts of the circumcision operation at all. It might be best to wait until he has started school and hope that he would then have a chance to see boys who have been circumcised and know that it hasn't harmed them physically.

There, that's one man's opinion, culled from life and literature. Doubtless there will be more. Give your son a pat on the head from me, and all the best!

David Acorn

German Soldiers

At the bottom of page 3 of the last issue, K.J. conjectured on the incidence of short foreskins. Whilst reading Bud Berkeley's Foreskin, I came across a survey of German army recruits on this subject, and I'm sure that Bud won't mind me reproducing it here.

"A 1960's survey of the penises of West German army recruits gives a clue to the natural distribution of foreskin types. The survey was conducted to determine which men were more likely to be found with smegma – those with tight foreskins or those with long loose ones. The survey categorised 3,000 men between the ages of 18 and 20 into 5 foreskin types:-

- A) No visible foreskin
- B) Short foreskin
- C) Long foreskin
- D) Tight foreskin
- E) Phimosed

Out of the 3,000; 258 (8%) young Germans were group A and of those 64 (2%) had been circumcised (probably because of childhood phimosis). Half of the 258 had such short foreskins that they had long since fallen behind the corona, and in the rest it was impossible to determine whether they had been circumcised or not. Group B included 1,258 men (42%). Group C had 1,236 men (41%). Group D had only 181 men (6%). Group E included only 82 (3%)."

Result of the survey? Smegma was found on 0% of group A, 12% of group B, 23% of group C, and 35% of group D. They couldn't get inside the foreskins of group E to ascertain any presence.

A little more information is that smegma never generally appears before puberty, and that all the popular perfumes are made from smegma – musk from the smegma of the musk-ox, civet from the civet cat and castor from the beaver. There are also many men and women who get sexually excited by the human smell. I've still never smelt it – what am I missing?

The Reply

As a fellow Muslim of Al-Sayyad Abdul-Razzaz Muhammad, which is a false name, I say to him, "How can you say that you are a Syed after being in the filthy state of possessing a foreskin? How dare you say such a thing! Have you not studied Fiqh? If you have, then you know what it says regarding circumcision, which is part of the Sunnah, and the Prophet (P.B.U.H.) left us the Holy Quran along with the Sunnah and Hadith as guidelines for all Muslims. No wonder you signed yourself by a false name, because you know that if your physical state was discovered it would be swiftly rectified, and also your son's as well. Also it doesn't say much for your parents in not informing your wife's parents. I have two daughters, and any Muslim who is not circumcised will not be allowed to marry any of my daughters. I have the courage of my convictions in signing my name and where I live. Islam is spreading fast here in Manchester, and the majority of our new Muslim brothers have already been circumcised, with the rest following in the future to be circumcised. I embraced Islam in 1965 at the age of eighteen, and my four children, two sons and two daughters were born Muslims. My sons will be 9 and 4 this year and will be circumcised this year Inshallah. So I say to you, my brother in Islam, go and take your son and get you both circumcised as quickly as possible, and do not listen or pay attention to what your non-Muslim friends say or do. I am Scottish."

*Yours Sincerely and Brother in Islam,
Br. Yaha Ahmed. I.M. Lamont – Manchester previously of Glasgow and Dundee.*

[I thought for quite a long time before publishing this letter. Acorn is not here to be a platform for religious fundamentalism. In fact the consensus would appear to be that everyone does what they feel in their heart to be right for themselves. The reason that I did publish it is that I included the first letter purely as a circumcision subject about choice, not realising what it could stir up. Now I have realised and included this letter to satisfy the outraged, but I would rather not have any more letters regarding the religious aspect of the subject. D.A.]

Discoveries

The first time that I learnt anything about circumcision was when I was about 7 years old, at a County Primary School, deep in the Cambridgeshire Fens. Virtually every pupil was either the child of a farmer or farm-worker. As regards religion, 61 of the pupils were C. of E. and 2 were Catholic.

I distinctly remember one afternoon a little girl approaching a group of 3 or 4 of us youngsters, desperate to share with us her latest 'secret'. Apparently, some little boy had just told her that he 'had to have part of his willy cut off'. I remember that we all listened dumbfounded; it must be nonsense; boys just can't go around with 'bits of their willies cut off'. I personally dismissed it as a fairy tale, but always remained intrigued by the story.

Several years were then to pass before the subject was to come to mind again.

When I was about 12 years of age and attending the local grammar school in a nearby town, the school gymnasium was, at last, blessed with a purpose-built changing room and showers. When we took our first shower, I noticed that my best schoolmate had no tassel of skin at the end of his cock, but just an exposed purple 'helmet'. Being fascinated by this discovery, I was immediately obliged to investigate the state of the cocks of all the other classmates in the shower at the same time. I was amazed to find that several of the other boys had completely exposed 'helmets'. So, the story that I had heard several years previously had not been nonsense after all.

Being at a naturally curious age, I asked my school friend for an explanation of what had happened to his cock. The only reply that I received was that his younger brother's was the same, as was his father's, and that's how they were born in their family. This I thought, simply couldn't be true, there must be another explanation.

I paid no more attention to the subject until some time later when, in a religious knowledge lesson, the subject of circumcision was mentioned, and it was explained to us that all Jewish boys have their foreskins cut off when they are only a few days old. So, that's what the operation was called. But I knew that my friend wasn't Jewish; in fact no-one was at the grammar school. We were, as in my previous school, all C. of E. except for a few Catholic boys who made themselves apparent by not eating meat on a Friday, but would eat fish, (which was incomprehensible to me, for surely fish was meat!) I simply couldn't understand why quite a number of us non-Jewish boys had had their foreskins removed. Were they malformed? Did they have no hole in the end? Had they been injured in some way, necessitating the removal? Or were some boys really born that way? From that moment on I was fascinated with the subject, and was determined to find the answers.

As part of my investigation, I decided to make a private census on the state of my schoolmates' cocks. Each year, the school published a little booklet called 'The School List'. This almost obligatory publication (6d) was, at last, to be of some real use – as a secret data base. I started by annotating each boy's name in my form with a 'c' if he was circumcised, or an 'n' if not so. I soon had the page for my form completed, revealing that one-third of my form (all born in 1945) were circumcised. The weekly football afternoon for our year proved invaluable, for all the three forms in my year would shower together afterwards. More data to enter. The annual school long run was the most productive, allowing covert inspection of boys of all ages in the school during the shower at the end of the run. By the time that I left school (July 1962) I had collated information on about a quarter of the school's pupils.

One or two interesting facts emerged from my study. The grammar school which I attended was March Grammar School (now disbanded), which took in pupils from three fenland towns – March, Whittlesey and Chatteris. Allowing for the population disparity between the three towns, it was apparent that disproportionately more boys from March were circumcised than the boys from Whittlesey and Chatteris. I assumed that this was due to the whims of one of the general medical practises in March, which must have been particularly keen on converting boys to ‘roundheads’. The other odd fact was that I had to exclude two boys from my analysis, for I was uncertain whether they were uncircumcised or partly circumcised. This was because they seemed to have permanently retracted foreskins. In the years that have followed, and with my knowledge of the subject, I tend to favour the latter possibility. I suspect that their parents may not have been keen on them having their foreskins completely removed, and may have settled for a partial removal of any excess foreskin.

Drum Tight and Fancy Free

The Acorn boast, its loyal toast,
“Drum tight and fancy free!”,
It’s only when they’ve taken most
That Roundheads really be.

The baby job with slackened hand,
A seasoned sacrifice,
Will leave a ragged remnant band,
Appearance never nice.

Mohelim cut the favoured few,
The blood shed their belief,
So at a glance you see the Jew,
The skin sags underneath.

Not for the weak, nor for the prude,
It makes a gentile wince,
The mohel’s list did oft include
A neo-natal Prince.

The “Yankee Clipper” functions well,
His skills at present hinge
On Gomco and the Plastibell.
Both leave a tidy fringe.

All circumcisions aren't the same,
No matter who you are.
Insistent parents take the blame –
They wish upon a scar.

So if you want your conscience free,
Just leave the babe intact.
Let early years preputial be,
In time he may react.

If amputation's reckoned right,
He'll choose the style and see –
A helmet bared to his delight,
"Drum tight and fancy free!"

He'll lose the cover and the cheese,
Not through a parent's voice.
He'll have his manhood put at ease,
And only done through choice.

Of much retraction will he know,
Of urine shaken free.
Now with the cut, good taste will show,
"Drum tight and fancy free!"

Reply To 'Yes And No'

M.E. of London's contribution on page 7 of 8/93 has prompted me to reply. His letter very eloquently sets out the feelings that most of us roundheads have about the aesthetic qualities of circumcision. But I do think that he has his priorities a little mixed up when he worries so about how his wanking will be terminally affected if he were to become one of us.

Wanking to me, and to most men I feel sure, is of secondary importance to real penetrative sex. I enjoy a nice long wank the same as anybody else, but it is normally due to my partner not being available; or if she is, it may be the wrong time in her calendar. In which case she brings me off when I need relief.

I was cut four years ago as an adult and can safely say I have no regrets. The driving interest that led me down the road to circumcision was our enjoyment of real sex, and the prospect of thrusting with an unencumbered penis, coupled with the very slight desensitising of the glans which would allow longer and more controlled lovemaking.

The surgeon really read my mind when he gave me my radical circumcision. Now when I'm erect I have a really nice example of the classic cut cock with not a single wrinkle of loose skin to be seen down the length of the shaft. But to date the expected gain in size of the glans has not occurred. Probably I was done about 40 years too late – pity!

A pleasant pastime that we've adopted since I was remodelled is for me to stimulate my partner's pussy lips and clitoris with the glans of my erect penis until she orgasms. It's softer than a finger and quieter than a vibrator. In the days before circumcision I would have been in agony treating my only occasionally exposed glans in such a manner.

I would readily admit that stimulating the glans of the penis with the foreskin is the most enjoyable way of wanking, but I have found that a generous squeeze of KY jelly in your hand, and rubbing the entire length of the penis, including the glans, is very satisfying.

M.E. should retract his foreskin and give this method a try. It could well give him the impetus to join us roundheads.

Informed Consent

I've just been listening to an item on Radio 4 Woman's Hour, dealing with children's agreement to surgery, and at what age they are capable of 'informed consent'.

Amongst the case studies was one of a 12-year-old boy who had been urged by his mother to agree to circumcision for medical reasons. It emerged that she had not disclosed all the details and he'd been previously very unhappy and unwilling to submit to it. Now, as a result of hospital counselling, he himself had decided to have it done. This was his response to being given the full option. All the pros and cons had been explained, and he alone had made the final decision, which he clearly understood was irreversible. In an interview, he said he was settled in his choice, mainly because he had been allowed to make it, not his mother. As he was heard to say, "It's not up to her any more, it's up to me!"

Many of us have been cut, not because it was necessary, but because our mothers favoured the idea. In turn, they may have been influenced by either grandma, aunties, sisters, midwives, nurses or female doctors. Their reasons were often superficial; "It looks nicer" (to them). Yet it's not their property they're altering! This aspect sometimes engenders more resentment than the circumcision itself. Often those done as babies have a traumatic moment of shock in later life when the truth dawns that they have been disfigured at someone else's whim. I perceive this factor is behind the frequent and welcome comments from R.B.W. How could they, who don't have a penis, decide to do this irreversible thing to us? Given the facts at a certain age, many of us would still opt for circumcision. But it's nice to be asked about something which is one of your most intimate concerns.

Against this, of course, it's clear that circumcisions are best done, as in Jewish culture, at a few days old. The individual subjected to this has no choice, but it helps acceptance when everyone else in your 'tribe' has it done. Such traditions used to be respected by the medical establishment, outside the bounds of large religious groupings, and within the confines of families, for that too gives a sense of belonging.

I'd like to see doctors and hospitals revise their thinking and offer circumcision as a readily available option in the first year. Thereafter, all but emergency operations should be postponed until the child can make his own unpressured choice at ten or twelve years of age.

Skin Happy

I've never really been able to understand what so many of you men have against your foreskins. To me, foreskins have always been an amusing, decorative and fun-generating part of a boy's body, which deserves love and affection rather than cutting off.

My brother Peter, who is a year younger than me, must have been at the front of the queue when foreskins were being dished out. As a kid he rejoiced in a fat sausage-like penis with the longest foreskin I've ever seen, amounting to nearly half the total length. Mum used to tease him in the bath, giving it a good tug and singing out, "Ding-dong, dinner's ready!"

As far as hygiene was concerned though, she had rather unconventional ideas about foreskins, and stated firmly that pulling a child's foreskin back was not necessary or desirable: it could cause damage to the delicate tissue. As a normal sensitive and intelligent lad, he himself would learn when it was time to start washing under it – that is, when he reached courting age. Nature certainly didn't demand it. Mum's only concession to hygiene was to strip his foreskin between thumb and forefinger a few times to eliminate any residue after getting it out for him to take a pee. He must have found this rather arousing, since even as a small boy he usually got a quite impressive stiffy on, much to my and Mum's amusement.

If Mum seriously thought that Peter would follow her example and never pull his foreskin back she was sadly mistaken. Although it was very long, it was also loose enough to be easily pulled back, as he delighted in demonstrating at the least encouragement. When I had some of the girls from class visit me, we took Peter down to the basement where he needed no encouragement to show off. He would pee into a paint tin, pinching his tip and inflating his foreskin out to the size of an orange. He got a real kick out of the gasps of disbelief from the girls. It was all the more interesting since this performance always gave him a hard-on: and I can tell you that the girls never tired of this sort of entertainment. Afterwards he would pull his foreskin right back so that it formed a corrugated bunch of skin at the base, and would wag his liver-coloured knob at us, all wet and shiny, revelling in the shrieks of pretend horror from my little friends.

As one of our favourite punishments for him after such a display, we would pinion his arms and I would feed his snake-like foreskin through a hole in a timber partition and secure it there with a small plastic clothes peg applied to the tip where it emerged the other side. It was quite painful for him to make any attempt to move and gave us a terrific laugh. We left him for half an hour once and Mum found him.

After she'd finished falling about with laughter, she gave us a good wiggling, saying that, although it seemed funny enough, we wouldn't laugh if the clamping effect caused damage and Peter had to go through the unpleasant experience of being circumcised. One of the girls asked what she meant, and she gave off massaging the circulation back into the tip of his foreskin to explain what circumcision was, and showing on the bulge in the skin over his glans where the cut would be made. She explained that Peter had a knob beneath the skin which gets permanently uncovered in a circumcised boy, little knowing that we had been treated to a demonstration of it a short time before.

One of the girls told Mum that her brother had a 'peeled' penis like that, and Mum got slightly embarrassed, saying that although she thought that it was unnecessary and strongly disapproved, a lot of people preferred it that way, and the operation occasionally had to be carried out to relieve tightness.

I was reminded of these childhood experiences the other day when I saw a picture of a refugee Somali youth being fed by the U.N. He was totally naked and had a whopping foreskin that almost exactly matched my brother's at that age. It nipped in tight to a narrow tube of skin in front of the well-developed knob, and then gradually flared out to terminate in the usual wrinkled bud at the tip. I was rather surprised to see this as I thought that all Somalis were Muslims and would therefore be circumcised. Another point on which I'm curious: are blacks – or any other ethnic group – particularly privileged when it comes to foreskin length? I've met one black guy who had a very long foreskin, though not as long as my brother's. By the way, I should mention that my Mum is Ghanaian and that I and my brother are of mixed race.

Empire and Sexuality

N.G. of Norwich sent me an excerpt of a book called Empire and Sexuality – The British Experience by Ronald Hyam. It throws a little light on the reasons for the popularity of circumcision in this country beginning in late Victorian times. The politicians were very anxious about the nation's health, two-thirds of recruits for the army at the time of the Boer War being virtual invalids. How could we keep an empire without a healthy and educated society? So was introduced subsidised school meals and compulsory school medical inspections, among other things.

One symbolic, and far from insignificant, new development in this process was the introduction of routine infant circumcision of boys among the upper and professional middle classes. We know less about this practice than we do about the rituals of some of the most obscure African peoples. Before another generation has elapsed, no one in Britain will even remember it ever happened or, if they do, will regard it as a quaint post-Victorian fad, on a par with antimacassars and aspidistras. The first and most difficult problem is to establish when it began. Circumcision was for centuries unthinkable to a Christian. "Christendom", wrote Richard Burton, "practically holds circumcision in horror", a point only underlined by the eccentric attempt of some millenarian false prophets to reintroduce it as 'the baptism of blood' in the 1820's. Christian iconography has always refused to be honest on this point. Michelangelo's David, for all his realism, is not circumcised as he should be. The infant Jesus, even when patently well past the eighth day, is never depicted as circumcised. In 1810, when Byron wanted to draw out the main differences between the "Turks and ourselves", he seized upon the fact that "we have a foreskin and they have none."

'Walter' (born early 1820's), with his insatiable curiosity about all aspects of sex, wrote two essays on the physiognomy of the penis. Both assume the presence of a foreskin. Circumcision is not even mentioned in them. His 'sample' was pretty good. His field observations were based on his recollections of exhibitionism and swimming bath scenes during his school-days, on what he saw of fellow participants in orgies, and during a great many voyeuristic episodes in brothels. He also gathered oral evidence from prostitutes, whom he found well-informed about their clients' genitals. Those who had been maidservants described their employers' sons' organs as well. He knew a good deal about the variable retraction of the foreskin in its natural adult state, so he may probably be accounted an accurate observer. The only two circumcised organs he ever saw belonged to Muslims, the first probably in Egypt about 1870 ("at once surprised, as I was for a moment, it occurred to me that he must be circumcised. Such a prick I'd never seen..."). Walter's evidence is supported by the entire corpus of mid-Victorian erotica. The first mention of circumcision in the genre appears to be in the 1880's; the first didactic reference circa 1907, in the anonymous Memoirs of a Voluptuary, (the dating must be more or less right, because two of the villains are schoolboy characters called 'Elgar' and 'Benson' – in real life the authors of Land of Hope and Glory, 1902 – and the joke would fall flat unless it were topical). 'Elgar' is described as having 'an awfully funny cock', the skin being 'cut off like a Jew'. It was the first time the narrator had seen such a member. He was not impressed, although he discovered later, 'it was not confined to Jews and Muslims', and a number of modern medical men approved of it.

Discussions about the possible benefits of circumcision began about 1890. One of the most enthusiastic publicists was Dr Remondino, who considered that evolution might eventually remove the foreskin. Meanwhile, outright war must be waged on this 'debatable appendage'. He wrote:

"Circumcision is like a substantial and well-secured life annuity: ... parents cannot make a better saving investment for their little boys, as it ensures them better health, greater capacity for labour, longer life, less nervousness, sickness, loss of time, and less doctor bills, as well as it increases their chance of a euthanasian death."

The British Medical Journal reviewer welcomed Remondino's book as focusing attention on an important subject insufficiently ventilated hitherto. Not surprisingly, he found some of the arguments 'excessive and strained', but concluded that many of Remondino's views were of undoubted value. A more sophisticated advocate was the eminent surgeon, Sir Jonathan Hutchinson, who stressed that the operation 'must necessarily tend to cleanliness' and almost certainly help to reduce cancer. Some doctors thought it would reduce liability to hernia. On the other side, Herbert Snow denounced circumcision as barbarous and unnecessary. Army doctors now joined in the debate, perhaps decisively. Captain F.J.W. Porter in 1892 said he had performed a hundred circumcisions (using cocaine) in India on his last tour, and twenty-five in six months back in the station hospital in Colchester; in fact, he operated 'whenever there is a sore on the prepuce'. Dr R.E. Foott, a former army surgeon, recalled how frequently he had been appalled by the 'filth collected' under the prepuces of the uncircumcised, and how often soldiers had to be made to wash the smegmatic accumulation away before he could examine them properly. This unhygienic state, he believed, 'assisted the absorption of the syphilitic virus'. Doctors as a group were now rapidly becoming convinced of the benefits of circumcision. There was a lot of discussion as to how they could persuade mothers to accept the operation. By the mid-1890's, however, they were alarmed by the number of 'specialist operators' who were sending circulars to the parents who announced in The Times the birth of a son – circulars which laid much stress on a suggestion that this was an ideal moment for fathers to put themselves in good genital standing too. In 1899, a Hertfordshire 'country doctor' reported from Welwyn that 'of recent years most parents' in his private practise were asking for infant circumcision of boys.

The answer to the first problem therefore seems fairly definite: British circumcision began in the 1890's – at a time when a great deal of public interest was focused on the Empire. The debate was over by about 1903. By 1907 it was reported to be very common in children's hospitals; 874 operations were performed in 1906 at Great Ormond Street. At the Middlesex Hospital in 1906, 54 children and 12 adults were circumcised. In the main, however, it was an operation left to general practitioners.

The second question we have to consider is why it was adopted. Two motivating strands can readily be identified: Jewish and Indian-imperial. As far as Jewish influences are concerned, there was at this time a good deal of reluctant admiration for Jewish methods of child care. Time and time again, doctors testified to the low incidence of infant mortality among Jews, to the sturdiness of Jewish children, to their supposedly low rates of masturbation, and to the rarity of venereal disease and cancer of the penis. The report of the Interdepartmental Committee on Physical Deterioration (1904) accepted Jewish family life as an ideal to which the rest of the nation had to move if they were really to improve the health of British children. General Sir Frederick Maurice felt that "it does not follow that a stereotyped copying of the habits of the Jews would be desirable", but he accepted that the British evidently had much to learn from them. As far as Indian experience is concerned, it is clear that circumcision had long been used as a treatment in the Indian army, possibly well back into the 18th. century. Hot humid climates are not good for sensitive foreskins, any more than sandy ones are (as the Jews and Muslims of the Middle East had always known). There can be little doubt that British Indian medical authorities strongly favoured the introduction of infant circumcision in Britain as a procedure which would eliminate a tiresome cause of later trouble for future servants of Empire. Together, these Jewish and Imperial strands are a sufficient explanation for the adoption of circumcision by the British elite. (Sadly, however, the finesse of the Jewish mohel was not assimilated, and the crudity of the British form of circumcision had to be seen to be believed. This fact deprives the whole discussion of any elegiac quality it might otherwise have had.) It is not necessary to invoke its supposed properties as an anti-masturbation device; anyone who advocated it for that reason was indulging in pure quackery.

Lastly, we have to establish the significance of the late-Victorian adoption of circumcision. Symbolically, the anthropologist (to whom we have to turn for guidance) would regard circumcision as a change 'from a state of infantile filthiness to a state of clean maturity', of rebirth into 'masculinity and personality'. In some societies it serves as a public demonstration of loyalty to the group (since the father risks the future basis of his power as a man with descendants); it is a ritual of kinship unity, an act of obedience to ancestral custom and thus a legitimization of those in authority. But, most fundamentally and broadly, circumcision is the establishment of a strong male identity: an assertion of maleness, a conquest of feminine elements. Among the Merina of Madagascar, for example, it is sometimes called 'mahaso' (making sweet and clean); it is making a boy properly male, achieving a correct sexual differentiation, and perhaps even regarded as ensuring sexual potency. Viewed in the light of these anthropological insights, we can see how British circumcision was meant to contribute to the general improvement of the physical and self-confident manliness of the future custodians of the Empire. It was a dramatic reassertion of masculinity, in accordance with the lessons of practical experience of working in hot climates. Perhaps also it had an appeal as satisfying the symbolic requirements of ruling an empire of seventy million Muslims. It was widely adopted in the white dominions.

That British circumcision is to be seen primarily as an imperial phenomenon is, finally, demonstrated statistically by its differential adoption among the various social groups. It was chiefly characteristic of the upper and professional classes, pioneered by doctors and army officers. In the 1930's – there are unfortunately no earlier statistics – it seems to have been carried out on about two-thirds of boys in the leading public schools. At the highest level of the social scale the proportion may even have exceeded four-fifths, whereas in some 'deprived' working-class areas, rural and urban, it may never have got beyond one-tenth. Overall, by the 1930's, almost exactly one-third of the total British male population was being circumcised. A survey of soldiers, mostly National Servicemen, in 1953, found thirty-four percent of them to be circumcised (reflecting, of course, its incidence circa 1935). Its decline began as one of the casualties of war. In the national sample of 2,428 boys born on March 4th. 1946, only twenty-four percent were circumcised, but the class differential was still highly significant: 38.8 percent among professional and salaried groups, and 21.9 percent among manual and unskilled workers. By 1946 the whole business was under sentence of death, precipitately killed off by the end of the Indian Civil Service and by the economies of the N.H.S. Today, less than one percent are circumcised in infancy, and only in the main for religious reasons.

Editorial

Here we are again and lo! another format. Following the redesign of Acorn with Issue 1/94 a member, who is a professional designer, has given us a new logo for use on both magazine and stationery. He has worked with our computer typesetter to produce an even more professional looking magazine which will also allow a little extra content in each issue.

Please be assured that we don't intend to keep changing the appearance of the newsletter every few issues; but we felt this latest design was so good that it ought to be introduced at once. Guess what the A of the logo represents.

There are some outstanding orders for back-copies of the newsletter. Please bear with us awhile as we are doing our best to clear up the backlog, and they'll be along as soon as possible.

And now. Every year we lose foreskinned members. This year I rang a couple that I knew the numbers of, and asked the reason. The answers I got, also backed up at the Bournemouth meeting, were that there was a feeling that they were slagged and despised by the roundheads. With one notable exception, the cavaliers extol their own virtues but never denigrate a circumcised penis or its owner. Whereas the circumcised are continually using words such as dirty, smelly, STD and AIDS prone, and cancer creators to describe foreskins and their owners (You were mentioned, Anthony, for your clever but very denigrating poetry). If all this were true, foreskinned men would be made outcasts by all women and circumcision would be totally universal whereas, religion excepted, the opposite is becoming the case.

Looking at the breakdown of the German soldiers in the last newsletter, and knowing that teenagers are the least lovers of soap and water, less than one in five were found to have smegma traces. In years gone by, when the only washing facility at home was in the kitchen sink with all the family around, people weren't as hygienic as they are today with privacy in bathrooms, so maybe that is where the tale arose. But if someone gets himself circumcised for cleanliness reasons then it must be because he is dirty anyway. If you rely on your underpants to keep your cock clean, do you rely on your socks to keep your feet clean?

With regard to the STD-prone case, the survey in this issue regarding physical health asked all 8000 men whether they had been circumcised, specifically to find out if there was any relationship between foreskins and STDs, and none was found. A call to the AIDS helpline ascertained also that there was no difference between foreskins and circumcisions when it came to catching AIDS.

Jewish women are held up as an example of lack of cervical cancer with circumcised husbands, yet the Hindus also are very low and they're non-circumcised. Also with the overwhelming circumcisions in the USA, they too should have very little incidence of cervical cancer, but they haven't. There's a school of thought that it is now down to promiscuity, and not foreskins.

So, the foreskinned brigade would ask that these epithets are not applied to them, and that those who get adult circumcisions own up to having them because there is either something physically wrong with their penis or they just love the look and feel of a bare knob (see the first paragraph of 'Request from Cavaliers') – and there's certainly nothing wrong with that.

After I'd written this I received the following letter from Ray Hamble. I didn't know he felt so strongly on the issues, as he never mentioned them to me at Bournemouth.

Concerns

Don't worry, I'm not about to resign my membership in high dudgeon or anything as dramatic as that, but two happenings in the group recently have given me cause for disquiet, and I'll be a lot happier when I've got them off my chest.

When Al-Sayyad Abdul-Razzaq Muhammad wrote in Issue 8/93 that as a Muslim he still possessed his foreskin, and went on to describe his reasons for being in that position, I admired his honesty and respected his freedom of choice. This, surely, is part of the right of anyone living in a democracy. There are few of us who can claim perfection in every aspect of our political, religious, moral or any other laid down code of behaviour.

It pained me therefore, to read I. M. Lamont's response in Issue 2/94 in which he made reference to "the filthy state of possessing a foreskin", and went on to express in most uncompromising language his own thoughts on the subject. I found it all the more distressing in that I have corresponded with Mr. Lamont on friendly terms for several years. As a non-Muslim I do not want, any more than you do, David, to interfere in the strongly held views of those who do adhere to that faith, but I believe very strongly, that Acorn members in general must avoid judgemental attitudes which denigrate the completely honourable right of any man to protect and respect the natural and un-mutilated state of the body with which he was born. Surely we must honour the principle of 'live and let live' regardless of personal feelings with regard to our own foreskin.

Many, perhaps most, Acorn members are pro-circumcision, but please let us show tolerance of, and indeed interest in, the views of those who favour retaining their prepuce. We may have a lot to learn to our advantage if we avoid bigotry.

The other issue which I found distasteful concerns only those of us who recently enjoyed the weekend get-together in Bournemouth. Let me say straight away that this in no way detracts from my sincere appreciation of the excellence of the arrangements on our behalf made by Brian and Ian.

We were invited to watch a video showing an African tribal ritual circumcision ceremony in all its gory detail. As a doctor I am not averse to the sight of blood and, sadly, have been witness to a great deal of suffering in my time. Nevertheless, I felt that the scenes of innumerable children of all ages being hauled, screaming and kicking in terrified protest, to have their foreskin tied to a length of string which was pulled as hard as possible by a man, stretched as far as possible across a log, and then violently chopped off with a large knife, was gratuitously 'sick' in the extreme. To watch the brutality once, or even twice, as an example of one of the more barbaric methods of removing the foreskin, may be an acceptable education. But to devote a whole film to it, to my mind, bordered on perversion.

I am more than happy with my circumcised state and welcome the opportunity to belong to a group whose members share a common interest, but we must not open our ranks to extremists or those whose interests border on the macabre, or we will head down a slippery slope towards something frightening, and of which I would prefer not to have any part.

Ray Hamble

Replies to Mum's Dilemma

Mrs. M.B. of Oxfordshire should be congratulated on her courage for outlining so clearly her problem and dilemma; epitomising the reason for the existence of the Acorn magazine. I do hope, like you David, that there will be many comments.

Once a foreskin gives trouble, the problem invariably has to be resolved by circumcision, and that would appear to have been uppermost in the mind of the lady practitioner who recommended immediate radical action; the matter would have been dealt with then and there.

But having said that, I do agree that infant circumcision is not desirable. It is much more preferable to let each individual decide for himself. In addition to the treatment of the dorsal slit, which has already been suggested, there is also the possibility of stretching and partial circumcision to be considered.

I do not understand the specialist's recommendation to take no action until puberty. The present situation is unlikely to have improved by then, and if, in the meantime, recurring balanitis (inflammation under the foreskin) sets in, the situation could deteriorate with the necessity for immediate action which would be considerably more traumatic than dealing with the situation as at present. Youngsters by the age of 5-6 should be able to retract their foreskins, but with a youngster who is already perturbed about things the position is far from easy. I do hope Mrs. M.B. will keep Acorn posted with any developments.

Bill – Surrey

In reply to Mrs. B. I would tell her to forget circumcision at the moment. The same thing happened to our son at about the same age. We took him to our doctor, the old-fashioned type, who wrapped a cloth around the retracted foreskin and eased it forward. He then instructed us to push the foreskin forward beyond the tip and, with the thumb and first finger of each hand at the very tip, pull the skin very gently apart once every day for a month or so. In no time his foreskin became quite slack and mobile.

I have read many times since then that doctors years ago would advise this for tight foreskins. So, Mrs. B., don't give up yet, your son's foreskin is one of the most precious things he will ever have.

H.J.M. – Mid-Glamorgan

I read with interest Mrs. B's letter in Issue 2/94, and the reply from David Acorn. His advice is generally quite sound given that he is from the non-circumcision school. Allow me to offer some advice when seen from the viewpoint that circumcision certainly does no harm and may do some good.

Having decided not to circumcise your son at birth, you were quite correct in leaving his foreskin alone whilst he was still a baby. In many boys there are adhesions between the foreskin and the glans at birth which gradually break down during the first few years. If the foreskin is not fully retractable before the boy starts compulsory schooling then he should be seen by a doctor.

It is obvious from your letter that your son's foreskin was not adherent to the glans – however its opening was very small, and when he eventually retracted it a paraphimosis occurred. Had it not happened at 4 years old then he most likely would have suffered at puberty when the glans grows but the tip of the foreskin doesn't grow anything like as fast. I know several boys who developed this puberty phimosis and needed circumcision then.

As your GP and the specialist has said, your son will require a circumcision sooner or later, as it is the only way to prevent the paraphimosis recurring. David Acorn suggested that the tip of the foreskin could be cut and restitched in such a way as to make it wider. Whilst this operation might be possible, it will leave scar tissue at the end of the foreskin. This may not be visible, but it will definitely be much less elastic than the natural skin. If the opening is not widened enough then your son may experience tearing of the tip (with more scarring), or even another paraphimosis, during sexual activity. Opening the tip too wide also brings its own problems.

I firmly believe therefore, that the only proper course of action to totally prevent future problems is for your son to have a complete circumcision. This then brings us back to your question as to when to do it and how to explain it to him.

In many ways it would have been best to have circumcised him at the doctor's surgery when the paraphimosis occurred. Although he had gone through considerable trauma already, anything which removed the intense pain of the paraphimosis would probably have been acceptable to him. You could also have explained it later as having been necessary both to cure the immediate problem and to prevent it happening again whilst he was enjoying playing with his penis.

You said that the problem occurred last summer – ie, nearly a year ago. Your son might now be receptive to the suggestion that he should have something done to prevent last year's painful problem ever happening again. If he agrees to the theory of getting something done, then you can tell him more about what will be done to him to fix the problem. Don't assume that a five-year-old cannot be prepared well to accept surgery. I know of a boy of that age, with a very tight foreskin, who was fully aware of exactly what was going to be done to him and fairly bounced into the surgery eager to have it done.

If your son really isn't prepared for circumcision now, then it is probably best to leave it until he is about 12 years old and moving between primary and secondary school. The circumcision can then be done at the start of the school holidays so that it is fully healed, and he has almost forgotten about it, by the time he makes new friends at the high school. Doing it at this age will also ensure that he doesn't pass into puberty with a phimotic foreskin to give him even more troubles. It is fairly easy to discuss the matter with a boy of this age as he is old enough to make rational judgements (see the article on Informed Consent in Acorn 2/94).

Whilst your son ought now to be regularly retracting his foreskin when bathing, and also whilst urinating, it is obvious that to do so will most probably lead to another paraphimosis. Fortunately, pre-pubescent boys generate very little smegma, and hence the cleanliness angle that you so rightly raise isn't likely to be a problem until his teens. David is however mistaken in suggesting that if you can't get inside a foreskin then neither can germs or bacteria. These organisms are very tiny and can pass through gaps that are invisible to the human eye – so they definitely can get under the tight foreskin. On the other hand, assuming that there are no other problems, it isn't until smegma is being produced regularly that there is anything much to attract bugs.

So, in summary, try getting your son interested in an immediate circumcision. If you don't have him circumcised now, make plans to have it done between primary and secondary school. Either way, keep a regular eye on his foreskin and penis to ensure that he isn't developing other problems.

If you would like a copy of a booklet about circumcision, written by a doctor, drop me a line via Acorn and I can send it either direct or via your friend. Good luck, and please do let Acorn know how you eventually proceed.

Hermaphrodites

A few years ago, a friend showed me a video film of individuals who had anomalous sexual organs. One was a man with a 14" penis, another a girl with enormously enlarged labia and a lady with excess body hair. The item which interested me most was a very attractive girl who possessed a normal female vulva, breasts, and a feminine voice, long blonde hair and very attractive manner and voice. Her 'aberration' was that she had a penis. This was normally masculine in shape and size, in fact slightly longer than average, with foreskin drawn forward, and in no way unusual. It was clear that this was not a so-called 'she-male' who relied on hormones, but a genuinely 'from birth' mix of sexual organs, a hermaphrodite. She actually stated that doctors had told her that she could inseminate herself.

A year or two afterwards, in a sex shop, I saw a magazine which depicted, in rather blurred form, another female with a penis and vulva. This year, whilst in Munich, I checked the magazines in the 'she-male' section of a shop, and saw three magazines devoted to this topic. For personal reasons I wasn't able to buy them at the time, but have every intention of so doing at the next opportunity.

The first magazine showed a woman aged around 35, naked, with an erect penis and fully female vulva, and through the subsequent pages displaying herself with other girls. The intriguing thing that I noticed in every page was that she had her foreskin totally retracted, and that it showed every sign of being 'happy' like that – suggesting that she wore it permanently retracted.

The next mag. portrayed three younger girls, around 18-25ish, all naked, all with penises which were variously erect or flaccid. All had dimensions which would compare with a male, all were shaved, all showed very feminine vulvas into which they were able to insert other objects. Again, each one had a fully retracted foreskin, and in close-up I was almost certain that one had been circumcised. I believe that this mag. was American, and knowing the US tendency to circumcise indiscriminately, it would be possible that the girl had actually been cut.

The final magazine had a caption on the front in English, "Is she a Freak?" This showed an attractive dark-haired girl arm in arm with a man, both early twenties, and she was wearing a slit skirt dress, looking very attractive. The next photo showed her holding the skirt open at the slit, her penis clearly visible, flaccid, and much larger than many males (certainly than mine!) hanging happily downwards, and also with retracted foreskin. Later pictures showed both having normal sexual contacts, holding each other's penis, she the larger, and always with the skin back.

I found this series of magazines fascinating, and am most anxious to discover more about this phenomenon. How frequently does this occur? (Remember Lady Colin Campbell, the feature writer and royalty recorder, who had a penis until the age of 18, and was a 'boy' until her 'feminine physiology produced indisputable evidence that she was a female'.) Are descriptions or records of others with the anomalous organs available? Why did all these girls wear the foreskin always retracted. Is it perhaps more comfortable when worn in female underwear? What happens when they inevitably have an unanticipated erection? The girl in the video said that she 'peed standing up as a man' Do they all? If their female personality and persona encourage them to wear their foreskins back, is this an indication of an underlying leaning to the uncovered glans.

I do hope that my correspondence is not outside your range of acceptable contributions. I would welcome any discussion or comments on this.

Bournemouth

Although I've been a member of Acorn for a few years, the recent meeting in Bournemouth was the first one I've attended since I subscribed. I seem to remember joining just after the last meeting (in Weston-super-Mare), reading about it in the first newsletters I was sent, and then looking out for news of the next one. It was a long time coming but it was well worth the wait.

The meeting was due to begin at around 3pm on the Saturday afternoon, but since I live so far away – Leeds – I couldn't get to the hotel until after 4. After a journey lasting more than eight hours and having had only a few biscuits to eat, I would have preferred a wash and a decent meal before doing anything else. But since I was already late I felt obliged to go straight to room 10 where the meeting was being held.

I felt like a gatecrasher when I opened the door to find a dozen pairs of eyes on me, so I mumbled who I was and then picked my way over the litter of bodies and poured myself into a space between a bed and a chest of drawers, hoping I wouldn't have to speak. Almost immediately David Acorn asked me how I first heard about the newsletter, so I was forced out of my silence from early on. The session was concerned with recruiting new subscribers and increasing Acorn's readership, and there were several constructive suggestions regarding advertising and presentation.

The evening meal wasn't taken in the hotel as planned (insufficient numbers, I think), so we drove to a pub restaurant instead. Afterwards we went on to I.W's home to further discussions aided by technical videos. I was struck by I.W's generosity in allowing his house to become Acorn H.Q. for the evening, especially since most must have been complete strangers to him. The videos included African ritual circumcisions, circumcision techniques, tattooing and piercing, and my personal highlight, Jo Menell's short film, Dick.

A final gathering was held for a couple of hours on Sunday morning, including a talk by Ray on the new operation to lengthen the penis and then, since by this time everyone had found their feet to some extent, we broke up into smaller groups to discuss shared interests or pore over the magazines and cuttings which had been brought along. Several new friendships were made over the weekend with addresses being swapped readily. The success of the meeting was abundantly evident to all those who attended, and its organisers, Brian and Ian, are to be thanked and congratulated for such a memorable weekend.

Anxieties

This is the sequel to the account published in Issue 5/93 as 'Discovery Time'.

My circumcision improved my performance in the pissing up the wall games we all used to play in the outside toilets at primary school. Lots of other boys had lost their foreskins, but I never remember us using the word 'circumcised'. Those done were referred to as having been 'cut' and I was happy enough to be one of them, until later on when I became interested in girls.

At grammar school it was evident in the first communal showers and baths after rugby, that half my class were roundheads, so, with such equality, nobody was picked on about their status. The only thing that emerged when we discussed it was that none of our parents had told us about it. Those bold enough to ask had been stonewalled with answers like, "We don't talk about such things!"

In those days (early fifties), the sexual climate was very different to that of today. Babies seemed to come through the post, condoms were under the counter items for married couples only, the pill had yet to be invented and there were no four-letter words delivered in the media. We seemed to be bombarded with embarrassed vibes from home, school and church, conveying that sexual intercourse was sacred to marriage. The message was, you shouldn't do it with a girl unless you loved her, and if you did love her you wouldn't want to put her at risk of the terrible social disgrace of an illegitimate pregnancy (catch 22). On top of this you might well become infected with an awesome venereal disease and a court judgement to pay £1.50 for life! There were many shameful shotgun weddings and the couple's misdemeanour held up as an example of what to avoid. The background is best imagined by a true story of a girl friend of my wife. She, a bride to be, attended family planning clinic to be fitted with a diaphragm. After her correct size had been ascertained, the device was put on the clinic shelf and could only be claimed the day before the wedding. I sketch all this to make some sense of the attitudes of the era that shaped my upbringing.

So why had so many of us been circumcised? One boy in our class passed on the information from his elder brother that it was done to inhibit teenage sex. The idea being that a young, inexperienced girl would find it painful to take a large dry glans without a foreskin to help roll it 'in' as nature intended. For our part this would be painful too, as it would rub on our dry end and pull on our scars. As I was just beginning to be keenly interested in girls and dream of having sex with some I fancied, this information caused me some unease. Like most circumcised boys must do, I had from time to time tried to pull the fragment of remaining foreskin forward over the rim onto the glans, only to watch it snap back the moment I let go. This reinforced the realisation that you were cut for life and nothing could be done to reverse or disguise it. How terrible if it were going to make sex uncomfortable.

Some anxiety was dispelled when our school, in a moment of enlightenment, called in an outside psychologist to give us a series of sex education lectures. Looking back, this was quite ahead of its time! We were co-ed and the lessons were given to the usual mixed class. The lecturer dispelled the initial embarrassed giggling with just the right combination of good humour and honest information. He drew on the blackboard detailed chalk drawings of the male and female private parts, and when he came to the foreskin, diverted to explain circumcision. I remember he asked for a show of hands on who had been cut, and collectively half the class were brave enough to own up. He explained the religious, medical and hygienic reasons for the procedure and told us that most of us would have been done for the latter. This gave him an opportunity to make a point about hygiene for the others. He then concluded by telling the girls that they had an even chance of 'models' in the husband stakes, and it wouldn't make the slightest difference in sexual intercourse. Whilst it was good to think this would be so, I could never quite accept it. Surely a circumcised penis looks and feels very different for both partners?

As I went out with girls I often wondered if they speculated on the topic. Unlike today's generation, many would have seen or heard about it in their families. I knew that it was talked about in "women's circles", and they appeared to be the ones who arranged the op. and took charge of the aftercare. I heard women discussing it more than once in the whispered tones made famous by Les Dawson. One, I recollect on the bus, telling her friend that she'd just had her baby boy 'shortened'. From other details overheard it was clear what the euphemism meant! Did the girls I was dating ever give the matter any thought ... and what were their expectations concerning me? Since reading Acorn I have been pleased to learn that it was important to some. One delightful female correspondent, a nudist, informing us that her husband's circumcised penis was one of the things that attracted her to him. This leads us to wonder, if social conventions in clothes had developed to display men's genitals, would it have had any influence on the women's choice – "I saw his acorn and it was love at first sight!"?

I went out with one girl for about twelve months, and because of the sexual inhibitions described earlier, sexual intercourse seemed to be out of the question. But we did explore each other's body. On several occasions she played with my penis, but never attempted to pull my remnant of foreskin forward, or commented on my circumcision. When she finished our relationship for someone else, I wondered if it had anything to do with it, but will never know.

After this I went out with a variety of girls, and remember one in particular who I drove back to the nurses' home after a dance. The goodnight kiss in the car became passionate and we both followed our instincts and let our hands run into each other's underwear. I was just enjoying the feel of experienced feminine fingers exploring my helmet when, after only a few seconds, she groaned and whispered, "Awwwww, you've been cut!" This was an immediate turnoff, but did lead to an opportunity to ask about her preferences and why. She said that circumcised penises were limited in foreplay, and we both knew that was as far as we intended going.

Then I met the girl who became my wife. Early on I knew that this relationship was very special, and that stoked up anxieties as to how she would feel when she discovered my circumcision. I remember the moment when she first slipped her hand into my trousers, and my feelings of pleasure at her handling were tempered by wondering what comment she was about to make. There was none, and the suspense lasted through many more sessions until, one day, she casually mentioned the topic had cropped up for discussion among the girls at work when one had told them her new husband was cut. I mumbled some sort of apology for my own permanently skinned acorn, but she interrupted it with a big hug and kiss, and said she didn't mind at all.

Before we married, she bought a compendium advice book which covered everything from buying a house to having sex. The section on the latter was very explicit for the standards of the day. It explained what each partner could expect to find in the genitalia of the other. For women, it described a man's foreskin and how to pull it back. An asterisk on the paragraph directed the reader to a footnote explaining that many brides would find their partners were missing in this respect, because of childhood circumcision. It suggested that a dry glans might cause initial discomfort and recommended a lubricated condom until the woman adjusted to her partner's lack of foreskin. As I'd waited this long, I sure as hell didn't want the London Rubber Co. between us at the great moment, so I pretended not to have seen it. Fortunately she never mentioned the matter either.

Our honeymoon was a great success, and I remember the gratifying feeling of first sex. This moment made sense of my circumcision, as I discovered that female juices restore glans sensitivity like nothing else, and the freedom of a totally exposed glans without any foreskin moving over it felt like heaven. Of course I can only imagine the alternative, but unlike some roundheads, I've no great yen to try it. I'm fairly certain that I have grown a much larger glans because it has developed free of any restricting foreskin, but cannot prove it. I just appreciate never having to pull back any skin before sex, and knowing there is nothing to slop about during the act. Cavalier friends assure me that I'm missing a great deal and so is my wife as she is denied the initial pleasure of peeling me. Fortunately she doesn't seem to mind, and during discussion, has been quite reassuring in her acceptance of my circumcision, though this seems to border on indifference for the most part. When friends have joked about it she has been very supportive. It really is no big deal to her and she is puzzled but tolerant of my interest. The best endorsement she gave me was expressing her willingness to have our two boys done as babies. Unfortunately, although she tried several times with hospital and two doctors, her requests were always refused. By the time we realised we could have paid and had them done privately, they were at an age when they would be aware of what was being done to them, and I had no wish to put them through such an ordeal.

Nevertheless, my fascination with the subject has never waned. First it was fed through Forum ... and now since their perplexing editorial decision to drop the topic, through Acorn. At least I have them to thank for this dedicated magazine, which is better than wading through pages of other uninteresting fetishes just to find the odd 'plum' of interest to me. Long may you continue.

Request from Cavaliers

Following my request last year for information and experiences from roundheads who'd been cut in adulthood, the response was good, and I learned quite a lot from the various correspondents. All, I think, had been circumcised for cosmetic rather than medical reasons, so all were pleased with the result.

I would like to ask for information from cavaliers who are considering circumcision for whatever reason. This may provide more information from those in a similar position to me.

As my main reason for considering circumcision has been a tender and sore foreskin, it is the medical rather than cosmetic angle which concerns me. My GP, when confronted with the problem, was very much anti-circumcision and gave me some cream. I have also found recently that using a lubricating jelly during sex has improved the situation immensely – not only from the tenderness being improved, but the better sensation, probably caused by the foreskin (normally fairly loose) being kept totally back, and thus giving a much better direct stimulation to the knob.

Turning to another point. Although I wasn't able to attend the meeting in Bournemouth, I would be interested to know the split between roundheads and cavaliers among those who attended.

[10 roundheads and 3 cavaliers. — D.A.]

Lastly, a question for consideration. Why are cavaliers always so shy about retracting their foreskins when showering in public? I notice that most turn to the wall and somewhat furtively pull the skin back to wash, while many don't even bother! Is it shyness, or the fear of getting a hard-on if they touch their skin? I always retract my skin to wash it, then leave it retracted. I sometimes see other cavaliers do this, but not often.

Anon

[With regard to the last question. It wouldn't surprise me if the reason wasn't the worry of doing anything that could be defined as sexual in today's climate of opinion. After all, a man can't kiss and cuddle a little girl any more without the fear of a hand on his shoulder. A great, great pity. — D.A.]

Female Circumcision

In ages past, female circumcision had only been a fringe or academic interest associated with races abroad. The extreme form is pharaonic circumcision (so-called because a Pharaoh in ancient Egypt had such a small penis that he ordered the vaginas of his women be made smaller so he could enjoy intercourse with them) where the clitoris is removed and the lips sewn together. With so many other races now in this country the number of known female circumcisions has risen greatly and led to an act of parliament forbidding it.

Everyone is pleased pharaonic circumcision has been banned, but there has been great worry about the description 'female circumcision', where a small cut is used to help expose the clitoris and increase sensitivity together with improved numbers of orgasms. Over a year or two, doctors in the media have claimed the situation wasn't clear. Early last autumn, the Law Society said there had been no reported cases under the new act, the medical profession needing only to change the description to 'hood removal' or whatever, and avoid 'circumcision', which equated with pharaonic removals.

There is an increasing interest, especially amongst the ladies, for hood removal or clitoral improvement, and I'm sure this will continue. An item in the Daily Mail of 26.11.93, where a Dr. Farroque Siddique was struck off for performing an illegal female circumcision, brings everything up-to-date, and underlines the need to keep the two types of description apart.

Funny Old World

An item from the Bangkok Post of 12.7.93.

“Beware. A gang of charlatans has been at work in our city boasting that they possess the ancient secret of penis enlargement,” said Dr Thongchai Termprasith to the press, after more than a hundred Thai men had reported to the city hospital with severe genital disorders, within the space of a few days.

“Those men are nothing more than quacks, and the results of their handiwork are woeful to behold. They charge 500 Baht and use a knitting needle to inject the member with their ‘magic potion’, which turns out to be a mixture of olive oil, chalk, kapok and other rubbish. I’ve even seen bits of the Bangkok telephone directory. Naturally, the penis swells up to the size of a loofah, which is when the money is handed over. But after a few days a most terrible thing happens. The men start to experience a dreadful burning after intercourse, and soon their manhood turns rotten and implodes. I myself have amputated more than 20 this week.”

One victim, who wished to remain anonymous, told the press, “Learn from my misfortunes. I am bereft. Last week I thought twelve centimetres was not enough to satisfy my wife. How will I pleasure her with no centimetres?”

“Be happy with the Natural One that God has given you,” the doctor told reporters, “and remember that a healthy maggot is better by far than a gangrenous king cobra.”

Circumcision Incidence

In compiling the new Penguin book Physical Health and Sexual Behaviour, a massive survey of nearly 8,000 men (I don’t know how many women) took place. The final question enquired whether the respondent was circumcised. This question was included on the basis of evidence that the risk of acquisition of STD and HIV may be increased by the presence of the foreskin (Cameron et al., 1989; Aral and Holmes, 1990). Studies examining this variable may be confounded by differing and interrelated cultural and religious factors influencing both the practice of circumcision and sexual behaviour.

Overall, 21.9% of men reported that they had been circumcised, but there was a strong relationship with age. Only 12.5% of men aged 16-24 had been circumcised and this increased to 32.3% of men aged 45-59. This striking age relationship appears to reflect changing public health policy on circumcision between the 1930s (Gairdner, 1949) and the 1970s.

The data were examined by religious denominations on account of varying views on the practice of circumcision. Circumcision rates were markedly higher in non-Christian religions, reflecting in particular the routine religious practice of circumcision among Jews and Muslims. Analysis by ethnic group shows white males to be the least likely to be circumcised.

In our data there was no relationship in bivariate analysis between circumcision and rates of attendance at an STD clinic.

Snippets

Following the story of the wife who cut her husband’s dick off, there have been two other small stories in the press recently, both German in origin I think. The first was about a man who was trying to wank with a vacuum cleaner, but the suction was so great that it tore his cock off. As in America it was sewn on again with the hope of no lasting effects, although I would think that it might be a little longer now. I hope that it was a great feeling at the time it was going from about six inches to nine.

The second was a case again of a girl cutting off her boyfriend’s cock. This time he didn’t have it sewn back on again, but auctioned it off for £40 and a bottle of schnapps. I suppose that after he’d spent and drunk the lot he committed suicide! I would.

The Japanese had the right way of brightening up boring journeys for women. They lined the roads with replicas of the male member. Until recent decades, there were thousands of stone and wood carvings along the byways of Japan, erected to remind people of the importance of sex. Why most of them were pulled down is not known. Perhaps it had something to do with accidents caused by distracted drivers.

Staying in Japan, in the programme Without Walls on C.4 on March 1st., half an hour was devoted to a programme entitled The Penis Unsheathed. I presumed that this was going to be on circumcision, but neither circumcision nor foreskins were mentioned. The unsheathed actually seemed to mean erect, which I suppose was because the normal penis during erection has the glans unsheathing as the foreskin disappears to become the shaft skin. The programme was predominantly by women, most of whom felt cheated that the law didn't allow them to see pictures and films of men with hard-ons; although peculiarly no-one appears to take any notice of the fact that all the icons, vibrators, dildos etc. are all in an erect state and shown. To get back to Japan. A sequence was shown of an annual ceremony where about 6 men carried a huge erect plaster penis through a town and everyone went to church to worship at a shrine covered in erect penises. There might be more churchgoers in this country if something like that occurred here.

Contact Corner

Will anyone, anywhere in the country, who has had an adult circumcision in the last two years, please write to me urgently with details of who circumcised you (name and address please), how much it cost, whether you were able to choose the sort of result you wanted, and how it turned out. I need this information to assist a 22 year-old friend to get a circumcision this summer.

Please send to V.Q. – London, via Acorn. All information will be treated with discretion. The ability to discuss the details with you would be much appreciated but is not essential.

London based, mature man, about to be re-circumcised for aesthetic reasons, wishes to contact other members who have been circumcised or re-circumcised as adults.

Write to William at Acorn.

In answer to several enquiries, there is no charge for the forwarding of letters, only a stamp is required.

Our membership is beginning to grow apace now, mostly due to the efforts of a few of our members. Our good friend Tuppy Owens gives us plugs in her publications, for which we are grateful. A member has also placed us on a thing called The Computer Bulletin Board in America. This is a system whereby, via an index, you are able to 'talk' to anyone, or pick up information, through a computer, on your chosen subject. I'm not well up on such things, but I think that's the gist of it. There has been one enquiry so far from New York.

A member has asked if we could do an update on the penis survey, as we have had quite a few new members since it was done some two years ago. I'll try to find the time for this.

The summer has got to appear any moment now and as I'm writing I look wistfully out of the window and wonder if I'll get to a naturist beach this year. I know we have several naturist members, so the thought has come into my head that this could be a good way for those inclined to meet in a relaxed atmosphere. I know the weather is

Mum's Dilemma — Another Reply

The problem of paraphimosis and what to do about it was admirably posed by Mrs M.B. in her contribution to 2/94 and David Acorn made some useful points in response. The point about Acorn is that we try to present a range of advice, so here is some more, which I hope will be useful to Mrs M.B., her husband and, most importantly, her son.

First, I think that Mrs B. should put out of her mind any thought of having “failed her son in some way”. The shape of his foreskin, like the shape of his nose or the colour of his hair, are simply facts of life which neither she nor her husband could have influenced, whatever they might have done – and I guess that she is thankful that her son is free of far worse deformities.

Second, I would argue strongly that both the GP's and the specialist's advice should be accepted that the lad should be circumcised. David Acorn suggests the alternative dorsal slit operation, but I would advise against this. In such mobile tissue it is difficult to do accurately. If too short a cut is made, or if the cut heals in the wrong way, the situation would be worsened, since the already tight opening will be tightened further by scar tissue. I have seen an article recently advocating this operation, but I would not support this. At least two Acorn members have been in contact with us for help in dealing with the unsatisfactory outcome of a dorsal slit in childhood, when it was quite rare. So in my view there is much to be said for the traditional full-scale remedy of circumcision, tried and tested as it is over some three thousand years.

David gives the example of a man of nearly 70 with a tight foreskin who has never retracted it in his life. While I don't doubt that this is possible, the lad has already experienced the kind of problem that can arise and that he could easily encounter again – perhaps as the traumatic culmination of a nearly consummated love affair, with all the damage that could do to his sex life and conjugal prospects.

I do agree with David that the boy should have opportunities to see his father (or if this is a problem then with other reliable lads or men) with the helmets of their penises both bare and covered. This is the best way for him to understand that boys and men come in different shapes, and to have it explained to him that most men with a foreskin can have it either back or forward with no pain. But it is also essential that he should know that he has a problem, as he has already discovered, which can be put right easily when he is of the right age for it to be done. Meanwhile, however, he should leave his foreskin in the forward position.

David is right again to advise not to go into detail about circumcision at this stage, and certainly not with such phrases as “permanently exposing the tender end”. As with other aspects of sex education, the best advice seems to me to be to answer the questions as they arise and in the form they arise, rather than overloading him with information or raising worries that had not occurred to him. The time for full explanations is not until a few weeks before the operation is scheduled – long enough to accept that the time has come, without looking so far ahead that it becomes an unnecessary worry to him. At that stage he should be reminded of the paraphimosis problem, told about circumcision, and encouraged to accept it as the solution. Rather than emphasising that he may look ‘different’, tell him that he is unique, but that like a few other boys, he has a problem which needs correcting.

So what is the best age for him to be cut? Here I think that Mrs B. has already done the right thing by not going ahead now. The age of four is probably the worst possible age, since he is much too young to understand that circumcision is a minor operation only, or that it will heal but only after some days, or that he may look different from his friends, but that some other boys will look the same as him. Indeed it is probably still a problem for him to cope with even having his mother or his father out of sight for long. From the personal experience of myself, my own sons and various acquaintances, my advice would coincide with that of the specialist: wait until the early stages of puberty. By this age he will be old enough to have the operation simply explained to him, and will understand that it is the remedy for the painful and rather alarming condition of paraphimosis which he already knows about. He will know that cuts heal, although taking a little time to do so, and it will not take him long to get over the discomfort of the operation. He will probably also be used to being away from home (perhaps as a cub scout, or staying overnight with a friend, etc) and undressing among strangers. Give him something to look forward to, a week or two after the planned date.

There are two other advantages of this timing, one social and the other physiological. Socially, it may be possible to co-ordinate the timing with a change of school, so that not many of his acquaintances may ask about the change – and his real friends can be told in advance so that they can give him encouragement and sympathy rather than just curiosity after the event. Physiologically, at early puberty his penis will have grown somewhat, making it easier for a competent circumciser to do a good job, but there will still be an important stage of growth ahead, so that the penis can attain its optimum size and shape unconstrained by the foreskin.

I think this answers Mrs M.B.’s questions, but there are two other points which it is important to make. First, if this and the specialist’s advice is followed, to wait about eight years, the boy’s mother and father, and most importantly the boy himself, should know what to do if there is another episode of paraphimosis. Immediate first aid will prevent panic and solve the problem – at least until next time. When it happens, he should sit down calmly (on a chair etc) with his thighs spread, and lean a little forward. Someone (he himself when he is a little older) should then cup one hand inside the other, making a gap between the index and middle fingers of both hands. The penis should be drawn through this gap as much as possible, then gripped by bringing the fingers together. The opposed thumbs should be used to apply very firm and steady pressure to his penis helmet. A couple of minutes should be enough to press much of the blood past the constricting foreskin and back into circulation. The four fingers around the penis shaft can then be used to ease the foreskin forward over the helmet. If this doesn't work first time, try applying the pressure longer and more firmly.

The final point is that if and when the right time comes for him to be circumcised, I would strongly recommend that it be done under local anaesthetic on a day-case basis. This avoids the unpleasant and possibly risky effects of full anaesthetic. Even more importantly, it should be done by an expert in this type of surgery, perhaps contacted through Acorn or The Initiation Society, and not entrusted without further enquiry to a GP or a junior houseman in a hospital, many of whom get their first experience of real surgery by relieving the expert of 'trivial' circumcisions.

More on Mum's Dilemma

Whilst congratulating you on your stand against the intemperate and wounding views expressed by some of our (newly?) circumcision fanatics, I did find two of the letters in Issue 3/94 rather disturbing. The first was a well-written and seemingly authoritative letter from V.Q. strongly urging the lady whose son suffered an occasion of paraphimosis to get him circumcised. Since this advice, from a layman as you point out, runs totally counter to the official medical policy expressed by expert consultants on the subject in the British Medical Journal of January 1993, to the effect that phimosis and paraphimosis hardly ever require circumcision these days, I consider V.Q.'s enthusiasm misplaced and mischievous. It could easily cause the lady – and her son – a whole lot of grief afterwards.

Although some of our readers accept the contention that a human being should have the right of disposal of his (or her) bodily parts, there are some hard-liners still who won't be satisfied until routine infant circumcision is reintroduced in this country, and I think V.Q. might be one of them. It's all very fine to take this view if the child in question grows up like V.Q. and looks on the foreskin as a loathsome and detestable excrescence, but what if he grows up like me, R.B.W., bitterly resenting being deprived of his birthright, and hating his mother for her unfortunate mistake? Surely the answer is to let the boy make his own decision when he's old enough to do so. By that time the problem may have disappeared spontaneously anyway according to the experts.

The second letter also concerns infant circumcision, and this time I cite Anon's second instalment, 'Anxieties', where he details the attitudes of various girlfriends to his circumcised state. Although he implies that he is indifferent to his circumcised penis, he clearly exhibits a characteristic unease and misgiving about it, and cannot fail to have been distressed when the nurse he took out was so dismissive of his circumcised organ, telling him she preferred having a foreskin to play with. The other women in his life seem to have taken the typical feminine attitude of having no opinion. But, in the light of his experience, I found it sad that he should have tried so zealously to get his sons done after securing his wife's collusion, and I applaud the hospital authorities for refusing to circumcise their children for them.

Having said all that, David, I do not think either letter to be offensive enough to suppress, but frankly, a stronger contrary view needs to be put, to clear misinformation in the first instance and to express disquiet in the second.

PS. You mention cavaliers never denigrating a circumcised penis or its owner – with one notable exception. That exception couldn't have been me, could it? I most certainly hope so! Although I could never bring myself to attend one of these get togethers – in my weakened state I could not take the views of some of them – I'd be very interested to know if my views were discussed. I'd be delighted to hear that they cause a stir, because that's the intention!

[Yes, R.B. the exception was you. You'll be sorry to hear that, as far as I know, your views weren't discussed at the meeting.

You'll notice also that I've omitted a couple of your denigrating words, as what's sauce for the goose etc. I'm sure that your points have been put over quite effectively without them. — D.A.]

In Reply to Concerns

I felt that I had to write to set the record straight regarding the concerns expressed by Ray, and hope that you feel able to publish my comments.

I feel that it is appropriate to offer my apologies to anybody distressed by the film clips that I showed in Bournemouth in March. It was not my intention to offend or upset anyone, especially as I am a 'new boy' to the group.

I discussed bringing the film to the event with a number of Acorn members; one having viewed the clips previously. At no time did anybody counsel me against showing it and nobody was required to watch.

The film clips shown were edited sequences from a much longer documentary, but as the group's interest is in circumcision, I showed only the circumcision ceremonies. We were therefore viewing the clips totally out of context to the rest of the film.

My interest in circumcision stems from being in the uncircumcised minority at two English boarding schools. When my mother explained about circumcision to me aged eight, I was fascinated and have been intrigued ever since. I never asked to be 'as the other boys' and have rarely regretted not being circumcised. I respect the feelings of others in what is a very sensitive issue.

If anybody would like to discuss this issue further, then please write to me via Acorn (remember your stamp). Again I am sorry for any concern that I may have inadvertently caused.

And now onto a different topic:-

Hermaphrodites

I found the article by Anon on the above subject (3/94) very interesting. I always intrigued me how hermaphrodites would be treated by the medical profession with regard to circumcision. As the writer indicated, the attitude in the US is to cut first and ask questions afterwards.

Whilst felling the Berlin Wall in 1989, I picked up a German book entitled Sexuelle Welt-Rekorde (Sexual World Records) by Axel Garding. A section of the book is devoted to the above subject. Whilst the text is not very interesting, the photographs are very revealing. There are four photos of hermaphrodites, one a close-up of the genitalia. Three photos show what appear to be removed foreskins, one clitoris or penis is sheathed.

The three subjects who have no foreskins showing all look 'American' without there being definite proof. Two of the subjects appear to be very definitely circumcised. Close inspection with a magnifying glass reveals what appears to be circumcision scars behind the corona sulci. Both penises are flaccid so one cannot be 100% certain. In the third, clothing obscures a view of the shaft, so it is difficult to determine circumcision status. However the glans is most definitely bared.

The article has stimulated me to research this area further. By the time this reply appears in Acorn, I will have visited Amsterdam. An ideal place to conduct research! I shall report back on my return.

If anybody would like to discuss this issue further and in private, please write to me via Acorn.

Come Back Cavaliers

I was sorry to learn about the loss of cavalier members in 3/94, and especially as they feel hurt by comments from us on the other side of the experience. Here is one roundhead who values their contribution, because its only through their descriptions we can begin to imagine what life might have been like for us if we had not been cut. Many of my friends are uncircumcised and I don't regard them as unclean. May I point out their superiority in that they do have the option as long as they have a foreskin, but we don't! Of course, once they cross the divide there's no going back, which, I suspect, persuades a good many to hang on to what nature gave them. Please also bear in mind there have been several scornful comments (some from ladies) on the 'disfigurement' and 'mutilation' of circumcision, which can be just as disconcerting for us snipcocks if we, who didn't have the choice, take it to heart. Both sides of the argument must be members of Acorn because we are strangely imbued with a lifelong curiosity to understand how the other half gained (or kept), and cope with their status. Some of those intact are seeking information about changing it, and the rest of us enjoy an exchange to reinforce our prejudices. Full marks to our editor who, despite his foreskin, seems to be impeccably fair-minded in his effort to maintain a balance of material. We should all support him.

H.L. – Yorks

[Many thanks for your kind remarks, and I hope the point will be taken regarding 'mutilation', etc. — D.A.]

Update Request

With my circumcision rate graphs for the U.K. and U.S.A. sadly out of date, I wonder if anyone could furnish figures for the mid/late 1980s and early 1990s. The comparison between two 'cultures' from this penile modification throughout the century is indeed fascinating, as is the development and techniques improving the safety and final appearance of the operation.

A recent Acorn figure of 20,000 U.K. circumcisions annually, represents about 5% (if the male birthrate remains at 100,000 per year). A lower birthrate would indicate a slight increase in the 5%, suggesting the halting of the continuing decline of decades. What of the introduction of 'preputial plasty', especially in the 4-5 age group?

The American situation must be of continuing decline, under the combined influences of INTACT, BUFF, and the withdrawal of the insurance cover for the routine circumcising of newborn males. Are the main instruments the Gomco clamp, the Mogen shield and the Plastibell, all of which produce haemostasis, unlike the Jewish split shield? Have any new techniques been employed, eg laser circumcising, which is in constant use in Turkey and was even adopted for a 14 year-old haemophiliac immigrant to Israel?

Despite advances in instrumentation, I have encountered very sad insertions in the contact columns of American magazines, many instances indeed of botched circumcisions, headless cocks and bad jobs of cutting. Where miracles of surgery appear almost daily, it is absolutely reprehensible to find examples of partial or complete amputation of the glans. Perhaps it is time that an American – or even universal – standard be devised for non-religious circumcision, which would satisfy the needs of fashion, hygiene, family likeness, and so on, without the possible excess of mutilation. I list four pre-requisites:-

- 1) The technique should be simple, accurate, swift, virtually pain-free and guaranteeing absolute glans integrity.
- 2) Complete haemostasis is essential (from clamp, electro- or laser cautery).
- 3) The frenulum must remain intact, together with adjoining tissue (as is the case with Jewish circumcision).
- 4) Sufficient preputial remnants should remain around the entire glans to allow for future elective restoration by stretching etc. The effect of this 'circumshortening' with an element of possible reversibility would satisfy both parents, and indeed, the baby in due course.

I trust the benefits of my criteria would more than overcome the case for the radical, irreversible, sometimes unsightly clip-job.

Anthony

Paint Jobs

Very few girls these days can expect to see or experience a circumcised penis, so the appeal for women to give their views is unlikely to bear much fruit, except possibly from older women. However, I can perhaps help out, because I was reared as a foster child in a family in which the other children were two boys, both roughly my age, one circumcised and the other intact. I consequently grew up with the problem since it was frequently a matter of discussion by the parents and a source of friction and comparison by the boys. At bath time, mother would often comment on the ragged appearance of the cut boy's organ, and worried in case it might cause trouble in later life. Apparently he had been referred to her GP, by the sister at school, for stretching to relieve slight tightness at the opening. But the doctor, who was known to be an insatiable circumciser, had insisted in having him done there and then, despite the mother's strong reluctance. Consequently, when the second boy proved to have an identical problem, she referred him to a friend in nursing instead, who successfully stretched the skin, over a period of a week or two.

The two boys spent a lot of time arguing over whose cock was the best, and I was frequently brought in as referee. In fact I found both fascinating, but although I did not care for the ragged collar of red skin behind the cut boy's glans, I knew better than to say anything about it. The other bone of contention between them was size. Both boys used to get a rigid erection for my benefit, and every week I was enlisted to measure their vital dimension and record it. The elder boy had a quarter of an inch more than his brother, but this was cancelled out if the younger kept his foreskin forward, because it extended well beyond the glans, even with an erection.

One day when confronted with the two impressive erections which I was invited to admire, I suggested for a lark that I should get the water colours and do a paint job on them. Both thought this a great idea and I went to work with the sort of enthusiasm I'd never shown in art lessons! But this brings me on to the real point of my letter, which is sensitivity. Whereas the circumcised boy was barely aware of the touch of the brush over his bare glans, the uncircumcised lad found it almost impossible to tolerate any brushing over his glans after I had pulled his skin down, and I had to stick to the shaft. His knob certainly looked very different from his brother's, being much shinier and darker, and he got very skittish indeed if I touched it with my bare fingers.

This episode was recalled last summer when I took my new boyfriend Simon for a weekend in a cottage on the side of Cader Idris in Wales with Valerie, a girl at work and her husband, Ian. The weather was hot and after a good lunch we went into the garden with a bottle of wine to sunbathe. Since we were totally secluded, in a haze of contentment and sensuality, I suggested that we strip off and get an overall tan. This was enthusiastically welcomed by my boyfriend and Valerie, less so by her husband, possibly because he'd been very untidily circumcised with a bunch of wrinkled skin hanging down on one side, and felt a bit self-conscious about it. I noted with satisfaction the contrast with the sleek streamlined perfection of Simon's penis with its fully fashioned foreskin extending well beyond the lip.

After a couple of glasses of wine, when we'd got used to seeing each other's family jewels, the conversation turned a bit raunchy, and we each related our first sexual experience. Valerie surprised me by telling a particularly sexy story about how, at the age of fourteen, she had stripped for five boys of the same age in her garage and was caressed to orgasm by them before getting their penises out and making them come each in turn. The tale apparently had a rousing effect on the two guys present, because they both jacked up with monstrous erections! Ian's penis turned out to have a left-hand slew due to the uneven removal of the skin on one side, and was all knobbly; whilst, although Simon's was perfectly symmetrical, it looked menacing with the moist purple glans glaring at us through the tautly stretched ring of foreskin.

Valerie burst into peals of laughter at the two weapons, saying that however impressive a man's stiffy might be, it could never be called beautiful. So I suggested the logical female solution – makeup! And with a lot of hilarity I applied lip gloss, pancake and eyeblush whilst getting Valerie to hold each instrument still whilst I was working on it. I had no trouble at all in brushing it over Ian's circumcised glans, he scarcely seemed to notice it. But when it was Simon's turn I had to tell Valerie to pull his skin back so I could do his knob, and his reaction strongly reminded me of my step-brother's all those years ago. He squirmed like mad at the powerful stimulus of the soft brush moving over his glans and could scarcely bare it.

Later Valerie told me she had problems with Ian's lack of sensitivity, since he was often unable to come at all during intercourse, leaving her sore and him deeply dissatisfied. She said how much he envied Simon his foreskin and said they both wished he hadn't been circumcised.

From my point of view it was evident from the two circumcised organs I have seen that the operations had been very badly done and looked rather unsightly in both cases. I felt some sympathy for Valerie and Ian, and the risk of that alone would be enough to put me off circumcision for any child (or partner) of mine. The lack of sensitivity in comparison with a normal penis was very marked and just went to confirm this view. From my experience, the idea that circumcision has no effect on sensitivity is wrong, and the conflicting idea that lack of sensitivity, in an organ supposed to be sensitive, is an asset, does not measure up to reality.

On Call

It's good to know that BUPA support those seeking information on circumcision with three helplines in their telephone directory of advice on a wide range of health concerns titled, 'BUPA Medical'. For those interested, these are:-

0839 100 037 explains the how and why of circumcising babies.

0839 100 118 talks about circumcision for boys including a short detail of one method.

0839 100 462 discusses circumcision for men.

All accept that some of their members want or need this operation and are mildly encouraging. No doubt the revenue from these calls helps offset the bills they have to pick up from those who proceed. The recordings are changed from time to time and have often been done by female voices, which adds a more interesting dimension.

A year or so ago, S.A.S. (Surgical Advisory Service) advertised an information number on their circumcision. Unfortunately it only ran for a month or two before it was discontinued. It took the form of a question and answer dialogue between an anxious male being pressed by his fiancée to undergo circumcision, and now seeking reassurance from a female nurse at the clinic. She explained the clinical details and result he could expect, and placed quite a bit of emphasis on the aesthetic improvements and how many women prefer the penis to be circumcised. Someone in touch might persuade them to restore it – the recording that is!

0891 172 325 is a circumcision advice line run by The Regents Park Clinic and is much more ambivalent.

Simpler Snip

During my grammar school years I noticed a few in the ranks of the circumcised whose foreskins looked to be just rolled back behind the rim of the glans and not cut short like mine. I became friendly with one of them and we made comparisons. He showed me that his foreskin would roll forward if pushed fairly hard, but recoiled back behind the rim as soon as he let go. The only scarring was not on the foreskin as such, but just below the cleft on the underside of the glans. Here his frenulum appeared to have been cut away and the lower end of it stitched into the shaft below the groove. (He was very embarrassed about this small scar and considered it had spoiled his penis.) I speculate that this was a simpler technique which could be performed at home by the midwife or doctor. Does it also indicate that the purpose of the frenulum is to act as a retaining strap facilitating quick and easy re-hooding after retraction? If removed in infancy, the skin could probably be forced much further down the shaft and left to reshape in rolled form there as its natural place. Presumably by the time the child was old enough to realise what had been done, and through curiosity try to push it forward, it would be too late. Comments from others please.

Ancient Sexist Quote — The Difference

A penis is like an extension, it's like your hand or your arm, it goes outward from you. You are testing things, you probe. Men when they urinate have this arc, they project outward, and they have to learn how to do it. Adulthood is learning how to aim, to focus, to make an arc of transcendence. Women merely water the ground they stand on.

The Squatter's Paradise

Some of the practices/customs detailed below, namely those of male-bonding and nude fishing, pertain only to Rahbi's fishing village, and not elsewhere in Malaya. Remote and difficult of access, it had become proudly insular and retained many of its own pagan customs unknown to the rest of the country despite the incursion of Islam. One had to be a part of this little fishing village society in order to know its practices, and Rahbi was its most representative product. Other villages in the country, where Islam had already taken a stronghold, are much more puritan.

In the village, all the men customarily pee in a squatting position – no different from their womenfolk, and can partly be explained by the fact that many of the houses, especially seaside ones, are constructed of flimsy wood, thatched with palm leaves, and built on stilts. Such houses cannot accommodate heavy furniture, so most of the living is spent either sitting cross-legged or squatting on the matted floor. Also, the Malay sarong, being loose, is a most suitable apparel for squatting. The sarong has no fly and is quite difficult for a man to pee in from a standing position. The sarong should properly be worn without underpants. Only in the squatting posture, with the hem of the sarong drawn back over the knees and thighs, entirely exposing the cock and balls, could a pee be taken freely and comfortably.

To distinguish themselves from their womenfolk, who are naturally shy and seek solitude at their ablutions, a code of macho bravado had evolved among the men. Knees were held wide open so that cocks hung prominently out while squatting. If a man felt the call of nature while in the company of his male friends or relatives, woe to him who seeks a dark secluded corner or turns his back for privacy. He would at once be ridiculed, reprimanded for being a sissy, and ostracised. Word would soon be flying around the village that so-and-so was afraid to show his cock because he didn't have one.

A man was expected to expose his cock and balls to the view of everyone, and pee. Then, even though his cock was a small one, no rude word would be uttered or criticism expressed. He was accepted as one of the pack. Cocks, in this fishing community, were a common possession, shared by all.

The fisherman, when in remote waters, often worked in the nude, a condition made favourable by the hot climate and local superstition. There was a belief that exposing your testicles (a symbol of fertility) to the fishes would ensure a good catch. Men with the biggest and longest scrotums had the honour of casting the first net into the sea. So this was a male bonding society, and male communal nudity was very much a way of life.

Despite being Muslims, the stringent 'mores' of the city Muslims had fortunately failed to affect their innocent, primitive and beautiful way of life. After all, Islamic Law was mainly concerned with governing relationships between men and women, not between men and men.

Having been brought up in this peeing habit from young, shyness was never an issue. One got familiar with every cock in the village. If two or more men were peeing at the same time, they had to squat facing each other, not side by side. Only so would they grow into a community of naked fishermen, sharing together their bodies, their labour, and their fruits of toil. That such tight male-bonding sometimes overlapped into homosexuality or bisexuality was quietly accepted as part of life, and looked upon with some indulgence.

Rahbi was the perfect example of this upbringing, completely unembarrassed by his body. Displaying his cock to other males was a sign of good friendship, and if sex followed, it was a bonus. There were no hang-ups.

I well remember the following incident. All over the Far East, where the variety of cuisine is magnificent, there are eating stalls by the roadside where people either sit on low stools or squat to eat.

Late one night, Rahbi and I were the last customers at such a stall. Besides us two there were three other men at the stall, gulping down their last morsels. We had been drinking heavily earlier on and all of a sudden Rahbi urgently felt the call of nature. There was no time to look for a secluded spot, and the stall would soon move off anyway, so he decided to relieve himself there and then. Instead of turning his back to the vendor and the three men, Rahbi, perhaps prompted by his male bonding instinct, faced them squarely, drew back his sarong, and exposing his cock directly to their view, proceeded to pee.

The country being multi-racial, with a large percentage of ethnics, it was no surprise that the vendor and the others were all ethnic non-Malays and thus non-Muslims, which implied that they were all probably very much foreskinned men. Oriental men, unless Muslims, do not circumcise, for cosmetic, sexual or other non-religious reasons as the English or Americans often do, only rarely for medical reasons. However, there is a far greater amount of foreskin retraction (worn permanently), or even naturally short foreskins among Far Eastern men, than Europeans, who usually wear their prepuces full length.

But I digress. The four presumably foreskinned men, suddenly treated to the sight of Rahbi's enormous circumcised black glans, were all overcome by excitement and curiosity, and, forsaking decorum, gathered around him, squatting in a semi-circle for a close intimate scrutiny. A swift exchange of giggles and ribald jokes followed.

As Rahbi was finishing, one of the men stretched out his hand and gripped Rahbi's giant black glans tightly around the corona, saying he had never seen a Malay's "cut cock" before, adding tactlessly that it looked like a bull's penis. He felt all around the corona and sulcus for traces of any retracted foreskin but found none, and realised that this was what circumcision meant – the removal of the entire hood. He also expressed surprise, when massaging the glans, to find it so completely desensitised.

The other three men followed suit, gripping and rubbing, in search of his foreskin. Not stopping there, they squeezed his tiny balls, stroked his perineum, and even fingered his anus, to all of which, squatting throughout, he uttered not a single word of protest.

After they had done, Rahbi's cock resembled a fireman's spent giant rubber hose. Though not an orgasm, the teasing had made his loins heave in rhythmic spasms, and short spurts of pee continued shooting out. Though not fully erect, his glans had engorged, looking like a sheep's heart, and his almost non-existent shaft had elongated a tiny fraction, pushing the glans from between his thighs.

I had often wondered how he managed to carry this massive cock head between his thighs without damaging it, and he admitted that certain sitting positions, knees crossed etc. were uncomfortable for him. However, it was the size of his glans that made the squatting posture more comfortable to pee from. When standing in trousers to pee, he would often dig inside his fly only to find his cock stuck between his thighs and obstructed by his stomach paunch. With much difficulty, he would have to grip it by the corona, tug hard at it a few times before it would even peep halfway out of his fly. Then he had to aim carefully, lest, due to lack of penile shaft, his pee would dribble and trail down his trousers instead.

That his own physiological condition favoured the squat-to-pee posture, and that his village male-bonding custom demanded it, was fortunate coincidence indeed.

The indelicate matter of defecation necessitates a passing mention. Religious custom forbids the use of toilet paper by Malay Muslims. Soap and water must always be employed. In public places it can be very inconvenient.

The more luxurious places, hotels, restaurants etc., usually have a bidet in the toilet cubicle for the use of Muslim guests, but the cheaper, common public places simply supply a tub of water with bucket and ladle. In the latter case, the person squats with buttocks slightly raised, like a frog, and ladles water into the crevice of the parted 'cheeks'. It was a habit requiring much practice.

After my symbolic circumcision, which will be published shortly, I was given a long list of instructions pertaining to sexual habits and bodily cleanliness. The primary requisites, that of keeping my foreskin permanently retracted and shaving my pubic and armpit hair, I've observed to this day. The local Imam was equally adamant on the non-use of toilet paper, arguing that the anus, being such an important orifice, could only be properly cleaned with soap and water. In my own home, with proper toilet facilities, I could manage to do it, but living abroad renders it difficult, and London's measly bed-sits, with communal toilets make it impossible, so I've had to regrettably forgo the habit.

There were also rules regarding self-abuse. Masturbation, though not encouraged, was permissible in moderation (it was regarded as a useful pre-marriage outlet and a necessary evil). However, there were ways of masturbating less offensive to Allah. Again, water should be at hand to wash away this somewhat shameful deed, so it is usually done in the bathroom. The Malay Muslim first strips completely, to enable himself to wash from head to toe immediately after the act. He then turns his back to Mecca reciting some Koran phrases, and calling upon Allah to forgive him this human weakness. Regulation demands that his masturbatory posture be as punitive and uncomfortable as possible, and for this reason, all Imams prescribe the squatting position. So, squatting down, he is finally free to take his cock in hand.

Even at this point there were restrictions. Semen, the seed of future generations, and therefore sacred, should not be spilled on the ground and wantonly wasted. It should be re-absorbed into the body by either of two methods. He should either ejaculate into a cup and then drink it, or, if he found this difficult or impossible (due to the fact that most men find their own semen distasteful after orgasm when the libido has subsided), he may rub his semen all over his body to signify that it has been re-absorbed, prior to washing off. The second method, according to Rahbi, was the most commonly used.

However, masturbation being such a personal matter, it was doubtful whether all devotees followed the instructions to the letter, though I'm sure most of them tried.

Before closing, a mention should be made of the Australian Aborigines. It is well known that the men practice ritual sub incision, the cutting open of the entire urethral passage on the underside of the penis, from the meatus to the scrotum, which renders the penis entirely useless as an instrument of peeing. Thereafter, they squat and let their pee trickle down along their scrotums which must always be wet and salty.

The famous British fashion designer, Hardy Amies, revealed in an interview on health, that he squats on the toilet to defecate, a habit learnt during a holiday in Indonesia, which method removes all impurities from the bowels.

The Male Multiple Orgasm

It was once thought that a man automatically ejaculated once he reached orgasm. Unless a man couldn't produce semen because of genetic or surgical reasons, doctors felt it was an automatic response. But now scientists in America believe some men are capable of multiple non-ejaculatory orgasms in the same way as women. In laboratory tests, non-ejaculatory orgasms, ie spasms of ultimate sexual pleasure that registered in the prostate, pelvic and anal muscles, were recorded in 12% of the 282 men taking part in the trial. However, no research exists as yet in the UK to back up these claims. Sex therapist Sue Pallenberg of the London Institute of Human Sexuality said, "I have heard of this being reported and researched in America, but I must say I have never met a multi-orgasmic man."

Gym Class Upset — Daily Mirror 3/2/94.

Hunky Dave Hart has been banned from an aerobic class – because he's too well developed. The 'Linford Christie' bulge in his skin-tight exercise outfit puts the women off their stroke. And now he's been told to cover it up or face the chop.

The manager of the leisure centre at Bognor Regis said yesterday, "I've had a lot of complaints from my lady customers that it is indecent. This is a family centre and I can't let anyone offend other customers."

But photographer Dave, 35, said, "What am I supposed to do – trim it off a bit?"

Editorial

This edition has an accent on women who nowadays are becoming more and more outspoken on sexual matters and preferences. I know that quite a few members take a great interest in the female views. From the material that we get it is obvious that, in general, American women are in favour of circumcision and British women in favour of foreskins. I would imagine that this shows, like all other things in life, that people are happy with the familiar. In fact, I think if a survey had been conducted in 1930, both American and British women may have had reversed preferences.

To enable me to collate the requested update of the penis survey and to make it complete, I would ask all those who haven't returned a questionnaire to please do so. There is a questionnaire enclosed with this edition to those from whom I haven't received one. It only takes a few minutes to complete, can be signed anonymous if wished, and costs only a second class stamp.

In Acorn, everyone is interested in everyone else and their views, just like you are as you read this, and

Acorn can only stay alive by contributions from all members. So I would ask the recently joined members especially, if they would take a little time to write in a letter beginning, "I joined Acorn because...", or "Circumcision (or foreskins) are of absorbing interest to me because...". We would all be most interested to hear from you, and of course, again you can be anonymous if you wish.

Experiencing the Difference

I thought my experiences may be of interest to your readers. I'm a female in my thirties, still happily married to a roundhead after twelve years, but I do have a secret cavalier lover these last five. He lives many miles away and we meet for sex on an occasional basis when my work takes me near his home. I have two boys aged 9 and 11. The older one is circumcised. The younger one still has his foreskin.

Both men in my life have penises pretty much the same average size, slack or firm, (measured against my hand). This is surprising considering my husband is taller by six inches or so and is of broad athletic build, whereas my other man is finer boned and slim. Hubby, circumcised as a toddler, has a large chubby glans and very little skin left behind the glans even when flaccid. With an erection this skin is completely absorbed in the shaft and the rim of his knob is very pronounced, which feels particularly good when he's inside me. In the groove down the underside there is just a faint scar where his frenulum was snipped away, and this ends in small lumpy stitch marks about half an inch below the tip edge. He loves me to bring him off by hand, but it often takes a long time, and my fingers start to ache. In intercourse he definitely lasts a lot longer, but his technique is more aggressive, and when he thrusts hard I can get a pain as he pushes against the end of my vagina. The contours of his bell end can be felt quite distinctly in certain positions.

Lover boy is a total contrast. His weapon is much more delicate and sensitive – in fact I've had to relearn all my handling technique as I really hurt him the first time in bed. I'd never pulled back a man's skin before, and in my eagerness yanked it down far too far and hard. This made him yelp, halted the proceedings and started my re-education. His frenulum is short and tight and his foreskin is long and overhangs the end quite a bit, even when erect. Because of this it forms a piled-up bunch when drawn back to the base of his glans, and this shields the rim. It also won't stay back without being held there, and moves backwards and forwards over the knob during sex. Masturbating him is easy, and intercourse is altogether a more gentle affair. During sex, the situation with him is reversed, so that I am the one who can hurt if I grip or squeeze too hard with my vaginal muscles. Once I nearly split his frenulum by using the woman on top position! He prefers to keep his glans moist and doesn't care for me to finger it due to acute sensitivity. Mention of the very word 'circumcision' makes him shudder.

Immediately after our marriage I went out with my husband to work overseas in a developing country and I soon became unintentionally pregnant. Our first boy was born in an old colonial hospital where I gathered circumcision was routine for all males. They just told me that my son would be “cut on Thursday” along with the others. Being young, inexperienced, and married to a man who was, I accepted this and had no thoughts to object. Afterwards I often wondered if anyone ever did.

It was a very different story back in England when our second son was born. As nothing concerning circumcision had transpired or been mentioned by the time our discharge was imminent, I asked for him to be done, and ran into an unexpected storm of reaction as to how absurd and barbaric it was. This led to my feeling confused, and I never had the courage to pursue the matter, even when the younger son asked questions and went through a phase of wanting to be like his brother. The elder son also quizzed me quite a bit when he discovered he was not like other boys, and I've never been able to offer him an adequate explanation. I fell into the trap of saying it was better for him “to be like his Dad”, but this brings the immediate question of why not the younger one as well?

I write all this, not because I think that one penis type is better than the other, but I do think that it makes them very, very different... and I wouldn't wish to choose between them. Variety is the spice of life and as a woman I'm delighted that I've had the best of both worlds. I would like to see all women have that option, and think that that could arise by allowing all those who wished to have their sons circumcised, to do so as a matter of routine. Many would be pleased to do it, but lots would opt out, so pushing the circumcised numbers up far more than they are now. Women of the world, let's lobby for it and return to the days when housewives had a choice!

Religion and Acorn

I may have given the wrong impression with my remarks about religion in 2/94. Circumcision and religion are far too closely related not to be a part of our forum. What I objected to was the intolerance that religions seem to bring out in human beings. It's generally said that the more we know about other cultures and their customs the more tolerant we are of them. The next letter brings out most of these points.

Fiqh

Yes, I know you stated that you would rather not have letters regarding the religious aspect of circumcision, so if you do not want to put in this contribution I shall quite understand and won't be offended in any way.

I would however like to know just what is in 'Fiqh'. I have a few books on Islam and also a number of Muslim friends. I have discussed circumcision with a selected few of them, but have never heard 'Fiqh' mentioned by them, or seen it mentioned in the books.

The piece by Y.A.I.M.L. in 2/94 prompts me to ask, "Why is possessing a foreskin a filthy state?" As this is how God/Allah designed and created the male form, it seems rather like saying that he made a mistake in so doing, and, to a religious person, would be something of an insult, if not blasphemous.

As far as having the courage of his convictions, well, it doesn't take much courage if you are doing what everyone else does. World history is full of stories of persecution of those who dare to question and challenge long-established beliefs, customs and practices. No wonder that those who behave like thinking people, as God/Allah created us, instead of like robots by toeing the party line, have to be wary.

However, perhaps Y.A.I.L.M. would kindly tell us exactly what 'Fiqh' says regarding circumcision, and then we can judge for ourselves.

Another re Religion

I was born into a progressive reform Jewish family, and circumcision was one of those subjects which was always being discussed. In general, reform Jews question the necessity of circumcising in this day and age. Arguments tend to stress that it's an archaic rite which has no place in this day and age, and is both cruel and unnecessary. That being said, most reform Jews conform to the custom, albeit reluctantly. However, according to the minutes of a circumcision seminar in the US a couple of years back, there are a number of Jewish families there (and now increasingly in this country) who have given up circumcision altogether, and you can find areas in the States where nearly all the gentiles are circumcised and only the reformed Jews have foreskins. Just imagine! This of course is considered by the more orthodox as an outrage. But then, a lot of them don't consider the reform movement to be real Jews at all.

I remember when my brother was circumcised, I and mum waited in the next room, and when she heard him screaming (it does hurt, despite what the apologists say) she burst into tears and vowed that no son of hers would go through the ordeal ever again. She was as good as her word, and when my second brother came along the protesting in-laws were firmly told there would be no further circumcisions in our family. And so, Junior was equipped with that unfamiliar sprig of skin which most Jews view with horror, envy, or in the case of the women, a lot of curiosity. Certainly at first Mum and I couldn't take our eyes off it in the bath.

One of the things which really worry the Jewish community in UK these days is the number of Jews of both sexes who marry out of the faith and who then find it convenient to forget their heritage, neglecting the ordinances of kashrus (diet) and bris milah (circumcision). As a consequence, observing Jews tend to restrict their social contacts to within the Jewish community, especially if they have children coming up to marriageable age. My parents, who were active in local politics, tended to mix with all and sundry and allowed me and my brothers to play with local children irrespective of class or creed.

It is a fact that, up to puberty at least, girls tend to be more interested in sexual matters than boys, and are more likely to initiate sexual activities. This was certainly the case with me – I have always had a very powerful sex drive, and still do. In fact my marriage broke down precisely because of disappointment with my husband's indifferent sexual response, and lack of consideration for my sexual demands. But at the age of ten my sexual curiosity was insatiable, and I was forever wheedling my young boyfriends to allow me to explore their willies, or else took matters into my own hands by putting my hands inside their trousers. Quite a lot of them found my attentions unacceptable and I used to feel really put down when a boy refused my request to let me examine his penis. But quite a few others were flattered by my attentions and were only too happy to oblige.

Having been brought up since infancy with circumcision being frequently discussed in family circles, and hearing Mother making excuses for allowing Junior to keep his foreskin (as much for her own benefit as anyone else's; she admitted to me later that she suffered agonies of guilt about not observing the Law, despite her strong contrary convictions), my first goal in sexual exploration was to carry out a foreskin survey. I had a burning desire to know if a boy I became acquainted with had a foreskin or not, and if at first he refused my request for a demonstration, I'd resort to spying on him whilst he was taking a pee to find out his penile status.

To a Jewish girl – and we were still observant, despite our progressive views – there is something deliciously forbidden and naughty about foreskins, and I became an absolute glutton in my desire to look and touch. I knew what they looked like because of Junior, but he was only a baby and his offering was too tiny to be of interest. Some of my young boyfriends though, were on the point of puberty and sported organs of quite impressive dimensions. A few of course were circumcised, but since this was the norm for us they lacked the attraction of the forbidden, and I lost interest in a boy as soon as I saw a bare acorn. But if he had a nice long foreskin, that was another story altogether!

My interest in the foreskinned penis extended to all possible permutations of feel and function. I found the tip of a long foreskin incredibly soft and elastic, and enjoyed pulling it forward as far as it would stretch to watch it snap back in position again when I let go. What turned me on most though, was to get a boy all stiff and excited and then stretch his foreskin back so as to see his raw-looking knob before pushing it forward again. This was particularly rewarding if his foreskin was tight and caused the lad a sexual jolt as the restricted opening was forced over the swollen knob. I was also fascinated to see how a loose foreskin tip straightened out and swelled slightly as a jet of urine was expelled.

When I finally reached adulthood I had a pretty good knowledge of the subject, and three of my first four sexual partners were uncircumcised. Finally though, the call of five thousand years of history proved irresistible, and I married a reformed Jew like myself and he conformed to the Jewish covenant, having been circumcised as ordained. Now that I am divorced I am currently living with a non-Jew who is uncircumcised, but have no plans to marry him – I still hanker to marry within the faith. The one thing that gives me cause for hesitation though, is the same dilemma that faced my mum. If I eventually have a boy-child, should I have him circumcised? My experience tells me that it's unnecessary, but the call of religion is hard to resist.

American Female Preference

Compuserve is an American computer information service. The following is taken from a Human Sexuality Conference on Compuserve.

Question:- I'm a 20-year-old circumcised male. I know there's some controversy about circumcision, but I don't want to get into that. I just want to know whether most women prefer circumcised (I hope) or uncircumcised penises.

Answer:- You're lucky. Research suggests that women prefer circumcised penises. So concluded researchers at the University of Iowa after surveying 269 women who had recently delivered healthy boys. Fully 89% of the infants were circumcised. Previous studies have shown that mothers more than fathers usually determine whether or not to have their sons circumcised.

The researchers found that mothers are likely to have their sons circumcised because they prefer their own sex partners to have a circumcised penis.

Says primary author and principal investigator Associate Professor Marvel Williamson of the University of Iowa College of Nursing, "Female cultural preferences for penile circumcision in sexual partners widely influence American mothers' decision on infant male circumcision."

Preferred for Sexual Activity:- The researchers believe that their study "clearly supports the hypothesis that American women prefer circumcision for sexual reasons."

"Visual appeal and sexual hygiene were predominant reasons for favouring circumcised partners," says Williamson, "but tactile, naturalness, and other sense-related factors were reasons for the women's attitudes."

The researchers found that:- Between 71% and 83% of the women in the study prefer a circumcised penis for various sexual activities. Even among women who had sexual experience only with uncircumcised partners, only half preferred uncircumcised penises.

71% prefer a circumcised penis for sexual intercourse.

76% find the visual appearance of a circumcised penis more appealing.

75% prefer to manually stimulate a circumcised penis.

83% prefer a penis to be circumcised for fellatio.

92% believe a circumcised penis stays cleaner.

90% say a circumcised penis looks sexier.

85% say a circumcised penis feels nicer to the touch.

77% say a penis looks more natural when it is circumcised.

Visit to America

A couple of years ago, when Forum still printed material on circumcision, I remember being surprised at the number of letters in support of it, when most of my friends were either against it or couldn't care less, knowing nothing about it. One got the impression that most of the men readers would prefer to be circumcised, presumably because they thought women would prefer them that way. I cannot believe that this is really the case.

I recently returned from America where I and my two young sons were the guests of an American family, and was extremely unimpressed by what I saw of the operation, never having seen a circumcised penis up to then. Although the family were aware of the anti-circumcision movement in California and more or less accepted their arguments, long-standing custom and GP pressure decreed that all males in the family should be circumcised.

I had no idea what to expect and was curious when I first saw the family's son undressed. His penis had a raw and traumatised look about it with a ragged flap of red skin on one side, and a tight, sore-looking area of stretched tissue on the other. I thanked my lucky stars that the whole practice had become discredited in the UK and that both my boys had perfect little penises with nice long foreskins.

But what I found particularly interesting was the contrasting attitudes of my two American hosts to my sons' foreskins. Unbelievably, neither of them had ever seen a normal penis complete with foreskin before, and the husband made it quite clear that he didn't want to, seeming uncomfortable at the sight. It was as though he preferred to think that the circumcised state was the normal one, and he didn't like being confronted with the fact that he and his son were deficient in a part of their anatomy. The wife on the other hand reckoned that my boys' foreskins were "real cute" once she'd discovered that they merely harboured a little moisture and not the evil-smelling residue she'd been led to expect. She compared my boys' penises favourably with her own son and made it quite clear that no more males in her family would be circumcised.

Tried All Ways

In a way I am, I suppose, unusual inasmuch as I have enjoyed all three conditions – uncircumcised, partial circumcision and complete circumcision.

I am 50 years old and have been married for 25 years. I first became conscious of my foreskin when I was about 5 or 6 years old, when I forced it back to expose the glans. As I got older the foreskin became loose, but it would never go back on its own, even when I became erect.

I was quite young when I found out that my penis was different from my cousins' – even then I was aware that their penises were nicer to look at.

When I was about 20, a girlfriend whose brothers were all circumcised was amazed when she saw my foreskin. As far as she was concerned she was very pro-circumcision, making the point that the penis was neater to look at.

I tried for years to get a doctor to perform the operation, but it was impossible to get it done. I used to work away from home a lot both here and in the UK. In every town and city that I went to I would try for a doctor to do it for me.

When I got married I found that when I used condoms my foreskin would come forward over my glans and tear the condom. During oral sex, my wife would keep the foreskin covering the glans, which wasn't very pleasurable. I also came very quick when having intercourse or masturbating.

Then I inflicted a 'rash' on my foreskin, and kept the 'rash' going in spite of creams, etc. prescribed by the doctor. Eventually I was sent to hospital where they only cut off half of my foreskin – which did not make any difference.

After about 2 years I had a full circumcision by a Harley St. surgeon. It took only about 45 minutes and I am really delighted with the results. My wife also likes the look of my circumcised penis, both when it is soft but more so when erect. As far as I'm concerned I would like to summarise as follows:-

1. Uncircumcised:-

Foreskin generally a nuisance, always the need to wash. I found it necessary to wash my glans (for most of the time) twice a day. Sex in general, the foreskin got in the way. Be it oral, normal sex or masturbation I feel that the foreskin got in the way.

2. Partial Circumcision:-

Not much of a difference – oral sex did improve but everything else was much the same except for appearance. In my case my glans was partially covered when soft, and unlike before, what was left of the foreskin would roll back when I became erect.

3. Full Circumcision:-

As far as I'm concerned it is a must for every man. In my case there was a huge increase in pleasure in all aspects of my sex life. I can keep up intercourse for 10 to 15 minutes even after a long session of oral sex and foreplay. My wife has enjoyed sex much more since I had the full circumcision. I have had to learn new ways of masturbating – as I can keep going for a long while without coming. My wife has learned new ways to do it for me, and in all cases the pleasure is more intense.

When I attended the Harley St. clinic I didn't know that it was possible to have a 'radical' circumcision. Had I known about it I think I should have had it done.

Smells

I am not a member of Acorn so I don't know how much right I've got to send you this. A friend of mine is a member and I peek at every opportunity at his copies of your newsletter, unbeknown to him, so I'm not giving my name as I don't want him to know I'm that sneaky. Anyway, if you don't publish it, you don't, but it is a subject I know a good bit about.

The subject of smells seems to be rubbing a lot of people up the wrong way lately. Now, I'm a bit of an old queen and I've had my fair share of 'feasting', so I've come across a good deal in the way of smells, but no one else seems to have got to the root of it.

I've seen a good bit of smegma in my time and although it is paste-like in substance, in fact it hasn't got more than a bland smell, which I don't mind.

The big smell is actually stale body-heated cum, caused mostly by circumstances and not because of dirtiness. Like this for instance. You go to bed at night and indulge in some sort of sex, either a wank or anything else, especially with a condom when cum gets all over your cock, and drop off to sleep without washing your cock. If the room, the bed, or yourself get rather hot during the night, in the morning your cock smells a quite distinct smell. If you oversleep and have to rush to get to work and don't wash it then, by the time you get round to it, it really smells. Now here's the rub. As soon as you put hot water and soap to it then, the smell's – oh, it's bloody awful. And what's more, the washing doesn't take the smell away. It must get into the pores and wrinkles as you shrink.

In my experience, those with foreskins come off much worse with this, but it still happens with the circumcised. I was cut as a baby and always have a bunched up collar of skin behind the glans when I'm soft, and it's happened to me. I've also had faint whiffs from radically cut cocks. Talking to a bi friend about it, he told me that women suffer from it after non-condom sex, but they seem to have a self-cleansing system built in (I wouldn't know anything about that!).

I haven't read all your newsletters, which I really enjoy by the way, but I've never seen this mentioned before. Does everyone know it but too embarrassed to say it?

Letter from American Forum

Although I was never embarrassed by the appearance of my cock, I often fantasised about what it would be like to be circumcised. Every time I jacked off I thought about circumcision. I would fold my foreskin back and hold it that way while looking at my cock. It wasn't much, but for a minute or two I was 'circumcised'. Finally, when I was 27 I got up the courage and had a real circumcision.

The thing that surprised me most about it was the increase in sensation. My shaft felt tighter and harder when erect, and even my balls felt more sensitive. I was so excited about having a circumcised cock that my sexual pleasure was greatly increased. It may sound weird to you, but for a long time, whenever I was making love to my wife, all I could think about was my newly circumcised cock. I would close my eyes and picture the way it looked slamming in and out of her pussy and mouth. Knowing that my penis was circumcised suddenly became about the best thing about sex for me. Even my orgasms were more intense than ever before.

Needless to say, my wife has also benefited from my operation. She was apprehensive about it at first, but now is ecstatic with the results. She loves the look and feel of my circumcised cock and she has commented on more than one occasion that it's as though she has an entirely new penis with which to pleasure herself. In addition, she also reaps the benefit of a husband who has rediscovered his enthusiasm for sex.

Young Fun

I was a girl of the swinging sixties. Every Saturday night we used to descend on the local dancehall, dance away until 11pm and then round the evening off being 'planked' or touched up on the rec close by.

During the week I and my girlfriends used to compare notes when we met up at the club and I can tell you the talk was pretty steamy! In those days a minority of the boys we met were circumcised (although a lot more than there are nowadays) and circumcision often formed the subject of our conversations. It was – and still is – a matter of deep curiosity to most girls, and we all formed our own ideas and preferences about it. The first priority for me on leaving the dance and heading for the rec was to find out if my new friend was 'peeled' or not, and this curiosity was often considered shockingly 'forward' by the boys when they found their todger being whipped out and examined without so much as a by-your-leave. A lot of our group were nurses from the RUH who declared circumcision was no longer considered desirable and was not practised nowadays, and this expert knowledge coloured our views on it. As far as I was concerned, once it went stiff there was no difference looking at it, but when handling it you had to be careful not to be rough with an unpeeled one after the skin was pulled back. Having said that, my view was then – and still is today – that a foreskin can be a hell of a lot of fun, since it offers so much more variety in what you can do with it. I find the undivided attention of a guy as he watches you concentrate on peeling his hampton, and the gasp as you ease the tight ring of his foreskin over the sensitive tip, very flattering, and it still turns me on more than any other sexual activity. Although I also enjoy handling a guy with a bare acorn, it does look a bit pale and dry compared to the deep threatening purple of the mysterious hidden gland, and the excitement of peeling it bit by bit is missing, although once the game of 'sink the sausage' is under way it is difficult to choose between them.

For preference I like a bloke to have a foreskin long enough to keep his knob covered, stiff or floppy, with a bit to spare until it's time to peel him.

I'd always been aware of circumcision since it was so widely practised among my generation of course, although I had no brothers of my own to satisfy my curiosity on. As a pushy ten year old though, I was able to get some of the boys in our group to produce their winkles for inspection, and the reluctant ones were given plenty of encouragement. One particular boy who was uncircumcised pretended not to want to and I got a real kick out of provoking his erection by getting the others to pinion his arms while I tickled him until he was helpless, pulled his willy out and uncovered his tip. (I suppose it's this sort of thing which helps form a girl's preferences in later life because, as stated, I always thereafter found it very arousing to pull a foreskin back). The others watched in fascination as his penis swelled and lengthened into an erection, and another girl who was watching, took a piece of Mars bar out of her mouth and smeared the chocolate all over the boy's bare knob, then pulled his foreskin back over it. The boy was rather worried and there were still traces of it three days later when he showed me it in answer to my enquiry. All it needed though was a quick wipe with a flannel, but personal hygiene was not given too much thought in those days.

The loos in the dancehall were totally inadequate and there was always a queue of desperate girls outside with their legs crossed wetting themselves for a pee. I always went knickerless, so it was easy for me to nip outside, find a suitable spot, and take a standing widdle without anyone noticing, but it has to be said that, unlike the lady reported in your recent edition, I frequently wet my leg and filled a shoe despite frantic manoeuvring with the fingers to try and avoid it. I never let it worry me though – I soon dried off in the heated atmosphere of the dancehall, and a quick puff with the atomiser ensured that all remained fresh.

There was a report recently that American women, sorely graunched at male dominance in general, and at being unable to achieve sexual equality, and equal convenience in the serious matter of peeing standing up in particular, are now able to buy a gadget coyly named "La funelle". This is just what it sounds like, a small(ish) funnel made of plastic which is shaped to enable it to be slipped up the knicker leg and into the vulva, where it is held in place by the inner lips over the urethra. The woman is then free to pee with the same confidence, accuracy and inconspicuousness as a man, with the associated pride and achievement in the performance of a job well done.

I realise that some people might find my revelations surprising, coming from a woman, since we are supposed to maintain a facade of decorum at all times. But you should be aware that times are changing! Everyone now knows that women have strong sexual instincts, often stronger than men's. Women are publishing their own sex magazines, and books on women's sexual fantasies are now best-sellers. Women behave far worse than men nowadays at male strip shows and a total lack of inhibition becomes ever more evident.

So it should come as no surprise that the fair sex is now no longer too shy to discuss taboo matters like their preference in penile fashion and indelicate facts about ladies taking a leak – everyone knows they do it, so why shouldn't they talk about it?

But to return to the original subject, I do enjoy reading the letters about foreskins and circumcision, and I'm sure if the Acorn publication was available over the counter you'd find a lot of women buying it. How about making it more available generally?

Dawn Mitchell – London

The Organ

In recent issues of her publication The Organ, Tuppy Owens has given us mentions under the heading 'Body Shape and Genital Concerns' as below:-

"Acorn has become a smarter little publication. Members met for a weekend at the end of March for a get-together, taking over an entire hotel in Bournemouth. Their newsletter doesn't say what they got up to, but the newsletter articles are about retraction of foreskins, women pissing standing up, and cock shape.

"Acorn continues to be a lively discourse, including letters on women's peeing positions. It's beautiful to observe men valuing their cocks and bits, the way women are just learning to love their pussies – good on you guys."

We owe you many thanks, Tuppy. Are we really as exotic and erotic as you make us sound?

D.A.

Fiction

I would like to suggest an idea which I have been mulling over for some time. It is on the fiction side, so it would be a break with the traditions of Acorn. But I have been wondering whether you would be interested if I wrote stories based on a circumcision clinic. The idea is that there would be one story per issue based on a patient visiting the clinic. The only thing that I should warn is that, since I am in favour of circumcision, very few patients would emerge from the clinic with their foreskins intact.

I also thought it would be possible for other Acorn readers to become involved if they wished. This could happen in two different ways. Any member who wanted to could suggest a scenario himself, or a problem which a patient attending the clinic might have. I would then write up the suggestion into a story. Secondly, any member who wanted to could take over as a locum doctor for an issue, submitting their own story which I would be pleased to edit for you. If of course they were anti circumcision they could cause chaos by sending all the patients away as not being in need of treatment! Seriously though, it would be a way of getting others involved in the scheme.

The Clinic

1. The Beginning

Dr. Bishop walked over to the examination couch where his patient was lying waiting for his check-up. The Doctor had circumcised Wayne three months before and this was a final look to make sure that healing was complete.

Wayne had had a typical case of phimosis. He had come into the surgery one evening, very embarrassed, and, with a red face and much hesitation, explained that it hurt when he made love. An examination had quickly revealed an elephant trunk foreskin extending well beyond the tip of his penis, and too tight to be withdrawn. The only remedy was circumcision, and the Doctor had no hesitation in recommending the operation. He had long ago realised that the local hospital waiting list for this sort of operation was indefinite, and over the last couple of years had been doing such minor surgery himself. So it was, that late one afternoon, Wayne had returned to the surgery and the Doctor had removed his foreskin swiftly and efficiently.

Now the Doctor examined his handiwork. He picked up Wayne's penis and gently rotated it, looking all round the circumcision line. Although a three-month check was not really necessary and he rarely found any cause for concern, nevertheless, he preferred still to carry it out. When he had last seen Wayne two months ago the remnants of the inner foreskin were still very puffed, and the circumcision scar very red looking. Now the whole thing had settled down and he was pleased with the result. The glans was well exposed and, whilst still leaving the frenulum in place, he had trimmed the skin sufficiently so that there was little bunching underneath.

"Well, Wayne, have there been any problems?"

"None, Doctor, it all seems fine now."

"How's the sensitivity now?" Wayne had commented the last time how sensitive his glans was now that it was uncovered for the first time.

"That's OK as well. I still notice it a bit, but it's not painful like it was at first." The Doctor brushed his finger gently across Wayne's glans. The boy shivered. But two months before he had almost hit the roof when the Doctor had done the same thing. Obviously the glans was now used to its permanently exposed state.

"And what about intercourse?"

Wayne went very red. "There's no problem there now. No pain at all."

"The skin doesn't feel too tight? There's no pull?" Even though he knew how elastic the penile skin was, it was always Dr. Bishop's fear that the skin of the circumcised penis would not stretch enough.

"No, it's much better than before. I'm really grateful for you doing the operation and sorting it out."

"Good. Everything seems fine. If you would like to get dressed now, you can disappear."

Wayne pulled on his jeans. "Can I ask you something, Doctor?"

"Of course."

"Well, it's my sister's boyfriend. He knew I'd had the operation and we were talking about it. He hasn't been circumcised and he's got a long foreskin, but he says he prefers the look of a circumcised... penis. He wonders whether you'd do the operation for him."

"Is he a patient of mine?"

"I don't think so."

"Well, I can't really help then. Firstly, it wouldn't be right to treat another doctor's patient; and secondly, the medical profession doesn't believe in circumcision except for medical reasons."

"He'd be willing to pay if that's the trouble."

"That's not really the problem, although the NHS doesn't cover routine circumcision. Just today, for instance, I turned down the request of one of my patients who wanted his baby boy circumcised."

"Does that mean if I got married and we had a baby, you wouldn't circumcise him?"

"I'm afraid not, unless there was a medical reason."

"But I think that's really unfair, that he might have to go through what I've gone through. Anyway, you told me I'd be much better off circumcised, so you must think it's a good thing."

"That's true. But I have to take into account the balance of medical opinion."

“Why? It’s people that count. If you think men are better off being circumcised, and they want it done, why can’t you just do it without worrying about other doctors? I bet they don’t worry about you.”

Dr. Bishop looked thoughtfully at Wayne. The young man’s argument was appealing. It was true that he was in favour of neo-natal circumcision, influenced partly by the fact that he himself had had to be circumcised at the age of sixteen, and partly because he knew from personal experience the benefits that circumcision brought. But he had bowed to current medical opinion and had always refused to undertake circumcisions unless there was a definite medical indication. But Wayne was right. The patient should come first. It was the baby boys who were disadvantaged through not being circumcised, not the other doctors. If he was really concerned about his patients, he would follow his own conscience and inclinations, not those of other doctors.

He looked up to find Wayne standing there looking rather confused.

“No, Wayne, you are quite right. Look. Ask your friend to come and see me and I will see what I can do.”

“Really? Thanks, Doctor. He’ll be really pleased.”

Wayne left, and Dr. Bishop sat thinking. If he was going to be true to his new resolution he ought to be willing to circumcise anyone who asked. More than that, he ought perhaps to be telling people about the benefits of being cut. He ought really to start a circumcision clinic which catered for males of all ages, from babes in arms to full-grown men.

He picked up the phone and dialled.

“Mr. Morgan? This is Dr. Bishop. I’ve been thinking about your request and I’ve changed my mind. If you would like to bring your baby boy into the surgery I would be happy to do a circumcision. What about tomorrow afternoon, about 3 o’clock?... Good, I’ll see you and your son then.”

He put the phone down and smiled. His new work had begun.

First may I thank all those who returned the questionnaires that were sent to them. There are only about ten left outstanding and we would love to have a complete set.

I've been asked by several members if we can have an ongoing annual meeting, so Brian has been putting his organising cap on and come up with a tentative date of November 5th – 6th weekend. All the previous ones have been in the south, so we think it would be a good idea to have it in the northern hemisphere this time. Sheffield has turned out to be the favourite. Would those who would like to attend, please let me know, with telephone numbers if possible, so that planning can go ahead.

Quoted above is another address for the list of those who will do private circumcisions. I feel that this clinic has been organised to suit the ever increasing number of Moslems and probable converts in the Sheffield area. It would be ideal if Tony opened up his little black book and shared with us all the names and addresses of all the doctors who are willing to carry out circumcisions, for the benefit of non-circumcised members who would like to be done, but to date may wish to ask, but not through a third party.

With regard to the membership, may I suggest that we put adverts, suitably worded, in magazines in the USA, Canada, Australia and New Zealand, and anywhere else we already have foreign members. This will give us a broader membership range and possibly create a greater interest. As we have about a hundred members, the income should be able to cover the small cost of such adverts. As a point of interest, Forum has a number of foreign issues and it would seem to be sensible to make use of them.

Reply to Jill. Having been in both states myself, I can understand her dilemma as far as dealing with the two styles of penises. But by now she will have learnt that practice makes perfect. For the fact that she has nearly damaged lover boy in the woman-on-top position, it is possible she needs a lubricant to make it easier for both of them. As far as number two son is concerned, I personally would have him circumcised, as at home he does feel the odd man out, and speaking from my own experience, he will thank you for it in years to come.

Reply to Sarah Newman. With regard to the Bris of her first brother, I would suggest it depends on the skill of the mohel as to whether it hurts or not; but I was present at the Brit Milah of my three nephews and can assure her that they did not let out so much as a whimper at the actual cut, although they were upset at having been woken up and having their legs held apart by their uncle. Afterwards they were given their feed and went back to sleep as any normal baby. Of course, the ideal method is that practised by the American Mohel, Joel Shoulson. [Described in Acorn issue 1/91 — Ed.] He has got it down to a fine art. He has designed a comfortable restraining frame that holds the baby firmly but with no discomfort, and using a spray-on anaesthetic immediately after the cut. He has modified his own shield so it acts as a haemostat as well as shielding the glans. His expertise is in great demand and he even teaches non-Jewish doctors how to circumcise by his method. The style of the Jewish circumcision is not dictated by the Torah, but has been evolved through the centuries. The Rabbinical courts say this and that about how it should be done, and what is and what is not acceptable. Today, the Mohelim say that if the Mohel uses a shield he will remove both the foreskin and the mucous membrane in one cut, avoiding the need to tear the inner membrane as was done in the old way.

It is a puzzle why the Plastibell is not accepted by the Mohelim, as it does as good a job, and is aesthetically acceptable, giving a straight scar around the shaft at about one inch behind the glans.

Neonatal Sadness

Sometimes when I read Acorn I feel very sad. I don't mind reading about how much damage a man inflicts to his own penis. As far as I'm concerned, if he wants to, a man can have the whole thing amputated. It is his decision and I am totally indifferent to it.

What does upset me however, is reading what these people do to their sons. Instead of being thankful that they have a healthy normal child, they cannot wait to have him surgically mutilated.

Why? Are they afraid that if they leave him intact he may well decide to keep his foreskin when he is old enough to make up his own mind?

What are they going to tell their sons when they ask what has happened to them? Presumably they can cope if the child is not satisfied with their answer. Presumably they can also cope if their son ends up hating them for what they have done to him. Never mind, they might have lost their son's respect and trust, but at least he will not be burdened with a foreskin, so it's probably worth it to them.

What about the medical profession's involvement in this, our so-called caring profession? How can anyone amputate a healthy part of a person's anatomy? It is against the law to amputate any other part of the body. Why should the foreskin not be protected in the same way?

As far as I'm concerned, childhood circumcision should be recognised for what it is – legalised sexual abuse by the child's parent and the medical profession. It can have the same mental effect and should carry the same legal penalties.

D.S. – Staff's

[This member wrote me an accompanying letter, excerpts of which I hope he doesn't mind me publishing.

"I wrote to Jim Biggelow, the author of the book on non-surgical foreskin restoration. He put me in touch with a doctor in the UK who is trying to mount a campaign to educate his colleagues to the dangers and adverse effects of circumcision. He is circumcised himself and at present he is restoring his foreskin by the Biggelow method.

Unfortunately my penis is damaged beyond repair. I cannot use the non-surgical method as my scar tissue is so bad. Luckily I don't get so many erections these days, but the constant nagging pain, I must admit, I could live without.

I don't think that I will be renewing my subscription next year as I find some of the pro-circumcision articles distressing, particularly those involving children.

You could however, in Contact Corner, ask for anyone who has had or is thinking of having a surgical restoration, to contact me through you. Kind Regards, D.S."

I'm truly sorry to hear of your distress, D.S., and understand how you (and R.B.W.) feel about your unwanted circumcision. In all operations there are a tiny minority that are badly done, but that is no consolation to one of the recipients. Publishing all sides of the subject is the lifeblood of this newsletter so I'm afraid that I can't help in relieving your distress. What I can do is write about surgical foreskin restoration and a method of doing it. — D.A.]

Restoration

First, with the penis flaccid, the shaft skin is cut all round the circumference at the base. The shaft skin is then moved up the shaft until the required length of a foreskin is formed at the tip, as in Fig 1. Measurements are then taken of the length of the circumferential cut (a), and the distance now between the two edges of the cut (b). The resultant rectangle is then marked on the scrotum, measurement (a) going down the scrotum and measurement (b) going across, as in Fig 1. The full thickness of scrotal skin is then cut out to the dimensions, care being taken to preserve the blood supply to the skin. This flap is then turned 90 degrees (Fig 2) and wrapped around the denuded part of the penis shaft, where all the edges are sewn together. The scrotum also is sewn up (Fig 3). Next, three or four small transverse incisions are made to the tip of the foreskin and sutured longitudinally to narrow the foreskin (Fig 4).

I've seen a picture of a penis taken 6 weeks after the operation and it looks a perfectly normal foreskin. I would imagine that if the original circumcision retained most of the inner foreskin, ie. the scar well down the shaft, then the inner foreskin might easily return to its task of mucously moistening. Two questions might be asked. Does the scrotal skin on the shaft move around as mine does with changes of temperature and stages of sexual excitement? Does the bottom half of the shaft stay covered in scrotal hair? What is certain is that there's plenty of scope for revisions. My scrotal skin when stretched measures about 6" square. Double this for the two layers and you have over 70 square inches. What a long foreskin you can have!

2. A Question of Length

Dr. Bishop looked down at his appointment book. The next patient in his clinic was Paul, here for a preliminary discussion about circumcision. In a way, the Doctor reflected, this was the person who had started it all. His friend Wayne, whom the Doctor had circumcised some months before, had asked the Doctor to see Paul. Initially he had refused, and then changed his mind. And so the clinic had been set up.

So, what was the problem? The Doctor chatted for a few minutes and tried to put the patient at his ease.

"And how can I help you this evening?" he eventually asked. Paul noticeably took a deep breath.

"I would like you to circumcise me", he said. The Doctor knew what an effort that statement had taken, but now it had been said the barrier had been crossed.

"Would you like to tell me why you'd like to be circumcised?"

"My foreskin's too long."

Dr. Bishop resisted the temptation of asking how long was too long. Such judgements were subjective, and what was important was that Paul was dissatisfied.

"Why is your foreskin too long?"

"It looks awful. All my mates laugh at me and take the mickey. They say I don't need a Durex, that I could just tie a knot in it. Things like that."

"It seems a bit much to lose your foreskin because your friends don't like it. What do you think about it?"

"I just know that if I'm circumcised they would have nothing to mock me for."

"Perhaps if you were circumcised they would mock you for that."

"No they wouldn't! They tried that with Wayne and he soon turned round and told them he was a real man and they were just jealous."

"Do you think that you'll be more of a man if you're circumcised?"

"Well, your cock looks much better, and Wayne says sex is terrific now." Paul blushed at his boldness.

"Wayne had a particular problem with his foreskin which made sex difficult. Do you have any problems with sex?"

“Well, the skin doesn’t always stay back. There’s so much of it that it seems to cover the top.”

“I think it’s time that we actually had a look. Could you slip off your shoes, trousers and underpants and climb onto the couch, please.”

Paul quickly undressed and Dr. Bishop crossed over to him. The Doctor was quite used to patients having a slightly distorted view of their bodies, but as he looked down at Paul he had to admit that he did have an exceptionally long foreskin. It extended fully an inch and a half beyond the end of the glans, and even then the part which tapered off continued for another half inch. He picked up the penis to examine it. The entrance to the foreskin was quite wide and the foreskin itself looked perfectly healthy. The Doctor was also relieved to find that it was spotlessly clean. He pulled back the foreskin to examine the glans. There was a considerable bunching of skin behind the rim. He could tell that, even with an erection, there would be just too much for the shaft to absorb. The glans was quite normal. Paul winced as the Doctor’s fingers touched it. The Doctor released the penis. Immediately the foreskin came forward again and covered the glans. It was obvious that, when flaccid, there was no way of keeping it back except by holding it.

“Does the head uncover itself when you have an erection?”

“Not unless I skin it back.”

“And does the foreskin stay back once you have pulled it back?”

“Sometimes, but usually it comes forward. And as soon as I get inside, it does.”

By this stage, Dr. Bishop was convinced that there was a medical case for circumcision. In his opinion, a bared glans was essential to the enjoyment of intercourse. Paul was not getting the full sensation if his foreskin constantly got in the way. The Doctor was also worried that, with that length of foreskin, the semen would get caught, and might be a hindrance in due course to Paul being able to impregnate his partner.

But the Doctor also recognised that a full circumcision was not strictly necessary.

“I think that your foreskin is too long and, if you wish, I am quite prepared to circumcise you.”

Paul looked relieved and smiled. “Yes please!” he said quickly.

“There is an alternative. I could give you a partial circumcision. If I cut off the skin at the end of the glans you would still be covered most of the time, but it would peel back and stay back when you were excited.”

“What’s the point of that?”

“Well – if it’s the length of your foreskin that worries you, then it would be shortened, but in a sense you would still be uncircumcised. Your glans would still be protected.”

“But I don’t want to be uncircumcised. Wayne says it’s great to be free of all that skin, and it looks a hell of a lot better when the top’s uncovered.”

Dr. Bishop smiled. Wayne was one hell of a salesman for circumcision. Perhaps he should employ him to advertise the clinic!

The Doctor’s conscience was clear. He had explained the alternatives to his patient and the patient had chosen.

“Very well, young man. A full circumcision it is. If you would like to get dressed we will make an appointment for the operation.”

Answer to Smells

In reply to Anon on smells, there is a solution to his problem. What he does wrong is to wash with hot water and soap. It is essential to rinse the penis in cold water thoroughly first, and then hot water and soap, then there is no smell or taste left.

I have a long foreskin which is very sensitive and I keep it forward habitually. In fact, even after I had regular sex with my (then) girlfriend I did not retract my foreskin, not even for fellatio. I had no teaching from my parents and was never taught sexual hygiene. I must have been in my late twenties when an infection took me to a urologist. He yanked my foreskin back, and that was the first time. The disgusting stink was indescribable. I was prescribed an ointment containing silver, and a cleaning solution of Cetamimum. This solution is also useful to remove greasy or other clinging remains from the glans. It is inexpensively readily available from chemists, and I do use it occasionally in a morning cleaning session.

My foreskin loses a lot of its sensitivity once it is pulled back, so I prefer our foreplay with it unretracted. It is inevitable that sexual hygiene is more lengthy and more frequently required than with a circumcised penis. However, if one retracts the foreskin before peeing, or after peeing is finished, to make sure that no droplets are trapped in the foreskin, washing is needed at the most only twice a day. If I expect to have oral sex, I do feel uncomfortable if I have not washed before, although whenever I check with my wife she assures me that there is no taste.

Contrary to What Others Think

As the 'Anon' in 'Anxieties' referred to by R.B.W. in Acorn 4/94, I thought I'd respond. Firstly, I'm not, as he has concluded, indifferent to my circumcised state, but rather pleased with it in fact. I've read most of his missives over the years and, unlike him, appreciate those who cut me did so with every good intention and, who knows, I may even have been spared the problems they foresaw. He really should forgive his mother who clearly thought she had done for him what was best. Sadly it sounds like the incompetence of the surgery which ought to be the focus of his wrath. Despite that, it may gratify him to ponder that there are curious and dissatisfied women out there who would appreciate the experience and novelty of his services.

He refers to the 'official' policy of experts in the BMA which of course seems to underpin all anti-circumcision articles which appear in the media. I have a feeling that within the BMA there is also a considerable block of dissenting silence. Those who, through treating the misfortunes of many who should have been better circumcised, have formed a positive view of its value. It would be good if they came out of the woodwork, but I expect they would be howled down by R.B.W. and his kind. He may care to ponder that his anguish at being circumcised without his consent is equalled in others who would gladly have given theirs. The argument will continue, but the anti's are currently in the ascendancy and we pro's feel a sense of denial for ourselves and our children every bit as strongly as R.B.W. does from the days when the pendulum was across the other side of its swing.

Young Matron

I notice from some back numbers of Acorn which have been passed to me that there is very little said from the orthodox medical point of view on circumcision, and, although all opinions are of interest, current paediatric thinking should be given an airing even though some of your members may not agree with it.

I was born at the beginning of the fifties and was brought up to look upon circumcision as a 'good thing'. Both my older brothers were done and so was my father. Mother considered that all males should be circumcised as a matter of course to promote cleanliness, and I naturally had no reason to disagree. When I left school I went to nursing college, and eventually took up paediatrics. One of the first things I learnt was that circumcision should no longer be performed on infants except in special cases, and then very rarely. Although this change in attitude from the 'circumcision is a good thing' view had been in place for several years, I was warned that I would meet entrenched opposition to current practice from parents and old-fashioned GPs who were set in their ways, and it would be years before universal uncircumcision was fully accepted, although the reactionaries' hands would be forced to some extent by it not being available on the NHS.

After a number of years I got fed up with the low pay and poor conditions prevalent in those days, and was happy to take up a post as 'matron' at a prep boarding school which catered mainly for the sons of expatriate workers, covering the age range from 7 to 13. It immediately became clear that the modern attitude of not circumcising was being observed since very few of the boys were circumcised when they arrived, although quite a few lost their foreskins before they left, as I shall explain.

As matron I was left in sole charge of bath night (twice a week), and it was my task to be present and prevent horseplay and 'unacceptable behaviour'. I was also given the embarrassing job of checking out every boy's 'bits and pieces' to ensure that there were no problems, by which was meant that penile hygiene was observed. The school doctor also told me to check very carefully for tight foreskins or balanitis, and to refer both to him immediately.

As a relatively young woman of 27, I found the prospect of checking a thirteen year old's foreskin rather flustering to put it mildly, despite my medical training. But my instructions to be diligent in this matter were absolutely clear, and I had no option. The check was done monthly on a bath night. There was no problem with the little ones who looked on me as a mother figure, but it was a different matter with the bigger ones who tended to treat the occasion as a chance to show off or demonstrate their sexual development by deliberately provoking an erection, and as an unmarried woman I found the sight of near-adult penises in a state of sexual tension quite disturbing at first, though I soon found that the right attitude was to treat it as a joke. I was very careful though, to make the older boys do any foreskin manipulation themselves unless there was an obvious problem. Some of them used to play me up by letting me catch them wanking, and in fact, some would quite blatantly pull their penises in front of me, but I just ignored it.

Naturally enough, there were a small number of boys, usually the younger ones, who tended to have tight foreskins and, following instructions, I referred these to the school MO. I was very disturbed to find that, after a perfunctory notification to the parents, these boys were promptly circumcised, usually by the school doctor himself – and the parents were presented with a large bill. According to my training, circumcision was supposed to be the last resort and certainly not justified by a condition which was causing no problems, and which would usually correct itself automatically with the passage of time.

The problem was made infinitely worse by the attitude of the boys themselves who, in this school, tended to tease boys who had been circumcised, unmercifully. Any boy who had been 'bimmed', as they called it, was subjected to 'tortures' such as towel flicking down a line of boys in the baths, and were taunted with the name of 'verps' – unless they were big and strong enough to fight back. I made it clear that such behaviour was unacceptable and did my best to protect them, but you can't be everywhere at once. So the prospect facing a boy who got referred was not a happy one, and those with possible foreskin problems went in fear and trembling. I well remember one cheerful extrovert little boy who I referred in the early days because he had trouble uncovering his glans, who came back after circumcision as a tearful, cowed and thoroughly intimidated lad, his confidence destroyed to such an extent that he started wetting the bed. I did my best to comfort him, but eventually his parents had to take him away.

I did hesitantly once suggest to the doctor, that a boy with minimal foreskin tightness did not need circumcising, but was icily told that he was not interested in my views. So I very soon started being a lot more discriminating in whom I referred, so as to avoid what I knew to be a lot of unnecessary circumcisions being carried out. Some boys clearly had only minor difficulties which could safely be ignored, but I remember one worried 7-year-old with an unretractable foreskin who came to me in tears begging me not to refer him. "I don't want to be bimmed, Miss", he said. So I decided to help him myself, and by careful stretching I managed to enlarge the stricture enough for him eventually to retract. Unfortunately the doctor somehow got to hear about it and I was summarily dismissed for 'disregarding instructions'. When a few months later I heard that the doctor concerned was dragged before the Medical Council and severely admonished – and then sacked by the school – for unnecessarily circumcising a boy, whose parents were horrified at not being adequately consulted, my surprise was tinged with relief. The case made the national papers and some of your more mature members will probably remember it.

I am pleased to say that such high-handed action by a medical practitioner is very much rarer these days, although a distinguished paediatric consultant complained recently that far too many little boys are still being referred by old-fashioned GPs and, to the shame of the specialists concerned, are being circumcised unnecessarily.

Cap d'Agde

I have just returned from a short holiday at the enormous naturist complex at Cap d'Agde in the south of France, and I thought that a few observations might be of interest. For those of us who are in favour of circumcision the news is not good. Ignoring the ethnic/religious ones, only 1%, or at the most 2%, of boys had been done. Of these, the great majority were Germans, and the method of preference, Islamic, with the scarline well down the shaft. Perhaps they are going to immigrant Muslim doctors. It would be ironic indeed if the Germans became the last practitioners of infant circumcision in Europe. This said, it was clear that most had been medically indicated, eg. youngest of three brothers cut, eldest of two brothers done, circumcised father with uncircumcised sons – and vice versa. Adult circumcisions were also rare, being easily outnumbered by the cavalier with his foreskin rolled back. Three recently-carried-out adult circumcisions were sighted, all neatly done with the scar close to the glans. Although of no interest personally, there was a fair amount of piercing to be seen. Most commonly through the frenulum or foreskin tip, but one man had a gold pin with a ball at each end going horizontally through his glans. Must have hurt like hell! I saw no circumcised man who was pierced, so it seems to be a foreskin oriented thing.

J.W. – France

Aborigine Sub-Incisions

I must correct H.C. – London (The Squatters' Paradise 4/94) on his assumption about the extent and effects of Aborigine sub-incisions. Firstly, such eye-witness evidence as there is, reports that cuts right to the level of the scrotum are exceptional, and that these are only achieved after several repeated sub-incisions. About an inch of sub-incision would appear to have been obligatory in those tribes that practised it.

As to the effect of such mutilations, I can confirm (from my own experience), that the mandatory short sub-incision does indeed mess up the jets (both of urine and semen), but with the shaft uncut one can still use the urinal (or the local vegetation) standing up without wetting one's feet or trousers. I have also discovered that an extension to halfway along the shaft (when flaccid and hanging free) actually improves the jets, such that I can now use a normal toilet standing up to urinate, and the first one or two spurts of semen regularly land over five feet away from me.

Even with a three-inch sub-incision, internal delivery of semen to one's partner is no problem as there are another three inches of shaft for penetration.

Masai Circumcision

The Masai people live in Kenya and northern Tanzania. The Masai-Mara national park, a major tourist attraction, is named after them. The Masai are the cow-men of the African savannah; they live and count their wealth by the number of cattle they own. The tribe is organised socially by age sets: boys become warriors (morans) following circumcision, and morans become elders when they have circumcised children. Originally, the interval between major circumcision and transition ceremonies was about fourteen years, but in recent times the initiation ceremonies are more individualised. The warriors search out good grazing and water, protect their families and cattle from wild animals and, until prevented by British colonial power, ranged far and wide along the Great Rift Valley and onto the high ground beside it, raiding the Kikuyu and other neighbouring tribes for cattle and captives. The Masai are usually tall, athletic, and finely featured, not heavily built, round-headed and thick-lipped like the Bantu. They live largely on milk, and blood drawn from a cow's jugular vein without killing it. A Masai homestead (manyatta) is a group of low huts made of bent branches daubed with mud and dried cowdung, surrounded by a thorn fence, with separate huts for the father, each wife and her young children, and for the morans. The Oldorobo people in the 19th. century were mainly forest dwellers and lived by hunting, collecting honey and, as blacksmiths, making spears, swords and knives to trade with the Masai and other neighbouring tribes, for whom they also act as expert circumcisers.

To the Masai layonis, young boys, the word emorata sounds like sweet erotic music loaded with promises of heroic deeds. It means the end of low-status boyhood and the entrance into the world of the morans. From being hard-working dogsbodies who enjoy little respect, they rise to the top of society. They become the young, strong, courageous protectors and providers of their people, and the handsome, virile heroes of the young women. In short, they become everything that every young man, wherever he lives, longs to be. The English poet, Wordsworth asked, "Who is the happy warrior, he who every man in arms would like to be?" The answer is, he is the Masai moran.

When you meet Masai layonis, you see that they do their work as instructed, but otherwise they are like young boys everywhere, full of life and carefree laughter. Then one day when the elders decide to repair the olpiron, a firestick which is the sign that a new round of circumcisions is coming up, the young boys embark on a mental metamorphosis. The boys are presented to the laibon, the witchdoctor, who gives his permission to start the ngipataa, the ceremony preparatory to the day of circumcision. Ceremonies vary among clans, but common to all is the feature that the boys are shaved of hair on all parts of their bodies, and that all jewellery and other objects they have fastened to their bodies are removed. Thus they are made naked, ready for the rebirth into the adult world. They are then daubed in patterns of white chalk, red ochre and black charcoal, and spend the night dancing and celebrating. The next day, an ox, goat or sheep from each boy's family is slaughtered and everybody feasts. In preparation for the feast, honey has been collected and beer has been brewed. This is consumed in great quantities by the elders and the Oldorobo circumciser, all of whom frequently become intoxicated to the point of unconsciousness.

This account is of the circumcision of a young boy named Samuel. His Masai name, given him at birth by his father, was Parasayip. His full Masai name was therefore Parasayip Ole Koyoti, Ole meaning 'son of' in Masai. Masai children get a new, most often biblical name, when they start school.

I first met Samuel outside his father's manyatta while he was home from school during the Christmas holidays. It was on December 10th, two days before the Kenyan Independence Day. Samuel was a slim athlete of 14, and fairly fluent in English. After the holidays he would go back to school. He was aiming in top grades in order to get a scholarship for further studies to become a veterinarian.

But before resuming school he was to be circumcised. Not that he wanted to become a moran, he told me; he just wanted to be a man, because only then would he be respected by the Masai.

As I talked to him I remembered how another Masai, Tepilit Ole Saitoti, recalled his father's admonitory speech before he was circumcised: "Tepilit, circumcision means a sharp knife cutting into the skin of the most sensitive part of the body. You must not budge; don't move a muscle or even blink. The slightest movement on your part will mean you are a coward, incompetent and unworthy to be a Masai man. Ours has always been a proud family and we will not tolerate unnecessary embarrassment, so you had better be ready. Imagine yourself alone being uncircumcised like the water youth (white man). I hear they are not circumcised. Such a thing is not known in Masailand."

After a pause he continued: "The pain you will feel is symbolic, it has a deeper meaning. Circumcision means a break between childhood and adulthood. For the first time you will be considered a grown-up, complete man. You will be expected to give, and not just to receive, to protect your family and not just be protected. And your wise judgement will for the first time be taken into consideration. If you are ready for all these responsibilities, tell us now. Entering into manhood is a heavy load on your shoulders and especially a burden on your mind."

Undoubtedly Samuel had received the same admonition from his father. And he had certainly been told by the morans that the operation would be dreadfully painful, but that it would not be unbearable. Or as the Masai say, typical of their cattle culture, "Only blood will flow, not milk." And they would have asked him if he was a orkirkenyi, one who has had intercourse with a circumcised woman. And if Samuel had admitted such an experience, his father, mother and circumciser would have taken a cow from him as punishment.

Samuel's ordeal started at noon in the hut of his mother. First, Samuel's father's first wife had her hair wetted with milk and was clean shaved. Then she did the same to Samuel's biological mother, who was his father's second wife. Finally she shaved Samuel's head. Then all three had their heads painted with red ochre.

The first wife then took the young boy through the gate of the manyatta and together they caught three grasshoppers which were put into a mini calabash which was sealed with cow dung. After the circumcision, the grasshoppers would be released into the calf pen where they would be trampled to death.

This was to symbolise that the young man's cattle pastures would never be hit by locust swarms or famine.

Samuel was now dressed in a black goatskin toga and sent out to collect an olive sapling to be his firestick, a stick used to make fire and also symbolising the links between generations. When he returned, his metamorphosis was striking. He no longer smiled or talked; he was alone in the crowd of his people. And they did not communicate with him either, except for occasionally derogatory or abusive words, like "You coward, you stupid boy." This was their way of encouraging him, of strengthening his resolve and thus preparing for the coming ordeal.

Very early next morning, a good hour before sunrise, Samuel left the manyatta in company with other to-be-circumcised boys. They went to the river where Samuel chilled his genitals with the intention of easing some of the pain of the forthcoming operation. This completed, they hurried back to the manyatta where the preparations were in full swing. In the middle of the manyatta, among the fifty odd cattle which were just awakening, a half circle of olive saplings had been prepared. Inside the circle stood the circumciser and an elder of his father's age. As Samuel entered the manyatta he grasped an ox-hide and threw it down like a rug into the half circle. For a moment he stood still, as if in a trance, while ice cold water was poured over his head from a very special pot. This pot was the one that contained his placenta and had been kept just outside the gate of his family's manyatta all these years. Samuel then threw himself down on the hide and the elder supported him from behind. Immediately the circumciser went to work. He spread the boy's legs, wetted his penis with milk, and then sprayed it with a white powder. With quick, professional hands, he cut a semicircular slit at the base of the foreskin and threaded the penis head through it; then he removed all but the ventral 'seam' of the foreskin. This ndelesia – a good inch-long flap of skin – was left to chase evil spirits out of a woman's vagina during intercourse, and to protect him against venereal diseases. Supposedly, it also gives women added pleasure, and so makes them prefer the morans to uncircumcised males.

During the surgery, which took less than two minutes, Samuel did not utter a sound, twitch a muscle or make the slightest grimace which could reveal pain or weakness. From his appearance you would have sworn that he had been properly anaesthetised. As he was escorted into his mother's hut afterwards, he was complemented for his bravery by all the onlookers, and his mother was repeatedly told what a good son she'd raised.

The circumcision ceremony is not just an ordeal for the one being circumcised. Judging from their reaction, it is also an intense emotional experience for the other young men; something like a religious revival meeting. Some of the young morans became very excited and a few threw themselves on the ground as if having epileptic fits, with their bodies shaking in muscular spasms and froth appearing round their mouths. During the ceremony they drank a soup made from the bark of the kiloriti bush, which is said to have an invigorating effect. Our guide, who grew up with the Masai, had enjoyed it several times during his youth, but could not recall any special effect.

Samuel did not bleed during the operation. The circumciser explained that Samuel had eaten some special red berries the day before the operation which, together with the powder used during surgery, effectively prevented bleeding. However, when the powder was tested under proper medical conditions, it proved to have no anti-bleeding effect. Thus, it appears most likely, that both the lack of bleeding during the surgery, and the fits of the onlookers, are caused by something similar to self-hypnosis. Furthermore, danger, fear and cold are known to constrict the blood vessels of the genitals through sympathetic nerve stimulation.

After the circumcision, Samuel's mother treated his penis with warm milk, fresh cow's urine and mildewed dung. A strong young ox was bled and Samuel was offered the fresh blood to drink in order to regain his strength. Two days later we met him out walking with other newly circumcised boys, mbarnotis. And of course we asked him the obvious question.

"Was it painful?"

"Yes", he replied.

"But you did not show any pain?"

For a moment Samuel looked at us with his dark brown afro-asian eyes.

"No. I didn't." And after a pause, "You don't."

One would fear that the lack of cleanliness during the operation would inevitably lead to infection. However, only in rare cases do infections occur, the reason being these boys' natural resistance, together with the use of fresh urine, which is almost sterile, and of mildewed dung which may contain anti-microbial substances.

Editorial

The writer of the letter entitled 'Book' asked me some time ago if there was any information on how men who resent their cut state have come to terms with it, and wondered whether a support group might be of any help. If there are any more like R.B.W., D.S. and G. himself, perhaps you could let me know and we could see what we could instigate.

There is still time for anyone interested to book a place at the meeting on Nov. 7th.

Book

I've been impressed with the new newsletter layout and am pleased that Acorn still offers a fine forum for all views.

I feel for D.S. and hope that he does decide to renew his subscription.

I would welcome information as to where in the U.K. one might obtain a copy of Jim Bigelow's book, and perhaps details might be published in Acorn.

A Loving Cut

I am nineteen years old and a keen nudist. I met my current boyfriend two years ago at my local club. I was at once attracted to him because he had such a nice body and was extremely well-endowed. When we started getting intimate on our third or fourth meeting, I discovered that, although his penis was really big, some eight inches long and another inch or so of foreskin, his foreskin was in fact tight, and it was terribly difficult to pull it back over the glans in order to have sex. When I did manage to pull it right back, at some considerable pain to him, I found it would not return to its normal position covering the glans. He did manage to fuck me again with some pain to himself but I didn't enjoy it too much either.

After we had uncoupled, I suggested he see a doctor with a view to having something done about it, probably circumcision, but he would not agree. I felt there was no way I could enjoy having sex with him the way he was; even the thought of oral sex did not attract me. On the other hand, his cock was so big and thick that the very thought of what it would be like to have all of it inside me if he could overcome his foreskin problem made me feel wet between the legs. So I did something about it. I went through my back copies of H. & E. (there are always articles on circumcision) and found the answer. It said that circumcision does not have to be total. Instead of cutting away the whole of the loose foreskin, one could cut the frenulum, and this would loosen the foreskin, making it easy to pull back and expose the glans.

I showed this to Alan who did not seem too keen, but when I told him that if he loved me, and wanted to have normal sex with me, he would have to do something about it, he dithered, and when I said that I would cut it for him he finally agreed. As it was such an important thing to do I felt we should record it on video, so I asked my friend Jenny if she would film it for us. She is a fellow nudist and quite used to the sight of men's cocks, and she agreed.

So next evening they both came round to my flat. We stripped off and had a few drinks to gain dutch courage, then went into the bathroom where Alan sat at the end of the bath with his legs apart. I knelt between them, while Jenny set up the camera on a tripod. When she started the camera I took Alan's cock in my left hand and pulled his foreskin back as far as it would go. This left his frenulum fully exposed, all pink and tight. I cut it with a very sharp pair of nail scissors, as near to the glans as I could. This produced a cry of pain from Alan and a surprising amount of blood which splashed all over my body. It took four more sessions before I had removed Alan's frenulum entirely, but when it was finished the result was startling. The foreskin was now loose, and when pulled back, revealed his knob in all its glory. It looked really beautiful. I kissed it on sight it was so gorgeous.

However, there was another problem. The foreskin was now so loose it would not stay back. We overcame this with the aid of a penis ring we saw advertised in a porn magazine. This fitted over the shaft of the penis and the foreskin was pulled back over it, leaving the knob exposed. The rings came in a pack of six because as time went on the foreskin was stretched both lengthwise and in diameter, and the next size up had to be used.

Alan was now wearing a ring all the time, and when he had an erection the skin of his cock was really stretched. We were able to fuck like this. The experience of feeling Alan's knob penetrating my vaginal tube was something I had not felt before. As his knob slid into my vagina I had the most beautiful sensation, one I had never had before, and as his knob pushed the whole length of my vaginal tube I had my first orgasm. Then as the ring with its covering of foreskin touched my clitoris I went berserk. Oral sex was just as stimulating.

I am still considering whether to have Alan fully circumcised. Physically, the circumcised knob is better, the feel of it inside you, whatever orifice you take it in, gives me much more sexual pleasure than the normal cock with foreskin. However, as Alan has this quite enormous foreskin he is able to pull and hold it right back, and have sex like that.

Visually, the circumcised prick can be very beautiful. I love looking at Alan's knob; it makes me horny, it turns me on, something that never happened when he was suffering from a tight foreskin. On the other hand, Alan says his knob is not nearly as sensitive as it used to be before I partially circumcised him. In those days, he says, a girl would only have to pull his foreskin back and touch his knob, for him to spunk. Now when I wank him I can 'handle' him for twenty minutes or more before he shoots his load. I think I will leave things as they are. After all, I seem to have the best of both worlds.

Penile Let-Down

I am a recent Acorn subscriber. Being rather fascinated by that strange phenomenon, the human penis, I find it very interesting.

The subject given most coverage is circumcision, which is indeed interesting. As one who has been, I must say that I rather envy those who have a bit extra to play with, or for their companions to play with. My girl friend (who is also very enthusiastic about penises) says she prefers them circumcised, but actually she hasn't had any experience with the other kind. So I keep suggesting she should get some. (Ulterior motive: maybe she'd be able to arrange for me to have a close look too. But anyway, she'd be able to describe it to me in detail. Having her enthuse to me about another cock is the biggest turn-on I know.)

Anyway, there is at least one other penile subject which must command great interest: impotence. Yes, depressing I know – not exactly a turn-on. However, it is said that there are quite a lot of sufferers, and you are ideally placed to conduct an exchange of views and experience about how to combat it.

Speaking personally, I am not a complete lost cause. With the girlfriend's help a reasonable erection usually develops in due course. However it often does not persist very long, especially when inside her. No doubt, in common with other sufferers, I have concentrated over the years on foreplay, which is very enjoyable for both of us. But although she is considerate about it, I know she would like a solid finishing, and so would I, and they don't come very often.

It's curious that additional sexual excitement, for example watching a good video, or hearing my girlfriend enthusing over another sexual experience, while making me feel very nice and turned-on, actually makes me go softer rather than harder. I can come alright, and have a very intense orgasm, but with a soft cock. Rather disappointing.

Considering how one can strengthen other parts of the body by therapy or exercise, it's odd that you can't seem to be able to do anything about the cock. Or maybe you can?

Obviously, psychology comes into it: would, for instance, hypnotism help, do you think? I know all about those 'avoid the genital caressing' type of cures that are advocated: no good for me unfortunately.

If there isn't a simple physical therapy, do you know of any clinics with a reputation for success? Any suggestion would be gratefully received.

Tom – N. Yorks

[I tried to start a dialogue on this subject a couple of years ago, but there was no response to it. Maybe it's one of those rare subjects among us where it's hard to admit it. But if anyone can help, please let us know. – D.A.]

The Clinic

3. On the Operating Table

Paul, dressed in surgical gown, climbed onto the operating table and lay down. A few minutes before, he had signed his consent to a circumcision being performed on him. Now he waited nervously for Dr. Bishop to begin.

The Doctor knew that all patients were nervous at this stage. He himself was not without nerves, although these were strictly under control. He pushed the gown up to expose Paul's genitals and covered his legs with a blanket.

"First, I am going to clean the area with a mild antiseptic." Quickly he wiped the penis and the general surrounding area, drawing back the foreskin to ensure that it also was free from dirt and excretions. Then he placed a cloth with a circular hole in it over Paul's midriff, and drew Paul's penis through so that Paul's body was completely covered except for the part to receive his attention.

"I am going to freeze the penis with a local anaesthetic. You will feel the needle going into the skin but it won't be too painful."

The Doctor was aware of Paul tensing as he drew back the foreskin and injected four shots of anaesthetic into the penis at the base of the glans, two at either side of the frenum and two on either side near the front.

"We'll just wait a couple of minutes for the anaesthetic to take effect, and in the meantime I will just mark where the operation will be performed." Dr. Bishop often thought that this was the most crucial part of his job. The marks which he made now would guide his scalpel. Wrongly placed, too much or too little skin would be removed. His aim was to leave the glans fully exposed, with no surplus skin whatsoever to roll up behind the glans rim. The Doctor liked to leave some inner foreskin in place stretched down the shaft. This had two advantages. It meant that some of the sensitive foreskin was retained, and also meant that the circumcisional scar was clearly visible on the shaft, which, he thought, gave a pleasing aesthetic effect. The mark traced round the underpart of the penis up to the frenulum, which the Doctor intended to leave intact. Then he completed the marking process on the inner foreskin. Now he was ready to cut. First he tested the local anaesthetic. It had taken – Paul could feel none of the sharp pricks which the Doctor applied to his penis and foreskin.

Once he had started, the Doctor worked carefully and concentratedly, but as quickly as possible. He inserted forceps into the opening of the foreskin and held the foreskin tautly. He cut down the dorsal line, first through both layers of the foreskin until he reached the mark on the inner foreskin, then through the outer layer alone. He then made the lateral cuts, first on the left side, through the outer, then the inner layer of foreskin, tying the bleeding points as he went. By now half the foreskin had been cut away, and he put it into a specimen dish before putting together the inner and outer layers of skin and suturing them together. A similar process on the right side and the job was done. He cleaned the wound and applied an inner and then an outer dressing. He looked at Paul and smiled.

"All over – you are now circumcised just as you wished."

The Doctor looked back at the specimen dish and the discarded foreskin. He was always amazed at how voluminous the separated prepuce appeared. But in Paul's case it was almost unbelievable. If he had stretched it out and measured it, he reckoned that each piece would have been over 5 inches in length.

Forty minutes later, having in the meantime circumcised a 14 year-old with phimosis, Dr. Bishop went into the recovery room where Paul was recuperating. He checked the dressings to make sure there had been no bleeding, but they were unmarked.

“How are you feeling?”

Paul smiled. “I’m OK, although everything is still numb down there.”

“It will take another two or three hours for the anaesthetic to start to wear off. After that you may start to feel some discomfort – not too much I hope. But I’ll give you a prescription for some painkillers. Take two every four hours, but only if you need them.”

The Doctor sat down on a chair. “You can get dressed and go now, but first I’ll just run through some instructions. They’re all printed on the leaflet that I’ll give you, but if I explain them it will give you a chance to ask questions.

“First, leave the dressing on for 48 hours, then remove it. The outer dressing will just unwind. The inner one may best be soaked off in the bath. I’m afraid that when the penis is uncovered it will look a bit battered and bruised, and the skin will be puffy in places. Don’t worry – it will all settle down in due course. You don’t need any other dressing on the wound. Leave it open to the air and it will help it to heal. The stitches which I have put in are soluble and will gradually dissolve over the next week to ten days. Don’t pull any loose ends – they will gradually come away of their own accord, and if any remain I’ll remove them when I see you in a fortnight.

“As you probably know, everyone has erections during the course of their sleep. These may be quite painful and wake you up. This is because the skin will be tight and will be pulling against the stitches. Don’t worry – the stitches won’t give way. Just wait for the erection to go, or help it on its way by applying a cool flannel or splashing with cold water.

“Sorry,” apologised Dr. Bishop. “I shouldn’t have forgotten the most important item. I’m afraid that intercourse is completely forbidden at least until I see you again. We have to make sure that the wound is completely and properly healed. Normally that takes about three weeks, and then when you start making love again, you need to be fairly gentle. Having sex puts quite a lot of strain on the skin of the penis, and you don’t want to cause any damage. I’m sorry if that seems a very long time – it’s part of the price you have to pay. Anything else?”

“Try to avoid any contact sport, just in case. Otherwise, you can start exercising after a week, but make sure that you wear a good support, and it might also make sense to protect your penis with some padding or something similar to keep it still, relative to your body. Then, you should be OK... Is that it?"

"I think so."

"Right then. You can get dressed and go home." The Doctor shook Paul's hand and then took his leave. Paul got off the bed, took off the gown and looked down at his bandaged groin. He felt elated. There, under the dressings lay his foreskinless penis. He looked forward eagerly to the dressings being off, the stitches being out and to everything being properly healed. But for the moment it was enough – he was circumcised at last.

[Next month's episode; 'The Men in Her Life' will be based on ideas sent in by a member. I am very happy to receive ideas for future episodes, or problems you would like the doctor to handle in the clinic. Or you could even write a whole episode yourself. Please write to me via David Acorn.]

Piercing

(Extract of a letter in Piercing World)

At my first school medical at the age of five, my foreskin was deemed to be too tight, and a danger to myself and others. Over the next few months I underwent a number of traumatic and painful attempts to stretch it. These having failed, my foreskin was slit and all was well for a few months. However, I began to have further problems and so, having escaped the knife at birth, I was circumcised around six years of age. This didn't pose any problems until I changed school at the age of ten. There, I was the only one without a foreskin, and how I wished that I had one. Despite this, it didn't really cause me any problems throughout my teens and twenties, and my girlfriends certainly never complained. However, the subject of circumcision was one that was of great interest to me, and I always read anything that came my way on the subject.

About four or five years ago, I was having a session with my acupuncturist when she remarked on the neatness of my scar. She then went on to tell me that she had read how circumcised penises could be re-sensitised by putting a little ring in the rim. I knew immediately that this was something I had to do. At that time there was nothing to be found anywhere on piercing, so it wasn't until eighteen months later that I came across Body Art magazine. I decided that many of the piercings would, for me, inhibit rather than enhance sexual pleasure. I settled on a frenulum piercing. Through a gay friend of mine I found a doctor who was used to piercing. I was nervous but excited also. He inspected me and again commented on the neatness of my scar. He was pleased to find that most of the frenulum had been left, and then very quickly and skilfully pierced me, using a hollow needle. I had no anaesthetic and felt only a few moments of firm pressure – no worse than an injection. A few moments later I was the proud owner of a frenulum ring. It healed completely within four weeks and I have never had a problem since. I thoroughly recommend using Australian Tea-tree oil as an antiseptic with healing properties, and a course of zinc tablets to promote healing. Other than that, just don't fiddle with it.

I usually wear a small 10mm gold ring in it, but I do change to a steel barbell if I know I am having to remove it for any reason, such as holidaying with other people. I and my girlfriend find the piercing attractive and practical, and an added enjoyment during sex. I don't think I would contemplate any more piercings other than perhaps a second frenulum. I feel most of the other piercings would be unattractive – less is more in my book. I think some of the multiples are rather overwhelming. I like to enhance my body's appearance rather than subdue it – but each to his own!

Attitude to Circumcision

If our membership is around a hundred, there must be many who have yet to make their 'maiden contribution'. Let me assure them that their experiences and opinions on circumcision (or avoiding it!) are of great interest to us all. "How was it for you?" is the life blood of Acorn. Please, if this means you, remember you don't need any literary skills and you can write with absolute anonymity. Whether you're pro or anti circumcision, putting your innermost feelings about this topic on paper can be a very therapeutic experience. Even R.B.W. declared so!

Perhaps some need a starting line, 'I first found out about circumcision when...' has proved a good prompt, and according to our surveys seems to have found favour with readers. Long may it continue, but let me suggest another scenario which might even draw response from partners:-

'My girlfriend/fiancée discovered my circumcision...' (when she asked? / embarked on foreplay? / during first intercourse? / well into our relationship? / never mentioned it?)

How did she react? What exactly did she say? Was she delighted or disappointed? Did it influence her decision to (or not to) circumcise your sons?

I've written my own story of female response (Issue 3/94) and would dearly love to hear how others fared. Women vary enormously in their reaction, interest and preference. Some are well-informed through their mothers having explained why their brothers have been circumcised. Others, incredibly, may reach the marriage bed without any knowledge of the subject whatsoever!

In all sexual encounters, there comes a moment when the fact that you have been circumcised cannot be concealed. This poses the point; is it best to make a disclosure beforehand? Unfortunately there never seems a right moment to say, "By the way, I'm circumcised. I hope you don't mind!" On the other hand, to make no comment can cause some apprehension, anticipating a surprised or unwelcome remark from a partner when she makes the inevitable discovery. This may be uttered at some inappropriate point in the activity (usually early foreplay in my experience). If nothing at all is said, then you know it's likely to crop up in conversation at some time afterwards. Eventually you can expect a casual, "Incidentally, I couldn't help noticing...", or more directly, "When/why were you circumcised?" This may initiate a welcome exchange of opinions on the matter, but these are academic, because the situation between both partners is unalterable.

However reconciled a 'circumcisee' becomes to his state, there is always that degree of curiosity – wondering what it would have been like to have been left 'entire'. Unlike the cavalier, the option can never be available to him.

Please ladies, if you encounter a trimmed male, keep any adverse reaction, remark or disappointment to yourself. At the same time, don't leave your obvious, and maybe intrigued, observation unsaid, either. We like our women to show an interest, but choose your moment carefully and express your surprise or feelings in a good way if you can.

Understandably, most of us men welcome a chance to explain what befell us and how we feel about it – hence the success of Acorn.

The most considerate thing a woman can do for a circumcised partner is to share his acceptance of something he cannot alter, and she confirms this every time she chooses to make love with him. Both know that there are thousands of uncircumcised men out there she could have, but she has chosen him, and that is a comfort and consolation. If her feelings can expand to enthusiasm for his circumcision then that is a sheer delight!

As one of the 'no choice, circumcised', it would be good to hear from Acorn readers of both sexes on how they handled the 'moment of discovery'.

[Here is someone who has felt deeply and traumatically about his state and doesn't mind expressing it. What strikes me is that, because as a boy I equated circumcision with the rich, and foreskins as belonging only to the poor and wretched, I grew up with exactly the same feelings but from the opposite status. The problems must come more from the head than the genitals! – D.A.]

Reversing an Unkind Cut

(Item by Dr James Le Fanu In The Daily Telegraph 13.9.94)

After Greenpeace's famous Save the Whale campaign, Andrew Gordon and Jack Collins, surgeons at Oxford's Radcliffe hospital, are trying to persuade colleagues and the public to 'save the foreskin'.

They say that three out of four circumcisions performed in Britain cannot be justified on medical grounds. Their campaign will undoubtedly be boosted by the publicity generated by the latest fad to reach these shores from California – uncircumcising.

The principle is not dis-similar to the practice of some African tribes, of applying weights to the ear lobes to elongate them. The penile skin over the shaft is stretched downwards and a ball bearing attached to the end with surgical tape.

Within ten days, some degree of elasticity is induced, though it may take several years before the foreskin is cosmetically and anatomically restored.

This may all sound a bit bizarre, but this week's British Medical Journal contains a powerful defence of the joys of uncircumcising which is very convincing. The writer compares the function of the foreskin to that of the eyelid, protecting and moistening the delicate, sensitive tissue underneath. With the loss of the foreskin, he says, the vulnerable tip of the penis (the glans) "is always uncomfortable throughout childhood when rubbed by clothing". With time it becomes coarser, which in turn reduces the intensity of sexual pleasure.

He describes the benefits of uncircumcising: "The glans becomes softer and steadily more sensitive... after about ten weeks my wife and I both noticed intercourse became much easier and almost frictionless."

This account of the penalties of losing the foreskin should make doctors much more cautious about recommending circumcision, even when the foreskin is very tight – a condition known as phimosis, which may be associated with infection.

According to Gordon and Collins, such infections should be treated with antibiotics because, by the age of five, the problem cures itself; by then almost 90% of foreskins can be fully pulled back. Even if they cannot, Mr G.A. McKinley of Edinburgh's Royal Hospital for Sick Children advises that the surgeon's knife should be avoided in favour of instilling a powerful local anaesthetic under the foreskin, and then slowly separating it from the underlying glans.

He has treated 39 boys in this way and in only 7 was it not possible to achieve full and painless retraction. "Circumcision is all too frequently performed without good reason: it is rarely required," he says.

Bill of Kingston, who sent this article says, "I do not understand how it is possible to attach a ball bearing to the end with surgical tape. Any enlightenment would be appreciated."

Here is a drawing of how it is done. For ease of clarity I've shown a slight growth of foreskin over the glans. The tape over the end is doubled sticky to sticky to ensure the ball isn't lost and so that the tape doesn't stick to the glans itself, which would defeat the object.

I've always thought that phimosis was due to the constriction of the foreskin at the tip, but several medical articles I've read talk (like this one) about the adherence of the foreskin to the glans. This must be to the whole surface of the glans, as mine adhered to the rim of the glans up to the age of twelve, with retraction, and no ill effects at all. Has anyone any more information?

Foreskin Bank

I was interested in the article 'Question of Length' (Clinic 2). The young man wanted to be circumcised because he said his foreskin was too long. As someone who admires the beauty of a long foreskin and the pleasure it gives (having an inch overhang myself), it seems a terrible waste to cut it off and throw it in the bin. I can imagine what those guys feel who lost theirs when they were infants, and would give anything to possess one like this young man's. Perhaps one day in the future there will be a foreskin bank for transplants.

This would make everyone happy, so that the ones which aren't wanted could be given to those who do want them.

H.J.M. – Mid-Glam.

It Should Have Been Done Years Ago

I was circumcised somewhat late in life, which appears to be rather unusual. To start at the beginning. When I was a boy of 12 or so, my foreskin was one of those long pointed jobs and quite tight. At school we used to experiment with our friends' penises, and they used to try to get my foreskin back, but all that could be achieved was to show about a quarter of an inch diameter hole, as well as being painful.

This continued for some years, and about every three or four weeks the end of my penis would feel hot and irritate. I learned how to cure this, by squeezing the foreskin tightly at the end when I had a pee, so that it blew up to about the size of a large plum. Releasing the pressure suddenly made the water force out the smegma underneath.

When I went into the army I was examined, but nothing was said about it until one day when the doctor caught hold of it and tried to move it back. That made me jump, and after further chat, he said that it must be circumcised. Well, of course, being the services, that's as far as it went. I didn't press the matter and that's how things stayed for many years. But just after that brush with the doctor, I tried hard to force it back until one day I succeeded. I had a shock, as the glans was covered in plates of smegma. After washing it off I expected a struggle to return my foreskin to its usual position, but it went back fairly easily.

Now that is more or less the history of my troublesome foreskin. Over the years I became a naturist, and also as a Christian I had an interest in the Jewish people. So now I started to keep my foreskin permanently back. This was quite satisfactory for some time, but then I thought that I should be circumcised. That was easier said than done, as the doctor would not refer me to a hospital, saying it was not necessary. I then tried a synagogue, but they would only do it upon a conversion to their faith, so that was out. I was on the point of having it done privately when I had a stroke of luck. From not being able to retract my foreskin, now it would not come forward, and began to feel tight around the head of my penis.

So back to the doctor again, and after he had tried manipulation a couple of times with no lasting effect, I suggested circumcision again. All he said was, "Oh well, if you want." I had an appointment at the hospital and the surgeon examined it (there wasn't much to examine, it had shrivelled up so), said that it was phimosis and would have to be circumcised.

Five weeks after that I went to the day surgery for the op., and I have nothing but praise for the way that it was carried out at the West Middlesex Hospital. Every bit of foreskin was removed, the shaft is nice and smooth, and no scars. The head of the penis is much more sensitive, and when I move now and the penis rubs on my leg or trousers it is like heaven.

Perhaps the diameter of the glans is a little larger just around the rim, but there is no significant difference in size. The great improvement is in sensitivity, the appearance, and a general sense of freedom. I don't mind anyone having a look now. Like someone wrote in Acorn, I used to turn to the wall in the shower or changing room, but now I show it all to the world.

To those mums who are considering having their sons circumcised I would say, go to it. But in my opinion I would think that about 12 or 13 years of age is the right time, when it can be explained to them and they will understand. After all, it only seems right that they should be consulted on the future appearance and performance of so important a member of their body.

Size

Hopefully, some Acorn readers share my interest in cock size and enlargement methods. Having recently filled in the questionnaire I look forward to a few published statistics on the subject.

On a semi-regular basis I have used vacuum developers for about ten years. It is clear to me that an increase in erect length has occurred which is permanent – about three-quarters of an inch. There have been no drawbacks and only once did I create a small blood blister on my shaft, which soon healed. I have always applied vacuum gently, only after 15 minutes increasing the suction to maximum. I presently use a high quality model with strong suction, sold as 'Handsome Up'.

The increase in size under vacuum is mostly girth, a homemade collar giving an indication of size. Length increases rather less; I'm probably near my own limit. On removing the developer some increase in size is retained until the erection is lost. Repeated use has given me nice hard erections, certainly not spongy or flabby in any way.

Masturbation or intercourse after a session with the developer is very good, with intense sensations in my circumcised glans. Erection can of course be regained with the developer, although getting erect again is not usually difficult. Perhaps this is another benefit.

There has been a lot of adverse comment on the effectiveness of developers in Forum and elsewhere. Contacts are welcome to write and discuss.

Masai Circumcision (Conclusion)

Another Masai Ordeal

During the recovery from circumcision, while the cut is healing, the young man may be exposed to ordeals of another kind however.

David Read narrates such a situation in his book on Masai life in earlier times, Waters of the Sanjan; while lying in his bed recovering from circumcision, the young man was visited by a married woman to whom he had once, as a layoni, made improper suggestions. The woman sat down on his bed, removed her skirt and began to caress him. All the while she spoke softly to him, telling him how much she had often wanted him but had been too frightened to take him as he was still uncircumcised. It was different now, she whispered; now that he was a moran no one could stop them making love. She moved her hand down to his pubic area and when he started to have an erection, she lay down at his side and purred that he should move closer.

"I cannot," he panted, "and you know it!"

"We do not have to do it all until you are properly recovered," she said, "but there is nothing to stop us caressing each other."

With that, the young man's erection split open the wounds and he began to bleed. Then the woman rose and said:

"You have paid for your insult as custom requires, and I shall hurt you no more. I have truly been fond of you, and now that you are a moran and my husband's olpirion (of his age group) you will be welcome in my house and we can be asanjas (lovers)."

Of course, I don't know if this happened to Samuel. But it might have.

Circumcision was once followed by a period when the mbarnotis prepared themselves for moranhood. Wandering around in small groups armed only with sticks and bows and arrows, they had to fend for themselves. They were to keep out of sight of the other Masai and were not allowed to join the morans. However, at night, they could visit the manyatta for shelter and food. A major occupation during this period was to adorn their halo-like headdresses with as many of the most colourful birds as possible. For this purpose they tipped their arrows with a ball of beeswax or resin, so that when they hit a bird it would be stunned without damage to feathers or skin. Now this period is often omitted and the boys are usually given a fully adorned headdress once the circumcision is over.

Whilst circumcision of the young men is a voluntary act where the youth can show how brave he is, the circumcision of the women is not. Nditos (uncircumcised girls) are circumcised once they become pregnant or before their ninth menstruation. They are allowed to kick and scream as long as they do not kick the knife. Usually they are held by women. During the operation the clitoris and parts of the labia are removed, and the vagina is enlarged. The women's wounds are treated in the same way as the men's, and infection is said to be rare.

The Masai Circumcision Operation

The Masai operation is quite distinctive, although very similar to the way that boys are circumcised in the Samburu, Kikuyu, and other tribes for whom the Olorobo act as circumcisers. An early description of the Masai operation is given in German by Merker (1904, p62-3). He comments that because the operation is very painful it is done at dawn, the coolest time of the day, and to reduce their sensitivity to pain, the boys soak themselves with cold water. The Dorobo operator uses a two-edged pointed knife about the length of a finger. During the operation the boy sits on a cowhide on the ground with his legs spread. Shifting from German into Latin for his description of the operating technique, Merker writes, "the outer skin of the penis is retracted and the internal surface is cut around with the knife directly behind the glans. The glans then lies in an elongated covering into which a cut is made from above; through this the glans is pushed. The skin which then hangs down long from under the glans is half removed and the remainder grows together within 14 days and, when healed, looks like a uvula (Bryk translates this as a small grape)." Younger boys sometimes try to appear circumcised by daubing their glans with the juice of a Euphorbia plant called oljugi, which makes the glans swell and prevents the prepuce slipping forward.

Bagge's 1904 account of the Masai operation differs in minor details: "the prepuce is retracted and the operator scarifies each side of the frenulum with the point of his knife, by means of which a certain amount of play is allowed. Inserting his finger between the upper surface of the glans and the prepuce, he makes a transverse incision immediately below a previously placed mark indicating the level of the corona glandis. Through this opening he protrudes the glans penis, and by means of a thorn, so pierces the skin of the prepuce that it is unable to return to its former position. Then, if this part of the prepuce appears to be too long, he cuts off a small portion from it and throws it down. When the operation is over, the circumciser washes the blood from the penis with a mixture of milk and water".

Photographs of Sambru and Masai youths, and early ones of Kikuyu warriors, show a sometimes quite large roll of foreskin hanging in the 'tassel' position, and often this displaced foreskin appears not to have been shortened at the tip. Koenig (1956, p88) describes it as "a lower, shovel-like projection...which, so it is said, increases the sexual lust in both the man and the woman". In his book, The Kilimanjaro Expedition, H.H. Johnson describes the result as "a soft round swelling lying under the glans, and giving the penis the appearance of having a double end: among the Masai it is enormous, and is openly displayed".

The description by Bryk (1934, p65) of the Masai and Kikuyu is that they are “only half circumcised, the lower part of the foreskin not being cut away at all, but hanging atrophied for the rest of the owner’s life. The Kikuyu have two members, say neighbouring tribes. This hanging foreskin at first constitutes something of a hindrance during the sexual act. I was told that as a result of it the Kikuyu could not enter at all at first. Only after his wife has given birth is complete coition possible. His foreskin hanging down behind the glans is said to be especially arousing to the woman, whose centres of sensation have been shifted as a result of the extirpation of the clitoris”.

The operation can be termed a ‘simple buttonhole method’ of circumcision. When it consists only of the one transverse slit, it has the advantages that it can be done quickly, and with very little bloodshed. (This seems a more plausible explanation than the red berries or white powder for the absence of bleeding when Samuel was circumcised.) It exposes the glans fully, and is usually quick to heal, since the inner and outer cut surfaces of the foreskin are held together by the glans. It is especially suitable for the older lads on whom it is performed, since an erection will tighten the alignment of the two skin surfaces, rather than pulling them apart. Most of these advantages are retained if the frenulum area is cut first. If the tip is left untrimmed, the displaced foreskin remains a tube which, in principle, could, after healing, be drawn back over the glans. If the tip is trimmed, the displaced foreskin may form a pouch and pose a problem of hygiene.

This account is based mainly on the fascinating recent book by Steen and Riddervold, but also draws on the following sources:

Editorial

As none of the members who were at the meeting in Sheffield have volunteered to do a write-up of the meeting, it looks as if it falls to me to do the honours.

All the previous meetings have been held in the south so it was thought to be a good idea to hold this one in the north to allow those living in and around a chance to get there cheaply and quickly. Therefore we were extremely disappointed that only one member appeared from north of London. Also, apart from two, all had been to previous meetings. Nevertheless it was good to renew old acquaintances and make new ones.

Many Acorn topics were discussed, but the main concern with all was the future of the group. It was felt that there was a need for particular interest groups, particular advice groups, organised advertising (the only proper ads up to now have been paid for privately by Brian and myself, for which we had no mandate), and financial accountability. The correct way to do all these things appeared to be within the framework of a formal and democratic code of conduct. To this end a draft Constitution was devised, which would be sent to all members with No 1/95 so that comments could be made, with an inaugural AGM to ratify it to be held probably at Croydon around Easter sometime. A steering committee consisting of myself, Brian of the West Country, Dean of S.Wales and Vernon of London was voted in to prepare this. In the meantime, Dean was asked to become the pro tem treasurer to set up a banking system to take care of next year's early subscriptions.

I know all this sounds very technical and cold, and that we have built ourselves up in a confidentially respected atmosphere of warm brotherly feelings (at least I have – and think most others have too) even though there are opposing viewpoints, but I see no reason why there should be any change. I will, as ever, try to keep a fully balanced newsletter, and will fight to keep it so if a bunch of zealots, one way or the other, were to try to take over in the future.

You will find a membership renewal form inside for 1995. Please make cheques and P.O.s payable to THE ACORN SOCIETY, the new full name.

Double Trouble; Royal Revelations & Words

Double Trouble?

A most fascinating, almost unknown fact emerged in a book by Dr Vernon Coleman. Apparently one in every five million males is born with a second penis!! From such an amazing statistic, there must be five or six examples of that phenomenon in the United Kingdom. Perhaps an infant born with two penes would have one excised with expediency for the sake of conformity – as was the case with a friend's sixth finger. What is absolutely fantastic is the possibility of a man having one circumcised penis whilst the other remained intact!

If I remember right, Felix Bryk's paperback Sex and Circumcision illustrated a phallic wand with two limbs, which I found most curious at the time. It must have been fashioned in mimicry of that rare phenomenon, and the tip on one side gave the appearance of the underside of a circumcised penis.

Biphallicism would be an obvious source of conjecture. With the intact and circumcised combination (fore'n'away) there would be a prepuce for foreplay and masturbation, and a dry glans for fellatio, with a choice of either for intercourse! Should the individual have been born Jewish, would both have been circumcised according to the Dinim of Milah?

Royal Revelations

So Prince Charles' full frontal photograph appeared in the foreign press! I found it ironic that the initial publishing was in a German newspaper,

Bild, for a readership where the lack of a foreskin is still frowned upon. When it is considered that the circumcised condition led to concentration camp gas chambers during W.W.2, the sudden revelation of the mohel's art becomes even more outstanding – a real newsflash.

Later the same photograph appeared in Paris Match, but was not included in the U.K. edition. (A Di-version, perhaps!!)

A much earlier Prince came into my conversation when the abbreviation P.A. was questioned. Putting Prince Albert aside, I quipped:-

“It doesn't stand for pretty awful, but rather, pubic addition; it has a definite 'ring' to it!”

(With apologies to the late Prince Albert, also circumcised, but not in the Jewish fashion.)

Words

Words never fail to stimulate! In Issue 7 Amanda's nail scissor trimming of her boyfriend's frenulum was described as a partial circumcision. There are many reluctant roundheads who would have jumped for joy at 'partial circumcision' without any foreskin loss.

Further in that issue was the delightful term 'circumcisee', never encountered before. What a novel gerund possibility!! Could 'circumciseeing' be hazarded as the operation, or perhaps a glimpse of the result!

May I wish all Acorn-minded seekers after truth a rewarding and happy New Year.

Anthony

[And many thanks for your apt card. — D.A.]

Stan Acornson

My dad is an Acorn member and I get to read all the newsletters. He had himself circumcised three years ago and has been on at me to get done as well. He tried to have me done when I was a tiny kid 17 years ago, but my mum didn't like the idea, and anyway he never got past the nurse when he took me along for it once when my mum was away.

He's very insistent that it would be a good thing for me, but my mum says he doesn't know his arse from his elbow when it comes to sex, and I shouldn't listen to him. So for the time being I'm going to hang onto my foreskin although

I've read enough in Acorn to make me realise that a lot of people prefer circumcision, and I might go for it one day. What worries me though, is the letters from so many end-users (females) who disapprove. I do quite well as it is and I would hate to find my popularity affected by it!

There has been a lot of comment recently in the papers about young people having sex at an early age with lots of criticism from older people, but not a word from younger people themselves. There was a story a few months ago about a school open day on the Isle of Wight where parents wandering around went into the school kitchens by mistake and surprised about a dozen seniors watching a couple of girls being given oral sex up against the hot plates. They seemed dead surprised by it all, but it really isn't all that unusual from my experience.

About half the girls I grew up with had had full sex by the time they were 15, and quite a lot had it before then. The boys tended to be older but not much. One of the reasons is all the sexy films and videos you get to see. One of our lot used to show us his dad's porny videos when he was out, and they used to get you really turned on, including the girls. Although the girls (and some of the boys, including me) found it a bit shocking to start with, we soon got used to seeing scenes of bonking and oral sex done to both sexes, plus the occasional 'golden shower', and it was only natural to try it ourselves after. It was helped by drink being available from off-licences which helps get you in the mood. You can always get an older kid to buy it for you. When we had a few cans of strong lager we'd go down to the scout hut for sex sessions after drinking the booze on the corner outside the shop.

When I think back, I'm quite ashamed at some of the things we used to do when I was in my mid-teens, usually after a few beers. Grown-ups used to be really shocked by our language, and I suppose it is rather surprising if you're not used to it to hear young girls saying "fuck" and "cunt", although at the time we thought it a bit of a lark and enjoyed the reaction. The girls were just as bad as the boys when it came to bad behaviour, and while drinking the lager before retiring to the scout hut a group of about ten of us used to congregate round the corner, chatting, shouting and swearing. When we'd had a few, it was no big deal for us to take a leak against a wall in broad daylight, whilst the girls often took a pee in the telephone kiosk, and couldn't care less if anyone saw them. Disgusting when you think about it now I suppose!

Doing such things in public was rather OTT, but it all seemed innocent fun in those days, and I don't suppose it did us any harm. Needless to say, with all the sexual experimentation which included everything from wanking and bonking to oral sex (strangely, the girls enjoyed doing this more than the boys) you got to see a wide cross-section of male and female private parts. I don't remember any of the boys being circumcised though.

What I do remember is that one of our group had a very tight foreskin of the 'phimosis' type, and from what I've since read in Acorn should by rights have been circumcised. He didn't know that though, and seemed quite happy as he was. It never stopped him wanking, and his girlfriend said he had a lot more staying power than most of us when it came to full sex, although he didn't get the same enjoyment we got from oral sex. You couldn't tell immediately from just looking at it that he had a tight foreskin. The first time I realised it was when he stood laughing at us in the call box entrance to show off to the girls and took a leak in front of us. I was amazed to see his penis swell up to the size of an orange as he did so, and a fine jet of pee issued from the tip to arc in a curve towards us. The girls were shrieking with laughter, and one of them went over and stood beside him, lifting her dress and loosing off a great splashing torrent in total contrast. Apparently his foreskin always swelled up if he peed really hard, and I suppose it washed out any dirt that may have gathered under his foreskin. He never complained of soreness or the bad smells you're supposed to get though. He's now married with a small kid and to my knowledge hasn't had any problems.

Although circumcision seems to be an important part of life for people who read Acorn, the kids in our group barely knew of its existence, and I don't remember any of the kids at school being done. Since I left school though, and started doing computer studies, I found one of the blokes on the course has been done and it's a matter of great curiosity, particularly to the girls. From what I can see he is cashing in on this and getting quite a lot of success, but how much of it is due to personal attraction and how much to curiosity, I wouldn't like to say.

What I like about Acorn is the tremendous arguments you get in favour of circumcision on the one hand and foreskins on the other. I think that the women's comments are very amusing too. I'd like to see a little more comment on the other guy's point of view instead of always repeating statements giving their own attitude without acknowledging or commenting on others who think differently. My pet hate? Long-winded geography/history lessons about primitive tribes etc. I'd much rather concentrate on the likes and dislikes of people like me, and advice as to circumcise or not to circumcise – so I've got something to base a decision on.

Stan

Book Request

In 7/94, I was interested to read, at the end, of a book I would like to read:- Bryk, Felix (1934). Would it be possible to offer this in xeroxed form?

[Maybe Tony or Anthony could oblige. — D.A.]

Circumcisers

Members who are seeking a circumciser for their infant sons may like to contact The Initiation Society, which is an orthodox Jewish organisation for Mohelim (ritual circumcisers). The Society can provide names of qualified mohelim in any part of the country.

It should be noted that, although most mohelim will perform circumcisions not only for Jews but also for Moslems and anyone else who requests it, some may choose not to circumcise non-Jews.

Although highly trained and skilled in circumcising baby boys, many mohelims are not medically qualified and hence are unable to perform circumcisions for adults or for boys over 1 year old. In any list obtained from The Initiation Society only those marked as Dr. are medically qualified.

Fees are a matter for individual mohelim and should be discussed directly with them when making arrangements. To obtain details of local mohelim, write to:-

NORM(UK)

I have recently received the latest copy of Acorn and would like to refer to your editorial comments about men who resent their cut state forming a support group.

You may be interested to know that a group is now in existence. The first meeting of NORM(UK), which stands for National Organisation of Restoring Men, took place in London on 19/11/94. Fifteen men attended the meeting including myself and G. of Birmingham. The media are starting to take an active interest in the group and we hope for some good publicity before long.

You may also be interested in a new stretching device called a P.U.D. (Penile Uncircumcising Device) which at the moment can only be obtained from the U.S.

If anyone would like to become a member of NORM, would they please phone 01279 429771.

I was interested to hear, David, that you equated circumcision with wealth, and foreskins with poverty. I equated circumcision with dirty people. Everyone went on about circumcision being for hygiene, so I assumed that people who were circumcised were not to be trusted to keep themselves clean. Strangely enough, most of the people I have come across who have been circumcised also seem to be the least particular with their appearance and personal hygiene.

[I'm sure that many members would be interested in hearing about the meetings. Would it be possible for you to act as our official representative? With regard to your last paragraph, it always amazes me on the things that stick in small boys' minds, and I can see why you have the loathing for your circumcision. I can't really say that I've found any evidence to support your last sentence though. — D.A.]

Sensitivity

I am responding belatedly to an editorial in 1/93 in which David reported on an experiment in keeping his foreskin retracted for a few days, and noted; "After a few minutes I didn't know whether my foreskin was retracted or not". This astonished me as one who was circumcised over 40 years ago and can still feel the difference in being so today. Done aged 8 (unnecessarily!), and having experienced the comfort and protection of a foreskin for those formative years, I can remember the acute sensitivity of the moist glans in those early explorations in the days prior to circumcision. It was comparable to touching an eyeball, and there was no way I would have walked around comfortably with my foreskin retracted. Not long afterwards I was cut and didn't have any choice! The really acute sensations quickly subsided as the glans adjusted to permanent dryness, but never to a level of comfort afforded by my foreskin. Also it still feels as though my foreskin is retracted – it definitely ends (without the roll) at the sulcus – something I can sense without looking or touching. It still feels slightly stretched as it had to do to allow passage over the glans. Presumably because the cut edge has left nerve endings there, nearer the surface.

I feel certain this matter is not, as David suggests, "more in the mind", because the degree of sensation is dependent on my underwear. Tight jockeys hold everything in one place and boxers let it all flop about. Consequently the latter are a bit too stimulating for regular wear. I confided this to a circumcised friend and he finds them the same, whereas a number of my uncircumcised friends seem to prefer the freedom of boxers. (Scope for another Acorn survey here?) A few years ago we were friendly with a couple with whom we exchanged good natured joky banter on the merits of circumcision, he being 'entire'. I sensed his wife wasn't sure about it because she told us her earlier 'long-standing' boyfriend was cut as a baby. On one occasion her husband agreed to experiment by keeping his foreskin retracted for a whole day. At our next meeting his wife laughed and said he'd called the whole thing off by lunchtime because he couldn't endure walking about in such discomfort!

[One only feels as one finds! There are many types and ages of foreskins, and I would imagine a young, tight, or damp one would have these consequences. Mine happens to be short (the tip is never covered), loose and dryish; plus of course having been aided by a lot of wonderful wear and tear. So I take your point. — D.A.]

An Open Letter to 'G' and 'No Choice, Circumcised'

So, you came to adolescence and found that all cocks were not the same. A similar thing happened to me. If you've read "Ian's Tail" (4/93) you will know that I was circumcised at the suggestion of a midwife and that my Mother agreed to the suggestion in a manner that could not be considered as 'informed consent'. When I made the discovery that my foreskin had been cut off with the agreement of a parent I couldn't believe it. I was hurt, mystified, perplexed, call it what you will, and for some time, thoughts about it were constantly in my mind. I mourned the loss of my foreskin. Like all boys I had to handle my cock several times a day to take a leak. Every time I did so there, before me, was my mutilated cock (for those that have not read Ian's Tail, my circumcision was badly done, later surgery correcting the deformity). Matters were not helped by not being able to talk about what I perceived as my problem. It wasn't that I couldn't talk, it was more a question of who would listen without shutting me up in their embarrassment.

As I became older I found that I was bi-sexual. I was a sexually active teenager and seldom lacked a partner when I wanted one. I realised that, even though I'd lost my foreskin, the remainder of my equipment worked splendidly, so it couldn't all be bad!

At 21 years of age I found a regular partner and, one evening, in the course of a jolly romp, I mentioned my disgust at the appearance of my cock, and my regret at not having a foreskin. My partner was not embarrassed. Quietly and gently I was encouraged to talk, and when I had talked myself out, asked to listen. I was told that sex was a part of life, a good part, an important part, an enjoyable part, and that it was doubtful that a few inches of skin would change it very much. I was complimented on other skills and abilities that I possessed. I was understood, valued, perhaps even cherished. I was appreciated for the man that I am, not the man I might have been.

It's some years since I settled down and accepted that I am a roundhead. I know that the only cock that is going to give me the satisfaction of an erection, the joy of ejaculation, and the thrill of orgasm, is the one between my legs. Would I consider stretching or plastic surgery to re-cover my knob? No. My foreskin went into the trashcan years ago. It may be possible to cover my knob, but the skin that did so would not be a foreskin. Life is sweet, challenging, rewarding, and I'm not going to spend time regretting the consequence of a decision in which I had no part.

Ian

Jill's Feelings

I am a 67 year old woman, married for 40 years, and have experienced many strangers' cocks. My husband is a very keen wife-watcher and loves to see me with another man, giving me lots of encouragement to do this, which I don't really need as I love to do it with anybody of any age.

I experienced my first cock when I was 16 so I have had 51 years of different types of cocks. From the beginning I wouldn't like to estimate the times I have had full sexual intercourse with a stranger.

from 16-20 I had a great number from 20-26 I had a fair number from 26-50 I had a great number
from 50-67 I had a fair number

At 67 I still have two lovers, one once a month and the other about twice a week (plus hubby twice a week), so I'm still very active with my sex life. I make the point, not to boast, but to let you realise that I am a woman of experience with regards to men's cocks.

My preference always has been for a cock that has a foreskin. The very first hard erect cock that I saw at 16 gave me a pleasant surprise. I was pleased to play with it, rubbing it up and down. Then I allowed him to slide it into me and enjoyed the super sensation. Maybe I am biased because that first cock was one that had a foreskin.

However, the first time that I went out with a boy who was circumcised, I took it out of his trousers and was shocked at how ugly it looked to me with just a bare knob. I can play so much easier with a cock that has a foreskin, sliding it up and down the full length with the damp knob sliding in and out. When I get a circumcised cock in my hand I feel lost to know what to do, and normally just fondle it, unless I use some oil to make it slippery. So when handling a man's cock my preference is most definitely for a cock with a foreskin, and am always disappointed when a man slips off his underpants and out pops a circumcised cock. I never did refuse it however – just disappointed.

Before a cock slides into me, I like to rub the knob up and down the length of my fanny. This gets it nice and wet and I find this action very, very stimulating. At my age I can still have a strong orgasm simply by rubbing in this way. At this stage it doesn't matter to me whether the cock is circumcised or has a foreskin, as I am only using the tip of the knob.

Now let's get the hard cock inside my hole. If it is circumcised I reckon I feel the difference in sensation. My vagina grips the knob and there is nothing to slide back on the cock, it is just a solid pole. Don't get me wrong – a circumcised cock inside me still feels great, but I feel I am missing some of the extra excitement that a foreskinned cock can give me. It is more like using a plastic vibrator – great fun but no movement on the surface of the cock.

When I am about to receive a cock with a foreskin I always make sure that the foreskin is covering the knob and not pushed back. I try to let it slip in with the foreskin still over the knob, and then not grip the cock with my muscles until I have the full length in my hole.

When either type of cock is being thrust in and out during sex, it feels good and similar, but with the cock with a foreskin, at the end of the inward stroke, I can grip the foreskin, feel the knob sliding out of the foreskin, and the knob then penetrates deeper into me. This is the extra sensation I love, and miss on a circumcised cock. A circumcised cock will still penetrate me deeply but this extra feeling is missing. This again has nothing to do with length of cock, which I don't think makes any difference to good sex. It is nice sometimes to have a young, solid, long cock inside me, but it can also hurt if too rough. I am more concerned to have a very hard cock inside me than worry about its size.

I have played games, being blindfolded before a man undressed, and I can tell 100% when a cock slides into me whether it is circumcised or not. I can also tell hubby's cock out of a selection when blindfolded. A woman's hole is a very sensitive piece of equipment.

Jill

What To Put On It

I have noticed that a number of members who were circumcised at birth or as a child and are dissatisfied with their state complain about a dry glans and lack of sensitivity in it. May I suggest that they get themselves some skin cream containing vitamin E, or even the vitamin E capsules, and massage this into the whole of their penis, paying special attention to the glans, on a regular basis. They will find it has the effect of making the membrane far more sensitive and soft. They can do this before going to bed or get their partner to do it for them as foreplay. But whatever, it certainly does make a difference.

Perhaps Ray Hamble would like to comment from a medical point of view.

On the subject of famous circumcisions, the item below will I am sure be of interest to those purists who say they know who is and isn't cut amongst famous persons. I culled it from the magazine New Moon, which is a Jewish magazine that supports Norwood, which is a charity for Jewish children. It covers a wide range of topics allied to Jewish life for Orthodox to Reform Judaism, from Hetero to Gay Judaism – even lonely hearts.

The article is interesting because it is from Marlon Brando's latest autobiography, Songs My Mother Taught Me. His comments on meditation and pain control are interesting.

Circumcision Decision

The more I have meditated, the more I have been able to control not only stress in my life, but pain. If I have a headache or stub my toe, I'm often able to locate the pain with my mind and will it away. So confident am I of this ability that when I decided a few years ago to be circumcised, I asked the doctor to do it without a painkiller. I assured him that I could eliminate the pain using mind control during the operation. He was sceptical, but said it would be an interesting medical experience, and he scheduled the operation. But when I arrived at the hospital, what seemed like its entire medical staff was waiting to witness the event. The prospect of seeing a movie star circumcised without anaesthesia must have been a hot topic of discussion in the doctors' lounge. I didn't welcome the presence of uninvited guests, and since I go by instinct, I went home.

Later a different doctor agreed to do the operation without painkillers, but he became frightened and an anaesthetist was waiting for me when I kept my appointment. He said that because of medical ethics, he couldn't circumcise me without using a painkiller. Disappointed and angry, but tired of the delays, I let the anaesthetist give me a shot in my back.

Nevertheless, I still wanted to show the doctors what I could do, and I told them to take my blood pressure. I had already meditated, brought my blood pressure down more than twenty points, and even put myself into one of those moments of satori that I rarely achieve. To this day, I'm sure that if they hadn't given me the shot, I would have felt no pain.

Stitch

I am 41 now, but one night, many years ago, I was about 17 and inexperienced in sex matters. I was making love to my girlfriend in the front room of her parents' house. It was in the late sixties and I think we had the Moody Blues on. Anyway, I think I must have entered her too soon, and I guess she must have been quite dry, because I tore my foreskin. I don't know the technical name for the bit that I tore; I have a friend who calls it a 'stitch', which I think is quite descriptive. It's the piece that seems to attach the prepuce to the glans. I'd say that the tear was about 1 cm deep, resulting in a 2 cm long wound. Obviously there was blood everywhere, but it seemed to heal up pretty quickly, and has left an almost invisible white line of scar tissue.

Since then I've read and heard the odd thing about foreskins. I know that some men have difficulty pulling the foreskin back over the head of their penis; I've heard the arguments about circumcision repeatedly. But it's only recently that I've realised that the incident above was probably a lucky break. Even before that night I had no problem pulling my foreskin back, but since then I've been able to pull it back a further 2 cm. When erect, I can pull my foreskin fully back; there is no tension in my 'stitch', and my penis looks circumcised. When flaccid, the foreskin covers the head so there is no loss of sensitivity.

The following is an item from The Independent of November 15th. A member sent me the story in a Birmingham newspaper when it occurred, but there were no details of why the boy died. Two things come to my mind. Doesn't the law grind along slowly. This doctor could have been a psychopath. Secondly, as in a recent case, you can get thrown into prison for being afraid to be a witness, but just get a wiggling for killing a little boy. But then, I must remember it's not my job here to criticise our legal system. — D.A.

G.P Suspended over Circumcision Death

A doctor who gave a nine-year-old boy a massive overdose of drugs, including heroin, for a circumcision operation – after which the child died – was found guilty of serious professional misconduct yesterday.

The drugs injected by Dr Mahbubul Alam were “wholly inappropriate”, the General Medical Council's professional conduct committee was told. The committee ordered the doctor to be suspended from the medical register for eight months, beginning in 28 days, pending any appeal.

Dr Alam injected Raju Miah with more than three times the recommended amount of diamorphine – heroin – and excess amounts of the tranquilliser Stemetil. Raju was the last of four boys aged between 7 and 10 circumcised by Dr Alam in July 1991. The other three boys recovered consciousness, but Raju remained unconscious and died in hospital on August 7th. 1991 from respiratory failure due to narcotic poisoning.

Earlier this year, at Stafford Crown Court, Dr Alam, of Handsworth Road, Birmingham, admitted manslaughter. He was given a 12-month jail sentence, suspended for a year, and ordered to pay £3000 costs.

And now a cutting sent by a member from Wales, found in the letters page of the current edition of Health and Efficiency.

And More On

I should not wish my name or town to be quoted, as I am writing about circumcision – a subject which seems to interest many readers.

I had myself circumcised at the age of 60. It cost £200 and was worth every penny. It was a 'walk-away' operation. The organ was bandaged up for a week; then I had a bath and removed the bandage; it was bruised black and blue, not a pretty sight. In another week the bruising had gone, and after another week the stitching had gone.

I would say it was 'uncomfortable' rather than 'painful', but I was determined to end a condition of discomfort and misery lasting so long. The uncleanness was the worst part of being uncircumcised. Owing to our English prudery, I was left to discover for myself at the age of 10 how necessary it is to wash there. I wonder how many men wash sufficiently to remain clean. In some conditions it must be impossible to wash.

Female cervical cancer may be due to male partners being unclean through not being circumcised. I think all male babies should be circumcised at birth as a routine matter. If all American babies are circumcised at birth, it would be interesting to compare the incidence of cervical cancer there with the incidence here or in, for example, Catholic countries.

A picture of an uncircumcised man in your magazine fills me with horror, how could anyone be so primitive.

[There's none so righteous as the newly converted. I'm sorry he never learnt to wash himself in 50 years. His ears and bum must be terrible. — D.A.]

Young Tricks

This little story may be of interest to our readers. It concerns myself, a friend, and his brother. At the time we were 16 and the brother 15. We all attended a school in the middle of London, but at the time had our sportsground at what was then the outskirts of town. In midweek we all journeyed to the ground, and also on Saturdays if there was something special on – a football match or sports day. Midweek, everyone travelled from the school to the ground by train, but made our own way there on Saturdays.

Now, this is a somewhat comic story of masturbation, the way it happened, and one could say the outcome of the action. We could not put our plan into action travelling to the ground as the carriages were too crowded, but on the return journey was when it all happened. The drill was for the three of us to go to the back of the train, get a vacant carriage, and keep it for ourselves. As soon as the carriage was clear of the platform, it was quickly to undo our flies, and out with our already standing cocks, then to masturbating ourselves or one another. We were soon able to be able to time the length of our action before 'coming' to occur between stations. We had to be on the alert that the train did not pull up in front of a signal box.

My two friends were Jewish, so they were circumcised, but I was not, so we both found each other's penis very exciting. At our age our penises were then of adult size, but the brother a year younger was still just short of being full grown, although still a very useful tool. We were returning to London, my friend and I sitting with our backs to the direction of travel, with his brother opposite; all three busy with our penises, by this time quite erect. On the next line a fast train was slowly overtaking ours. The implications of this didn't register with us for a second. Suddenly we saw a lady of about 30 peering in the window at us. Quickly she was joined by a second girl. As their train went by, we two passed out of their view, but his brother was still in their line of vision and he still continued with what he was doing. By the look on the ladies' faces they seemed to have enjoyed it also.

Just a little story of long ago which I thought might be of interest. I wonder if any other members have little memories of this nature. They would be good to read.

No Balls

An open letter to Tom, N. Yorks, Issue 7/94.

I must be completely opposite to you. Firstly, I wake up nine out of ten mornings with a hard on. If my wife touches me in bed I get hard. If I think of sex or see sexy films I get hard. I wish I could exchange 20% of my overpotence for some of your impotence.

Have you ever thought about having a prince albert fitted to the end of your knob. It's a stainless steel ring that goes in through the urethra and comes out on the underside (frenulum). The piercing is small, doesn't even bleed, and only takes a few minutes to do. It's very suitable for circumcised men and almost guarantees you'll wake up with an erection every morning after you have it fitted. Plus it will add extra excitement keeping you harder when you push it up against the end of the vagina deep inside your girl.

I also envy you with a circumcised penis. Mine still has its full foreskin on, which I would like to lose (but haven't had the balls to make an appointment for a circumcision to be done on me yet).

I would be more than willing to tell you or your girlfriend about a penis with a foreskin. Perhaps you could tell me about a circumcised one, like, when you have intercourse, does your shaft skin slide in and out as you move? This I think will be the main difference because, at the moment, when I slide my penis right into my wife, my shaft skin stays still in her fanny entrance, and my knob with the inner and outer foreskin slides up and down inside her, unless I move more than two or three inches.

Also, is the scar line very wide; does it have feeling in it or has the scar almost disappeared? Also, does it not hurt a circumcised penis when you pull your shaft skin back? Can you masturbate without lubrication? These are some of the things I would like to know about a cock without a foreskin. Feel free to ask any questions you want about an uncircumcised penis.

[P.S. to Tom – The frenulum (or frenum) is the small strip of skin on the underside of your knob. You've also got one under your tongue, but that doesn't have all the beautiful nerve endings like your cock one. See 'Stitch'. — D.A.]

Circumcision and Masturbation

In March 1994, HIM magazine, in which my medical advice column had appeared for many years, ceased publication and I was transferred back to Zipper magazine – a title to which I had contributed yonks and yonks ago. Zipper carries more erotic male nude photos than HIM used to do and I get the impression from the agony letters I receive nowadays that it has an older readership, many of whom are solo masturbators using the pictures as ‘wanking fodder’.

Emerging from this correspondence is a clear distinction between the masturbation techniques of those who are circumcised and those who are not. Not surprisingly, those without a foreskin tend to apply direct friction to their glans, using their fingers or clenched hand, whilst those who are uncut seem more inclined to grip their penile shaft and rely upon the mobility of their foreskin, thrust to and fro over the glans, to produce the required sensations. Also, as anticipated, circumcised guys are more disposed towards the use of lubrication than the uncircumcised.

Thoughts around these differences lead me to seek the views of Acorn readers. Would those who are cut and those who are uncut care to comment, anonymously if they so wish, on their own techniques in order that a more comprehensive picture may be built up of specific differences in masturbatory behaviour and experience? I hesitate to compile a formal questionnaire because I’m sure to leave out a crucial question simply because I’m not exactly sure what to ask. However I’ll be more than happy to collate the information generated and, of course, I’ll reply personally to all those whose name and address accompanies their comments. The more wide-ranging the replies the more information will be gleaned. Indeed, perhaps ‘masturbation techniques’ is itself an inadequate question. In a nutshell, what are the differences in all forms of sexual arousal between the cut and the uncut, whether it be wanking, wet dreams or whatever?

Editorial

A part from reminding all that we are now entering our 8th year, a length of time not envisaged by anyone at the start (and we still have quite a few members who were in at the beginning, so we can't have been too repetitive or boring), I'll just say that we are now also entering a new era and leave you for a moment in the capable hands of Vernon, who drew up this new draft —

Constitution

With this issue of Acorn you will find a draft constitution for The Acorn Society. This will be discussed and voted upon at the first AGM of the Group on 1st April. (See page 16.) I know it is not as interesting to read as Acorn itself, but please do take time to do so and to prepare any comments that you may have.

David indicated in his editorial to the last issue why the Group needs to be democratised. If that is to happen then it needs to have a Constitution, which must be approved at a General Meeting.

Constitutions are the legal basis on which organisations are run. They define why the organisation exists, who can join, how the subscription is to be determined, how the organisation is administered, and how the money is to be looked after.

Of necessity, a Constitution is fairly large and complex, but we have tried to strike a balance between specifying all that is essential for the Society to run as a balanced and harmonious group and, on the other hand, dotting every i and crossing every t in totally incomprehensible legal jargon.

It is important to remember that an organisation can only do what its Constitution's 'Objects' clause says it can do. However, it is not obliged to do absolutely everything in this clause, nor do it all at once. Hence, provision has to be made for what might want to be done in future as funds, etc. permit.

The clauses about meetings and ballots may seem complex, but with a membership spread all over the country (and some overseas) it will not be economical for the committee to all meet in one place every time a decision needs to be taken. Nor for the membership to always have to come together when their consent to something is required. Provision has therefore been made to allow most committee work to be conducted by telephone or post, and for some decisions of the membership to be by postal ballot. Neither stops a physical meeting from being held if that is considered more desirable.

Formal notice of the AGM and a form of proxy will be enclosed with issue 2/95. Please support the democratisation of the Society by either attending the AGM or appointing a proxy to vote on your behalf. Comments on the Constitution can be raised at the meeting, but time can be saved if you put them in writing to me via David as soon as possible so that we can sort them out and see their effects on the Constitution as a whole. We would also like to hear from anyone who wishes to be proposed for the Committee.

Finally, if there are any solicitors or accountants amongst our membership who would be prepared to offer their services to The Society (in confidence if necessary), then we would like to hear from you.

Rest of 'Open Letter 8/94'

I am, in general, opposed to the circumcision of young boys other than for medical or religious reasons. I do understand the desire for sons to be like their fathers or brothers, particularly if there is to be a modest degree of family nudity. I would support any man who decided that he wanted to be circumcised. It is a personal choice, and one should be free to exercise choice freely.

Do I, just occasionally, speculate about what it would be like to have a foreskin? Yes, of course I do! My bank statement dropped through the letterbox last Wednesday (the same day as Acorn). Thankfully I am in credit, but I did wonder what it would be like to have a credit balance with 6 figures before the decimal. No, I have not bought tickets for the lottery.

Ian

[We don't know who Amanda is, but I have had two requests for correspondence with her. Here is one from a French member, showing not a little frustration with enquiries he has made on his favourite subject. — D.A.]

Amanda

Dear Amanda,

Your letter in Acorn really inspired me very much. The first time I have read somebody with apparently the same orientation as myself. For a very long time I have wanted to know what is the best kind of circumcision.

Here in France it is incredible how taboo it is. What is more exasperating is that I have met many women who are pro circumcision, but I could never find their real reason. I'm beginning to suspect that they all had sex with Arabs, whom they had liked, and that they are afraid to speak about it in case someone guesses what they have done.

But it seems improbable that it is the only reason. Absolutely everybody avoids the subject, and there are never any details on circumcision in magazines, books or pornography. Circumcision is the operation for phimosis. That's all.

I have tried to talk about it to a large number of psychologists and psychiatrists. They all refuse to answer the root of the question. But what has really surprised me were those women who were very pro circumcision, who got their babies circumcised because it was cleaner. Some talked very easily on sex, but when I asked them what kind of circumcision did they believe was better – the wall. I tried to tell them that primitives were usually not interested in hygiene. Just the same – the wall.

I would be very pleased if you or someone else would write more of the same kind. Imagine that a man that you love feels like getting circumcised and asks you your opinion and advice. What would you say? Only a woman can really answer to that – dicks are made for pussies.

Loving Cut — Two

I was interested to read Ms Carrington's article in a recent issue of Acorn, and greatly admire her determination to help her partner with his little problem, and his courage in complying with her wishes. May they long enjoy the result.

A short frenulum severely restricts the free movement of the foreskin and may be damaged by normal sexual activities. I personally can cite four such cases:-

1. A close relative ruptured his frenulum during loveplay (not intercourse) with his fiancée.
2. As a teenager my frenulum split while strongly retracting my foreskin. Later I cut the remaining tie to improve freedom of movement (and never regretted doing so).
3. Two comrades in the RAF suffered a similar injury during intercourse, both with the same female partner who was reputed to have a very narrow vagina.

Earlier this century it was customary in Peru to sever a baby boy's frenulum, but a complete circumcision was not performed. Also, Felix Bryk's book describes how young boys would cut themselves likewise to attain full retraction of the prepuce.

Some writers have considered the frenulum to be analogous with the female hymen. I quote from correspondence in a 1974 issue of H & E:

"The foreskin is intended by nature to prevent too promiscuous mutual intercourse in youth, the pain of pressure on the part of the contracting parties delaying the double rape until the last possible moment of courtship."

"In the last century a woman's crowning ambition was to learn that she had, with her hymen, severed what was then called (and is no longer) the G-string that underpins the foreskin of the glans."

I cannot quite agree that nature intended the foreskin as a check on promiscuity, and doubt many swains were as virginal as is indicated here. But it is a romantic picture, and would certainly be a memorable experience for the lucky few who sacrificed their cherries simultaneously in this manner.

In conclusion, I consider the frenulum to be a disposable structure, which should be removed if it limits movement of the foreskin or causes discomfort during foreplay or intercourse.

I would be interested in readers' opinions on this subject.

Now to other matters. The 'new look' newsletter is both restrained and dignified, and this format should be retained. Many thanks to both the designers and producers.

R.F.W's desire to read the Felix Bryk classic raises the question of its availability and, if so, what demand would there be? And at what price?

A survey of members would be interesting in this respect.

The Ring

The article by Amanda Carrington in 7/94 is interesting in regard to the penis ring which her boyfriend uses. However, from the description I cannot understand exactly how it works ie. how does the foreskin cover the ring? Perhaps it is to do with whereabouts the ring is positioned, or its width. Could you ask Amanda for more details including where the rings are obtained from, the price and the name of the magazine in which they are advertised.

Confused

A few years ago, at the age of 10 or thereabouts, my cousin Alice, who was five years older than me, took me Christmas shopping in London. As we walked among the crowds in Oxford Street we saw a sight which I've never forgotten. A scruffy-looking boy about my age was coming towards us weaving through the crowds when suddenly he stopped, undid his trousers, produced a big fat willy, and started peeing down the drain! The crowds swirling around him pretended, in true British fashion, not to notice; but Alice and I were so astounded we just stood and watched. The boy, who had a defiant smirk on his face, saw us looking and winked while he went on pissing. Such a thing was totally unthinkable where I had been brought up, and the fact that this boy could expose his penis and urinate so nonchalantly in full view of everybody just took my breath away.

It wasn't just that though that held me riveted. What I couldn't fail to notice was how different this boy's penis was from my brothers', both of whom had a small round tomato on the end, while this lad's tapered to a long nozzle of corrugated skin. As he saw us watching him, he wagged his penis up and down for our benefit and tugged at the tip, stretching it as he went on peeing.

This brought Alice and I back to earth with a bang and we walked on, giggling our heads off.

Although such a sight was not common then in this country (I'm told it has become more so since kids have taken up drinking lager), I have recently had a similar experience when on holiday in the Black Forest. I was walking through a crowded market in Friburg when a young respectable-looking fellow with glasses and a briefcase, suddenly stopped, whipped out his cock, and started peeing unconcernedly into a tub with a miniature tree in it. Once again I couldn't help hesitating as I wandered along so as to take a long look at his penis as he did so, struck by how similar it looked to that of the rude London boy. He saw me staring and frowned indignantly, as though it were the most natural thing in the world to expose your penis and urinate in front of scores of housewives doing their shopping. Perhaps it was, in Friburg.

Anyway, to go back to my original story. As we left the pissing boy behind, I still couldn't believe my eyes, and said as much to Alice, who still couldn't stop giggling. Later we talked about it more calmly, and I told Alice how different it seemed from my brothers with their tomatoes stuck on the end, and it was then that I first found out about circumcision. Alice who was knowledgeable about such things, explained that my brothers had both had their willies circumcised because it was the done thing for people from our background. Mother always referred to it as the boy's 'little gentleman', and I've since discovered that a circumcised willy was considered the hallmark of a gentleman in those days.

Alice went on to satisfy my curiosity by telling me that circumcision meant cutting off the foreskin in childhood and that it provided a lot of benefits. She said that foreskins were nasty, dirty, smelly things which gave boys lots of trouble in later life, and nice girls wouldn't have anything to do with them! It was thus made clear to me that circumcision in a boy was not just desirable, it was mandatory for a girl with a proper British upbringing to insist on it!

What I didn't know was how quickly and easily such convictions can be forgotten – although temporarily – when you meet someone you really fall for. My very first serious boyfriend at college proved to have a long tight foreskin, and I really couldn't have cared less. Naturally, with my background, I did comment on it and asked him why he hadn't been done. He seemed puzzled, and asked me instead why I thought he should be. I told him what Alice had said, at which he was quite offended. Then he called me a silly goose and asked me if I had any complaints about the state of cleanliness of his willy. I had to admit that there was absolutely nothing to complain about, and the subject was never mentioned again.

Eventually I married a man who conformed to my family's ideal in that he was circumcised. By now I had enough experience to know that the derogatory remarks made by my cousin about foreskins were rather exaggerated, but I still kept at the back of my mind the comforting thought that circumcision conferred a mark of respectability, if not superiority, on a male, and had no qualms about my husband's missing foreskin.

However, the subject was brought to the forefront of our attention on the birth of our son a few weeks ago. We both instinctively feel that he ought to be circumcised as the 'right thing', but recently there has been a barrage of anti-circumcision publicity in the health pages of the press – The Independent in particular – copies of which I have kept for reference, which I enclose. Firstly there was a rather breath-catching full-page spread about an American book on the reversal of circumcision which catered for the large numbers of men there who feel bad about being circumcised, with the book being reviewed sympathetically by the lady editor.

Then there was a letter from a consultant who commented unfavourably on the fact that parents can elect to have boys circumcised, whilst it was a serious offence to do it to girls. In giving reasons, he explained that there was mounting evidence that the loss of the foreskin caused harm throughout a male's life, since it detracted from pleasure during sexual arousal, destroyed specialised nerve endings, and often left a man with mechanical sexual problems due to insufficient skin being left. The other point he made was that many men are badly affected psychologically, as is borne out by the American experience mentioned above.

Another letter which was published in June was from a man who had been circumcised in adulthood and who complained about a loss of sensitivity, confirmed by his wife.

Finally, the lady health correspondent published a report the other day from an official Australian medical publication, Genitourinary Medicine, that the view that circumcision protects against sexually transmitted diseases is a myth.

Consequently, I and my husband have been having second thoughts about whether to treat Junior to the snip or not. We are not totally naive, and since all these reports originated from the same paper (and the same lady editor), it did occur to us that the paper might have an unreasonable bias against circumcision, despite the fairly compelling evidence produced. Our GP however gave a similar view and told us there wouldn't be the slightest hope of getting him done under the National Health, and that we'd have to go private. When I voiced our misgivings, based on long-term views, based on family custom, he suggested rather curtly that if I didn't believe him I should refer to the baby books and take their advice. So I did. There are dozens of such books available now, a lot of which don't even mention circumcision, merely advising on foreskin care. The others dismiss the operation as being unnecessary and occasionally dangerous. Even one American baby book did not advocate circumcision as such, merely mentioning it as an alternative, whilst stressing that there were no medical grounds for it.

The upshot is that, under this mass of anti-circumcision advice, and with no contrary view of any substance, we have finally and somewhat reluctantly decided that Junior shall retain his foreskin. I only hope that we have done the right thing, and would greatly appreciate comment from your members on what to me is a highly confusing issue.

[I won't publish the articles mentioned as Penelope has adequately described them, and we have published bits of them before. — D.A.]

French Phimosis

A French Sexologist doctor has written a small thesis on the natural cure of phimosis.

He has worked especially with teenagers and explained to them how to pull regularly on their foreskins. He says that in a month it is usually cured and his patients were very pleased to have the benefit of such a simple therapy. He says too, that in the hundreds of cases he has handled, he has never sent one to a surgeon.

To illustrate what he says, he shows a photograph of a negro with a very large plate in the lip and asks if there is a limit to the extensibility of tissue; and the foreskin being much softer than the lip, it is much easier.

He believes that phimosis comes from the prohibition of masturbation; that if little boys were left to their own devices, they would play and pull their pricks around and the problem wouldn't occur. So, if what he says is true, circumcision is 'never necessary'.

The thesis (with colour photographs) is available for 130 French francs from: A.M.E., Boite Postale 220, 92108 Boulogne Cedex, France.

It is called Traitement medical du phimosis congenital de l'adolescent, by Dr Michel Beauge. He lives in: 6, rue Parc, 29000 Quimper, France.

Tight as a Drum

I had always wanted to be circumcised just as long as I can remember. It all began when my father used to wash underneath my foreskin and told me that I should always keep it clean.

I asked him why he didn't have a penis that looked like mine, and he told me that this was because he had been cut as a baby. I asked him why I hadn't been done when I was a neonate and he replied that he had asked the doctors at the time, but they suggested that these days it wasn't done routinely and not to worry.

Both my Mum and my Dad were quite keen for me to be cut as a baby because my foreskin, even then, seemed pretty long. As a young boy my Dad often said that I may have problems when I'm older, and that if I did, I should tell him and he would sort everything out.

Well, at 15, I eventually made up my mind that I wanted to be cut just like my Dad, and told him that I wanted to see our GP. Within one week I had my appointment. Only one problem though, my penis was fully functional and didn't need circumcising!

The only thing that I had tried that made any difference to the appearance of my knob was the addition of superglue, which gave it the look of having phimosis. This went down well with the GP who didn't suspect a thing and referred me on to the hospital urologist.

One month later I had an appointment to meet with him, and he was more than happy, even after examining me and putting up with my story about having a tight foreskin, to circumcise me. I remember him telling me all about the operation, that it would be a complete circumcision, and that I would be 'completely circumcised back.'

The waiting list was only one month and I could hardly believe that this charade had worked so well. My father thought it rather ironic that he had asked for me to be cut at birth because it was a bit of a family tradition, and that in the end I needed it anyway. When I went to the hospital I met two other blokes there who were to be circumcised the following day, just like me. Neither of them seemed to know much about what the operation involved and what was going to be removed. I got them straight on a few facts and then we shared experiences and stories. Both of them were older than me – in their twenties.

On the day of the op I quickly checked that the superglue I had applied that morning was still working. Then I awaited my turn to go under the surgeon's knife. On awakening I couldn't believe that it had actually been done until I was alone with the curtains drawn and I could see for myself what the surgeon had done. I was disappointed because, even though there was a lot of swelling, I was sure that the surgeon hadn't removed enough of my prepuce. Before the op I had an overhang of foreskin of at least an inch, and the glans was ultra sensitive so much that when I had an erection I couldn't touch it with my hand as the sensation was too intense.

As the wound healed my worst fears were confirmed. During the flaccid state there was a lot of skin bunching behind the glans, and when I was particularly cold this would encroach markedly over the corona of the helmet and look as though I almost had my foreskin back again. I was resigned at the time to having it remain like that, besides which, during an erection it looked fine and improved my sexual enjoyment no end.

Two years later I met my present boyfriend who surprised me one day by saying that he was proud of my circumcised cock and wished that he had been cut as a baby. He was under the impression that, at 23, he couldn't do anything about it. I was pleased and surprised to hear him talk on the subject, and proceeded to tell him how it was possible to get his cock cut on the NHS if he was willing to do a little play acting and invest in a tube of superglue.

He eventually decided to give it a go, but wanted me to help because he didn't know exactly where to place all the glue. He fooled his GP no problem and was referred on to the surgeons. Unfortunately, at the surgical consultation, the doctor decided that my partner needed only his frenulum cut, an operation called a frenuloplasty, to relieve his problems of phimosis. It seemed that we hadn't spread the glue enough over his helmet, and it must have collected all around the frenulum, thus looking a less severe form of phimosis. We decided to go for the op in the mind that we could always try again and say that the original op was unsuccessful. This wasn't necessary however.

Doug, my partner, on the day of the op spoke to the surgeon personally and asked him the difference between a full circumcision and a frenuloplasty. The doctor said that it didn't take much longer to do but took longer to heal afterwards. Doug told him that he wouldn't like to come back to have a full circumcision done a second time if this op failed. He also said that he'd prefer a full circumcision to start off with, so that he could guarantee the surgery would be successful.

After consulting the senior surgeon a full circumcision was agreed and done. When I met him at his parents' house that evening I was still under the impression that he had had a frenuloplasty and didn't know until he showed me his newly cut and exposed knob end that he had been fully cut back. The skin that remained on the shaft was nice and tight. The scarline was 1 inch from the lip of the helmet, and his helmet bulged about 4mm away from the shaft on all sides. It was a fine sight. He was very happy with the result and soon fully healed in 3 weeks.

Now, 4 years after this, Doug and I were still together and kept going on about how much loose skin was present on my erect and flaccid cock (I could still move some of the shaft skin over the corona when erect). I had just discovered Acorn and how other people had had revisions done on their cocks to improve the appearance. This discovery really excited me and I quickly got the names and addresses of several recommended doctors who were sympathetic to patients having revised circumcisions purely on cosmetic/psychological grounds. I excitedly phoned up my final choice and had a frank discussion over the phone as to the cost and what exactly I wanted done. Then I made an appointment for two weeks later.

Doug drove me there and I wore a jockstrap and tracksuit bottoms so that I had support but not too much pressure. When I rang the doorbell the doctor quickly answered and asked us both in. I was expecting that Doug would have to wait in the car but the doctor invited him into the study/operating room with me. He asked me whether I wished Doug to stay and I said yes.

He quickly got me to lie down on his couch and take off my trousers and jockstrap, and then asked me why I had been circumcised and when. He asked Doug whether he wanted to be cut too and was genuinely interested when he said he'd already been done. The doctor remarked as to the amount of spare skin that was bunched behind my helmet and asked if I wanted this removed so that it was 'nice and tight'. This was exactly what I wanted. He then asked if I wanted the scar near the helmet or halfway down the shaft. I knew exactly what I wanted and requested it to be up near the glans.

I watched the whole op because it was done under local. At one point Doug actually came over and assisted the Doctor because the stitching took such a long time. The Doctor pointed out that this scar should be much neater than the previous one because of the number of stitches that he had put in place. Soon my cock was bandaged up and in my jockstrap. I quickly went to the loo and came back into the room to see the Doctor inspecting what kind of job Doug had done 4 years previously. The Doctor said that it was very neat and tidy for an NHS job. I was very satisfied with the operation, the Doctor telling me exactly what he was doing at every stage. As we left he asked me to come back in 6 weeks time "when you'll be able to show off your new cock", he said.

The swelling soon decreased and I was pleasantly surprised how the new cut had produced the 'tight as a drum' look that I had always desired. Even when flaccid the helmet was totally exposed and not even the smallest flap remained to cover the glans. Wanking is now very intense as there is now only a very small area near the tip of my cock that is really sensitive. Also, the helmet seems to have increased in size, the corona become more flared and prominent. This also happened to Doug's cock. I'm very pleased with the result and would recommend a revision operation to anyone who considers it.

Diverse Thoughts

I intend this to be my last letter for the foreseeable future since by now you have a backlog of several, and there's little point in writing yet more. Not a whiff of complaint, mark you. I've said before that I've had a pretty fair crack of the whip in your columns and all the new blood needs to be given a chance. I only hope that the next time a 'saga' comes wafting in on the breeze that you'll suppress it in favour of whatever backlog of letters you have, including mine. Incidentally, the only sagas so far have mostly been tedious epics terminating inevitably in the sublime state of circumcision. If you should ever succumb to the temptation again, how about one lauding the benefits of foreskin retention? Of course it will not enjoy the tense wind-up to the finale of the flashing scalpel with subsequent catharsis all round and sighs of relief – "Got rid of the fucking thing at last!" Strange what turns people on though!

On this subject, David, you must have developed an eye for the genuine letter and those that are not. For example, although I really enjoy reading the letters from the ladies, and applaud their general objectivity – and tendency to treat the cock as a joke rather than the crown jewels, I can't help feeling that one or two in the past may have stemmed from the same pen – probably male. Certainly the last two in 7 and 8/94 (Amanda and Jill) gave me pause for thought. The language used by one ("hard cock inside my hole...") is not really what you'd expect even from a tough old taggy up Kings Cross – more like a contribution by a Forum pud-puller. The other one, smacking her lips at getting spattered with blood as she slices through her boyfriend's penile parts is so reminiscent! Anyway, it's still so much more entertaining than the anthropological stuff which I don't think was even mentioned as a preference in your questionnaire.

I've already told you how pleased I was to find 'Anon' in 6/94 having a go at me, and noted how pleased he said he was at being circumcised. Hello, I thought, we've got a bit of a tiger here. So what a let-down to find in 7/94 that, instead of swaggering up to a girl and proudly confronting her with his splendidly de-frocked ding-dong with the words, "How about that one then?", he is diffidently and defensively imploring her not to be rude about it! But as Rabbi Lionel Blue told me on a recent visit to Bedford, "Don't take it too heavy, my friend".

I must say I was surprised and delighted to see that The Daily Telegraph has at last deigned to mention our subject. I had virtually written it off as too stuffy, unlike The Independent with its gallant lady foreskin defenders, The Guardian as ever with its penchant for the minority view, and the noble example of The Times which, after the war, supported Gairdner's campaign against pernicious and unnecessary surgery, culminating in its scoop in reporting Princess Diana's courageous stand against the Palace circumcisers. You have to admit, David, that the campaign against circumcision is rising to a crescendo – from all quarters. What about asking if any of our readers have actually changed their minds over the last year or two as a result of what they've read in Acorn or anywhere else?

I was happy to see that a few more disgruntled 'circumcisees' (boom boom!) have decided to come out of the woodwork, and that I'm no longer a lone voice crying in the wilderness. I can't wait to see what Norm-UK turns out to be.

So, as we launch ourselves into 1995 with a cry of "Earwiggo, earwiggo, earwiggo", I wish you and your ladyfriend all the best in the coming year. Happy New Year to All.

Water Jet Surgery

I thought members might be interested in the following item which appeared in The New Scientist, 23/7/94. The circumcision application, as an alternative to laser surgery, is obvious. According to Tomorrow's World, the technique dramatically reduces blood loss as blood vessels can be exposed, to be cut and sutured. (They showed a liver operation.)

'A cutting device that uses high pressure liquid could soon be replacing the surgeon's traditional stainless-steel scalpel, following the successful testing of a prototype in Germany.

A German engineer has designed the system, which uses a pump to force sterile water-based cutting liquid through tiny nozzles at pressures up to 150 bar. The resulting water jets were found to slice through animal livers, kidneys and hearts causing minimal damage to blood vessels and nerves.

It may be possible to couple the water jet to surgical lasers, which are being used increasingly for a wide range of surgical techniques ranging from cataract removal to hernia operations. But the optical fibre that brings the laser beam to the tissue to be cut off overheats and must be replaced. The German engineers want to replace the last few millimetres of the optical fibre with a low pressure water jet, thus reducing the heating of the tissue.'

Boxer Shorts

My nephew, aged 30 and cut at 5 months due to a tight foreskin (according to the clinic nurse), asked his Missus to sew up the flies in his boxers. His cock kept poking through and rubbing against the zip of his jeans, which he found very uncomfortable. Incidentally his own son is still intact – whenever the subject has arisen (twice in my presence) my nephew kept very quiet. I take it therefore as read that he does not agree, but I would love to discuss it with him though! My sister is very pro, as was my nephew's father (her first hubbie). He wasn't cut though.

Masturbation

I have always applied friction directly to the knob, even when a cavalier. I always found moving skin over the knob, or up and down the shaft, a real turn off and I lose the erection. It was one of the principal reasons I wanted to be circumcised – I still want a ‘drumskin tight’ cut so partners must stimulate the knob.

I personally do not find much additional stimulation from baby oil. Two Jewish friends adore it, and I love applying it! Incidentally, they are both very tender after coming, as is a Muslim friend. I must confess to enjoying continuing stimulation after they have come – they leap and yell (as I do when the roles are reversed), but I carry on regardless, telling them to complain to their mohel/sunnarsi, not me!! (I think it must be the fact that they have nothing to protect the glans, despite what I do, that I find a turn on. Perhaps Ray Hamble would like to comment.)

J.T. – Westcliff

From Birth Forward

Had my mother not been so frugal, I suspect that I would have been circumcised at birth (early 30's) as our family doctor probably favoured it. I was seven years old when my brother was born and remember being called in while the doctor was visiting. He made me drop my shorts and then retracted my foreskin. I don't remember my reaction at the time, nor his remarks to my mother, but it did, I think, trigger my interest in cocks! Certainly as a result three or four of us local boys inspected each other's cocks. My first encounter with a circumcised cock, which we all inspected closely, was some time during the war when some evacuees joined us. We used to play naked in the local brook.

At boarding school, I reckon that my peer group was divided roughly 50-50. By the age of thirteen, when we had medical checks, my foreskin was quite loose, and I enjoyed rolling it back in the bath and washing it well.

Some twenty years ago when I was working in the tropical heat of Nigeria, I used to get very sweaty and sometimes a little sore around the genitals. I found that keeping the area shaved prevented this. Also at that time I conditioned my foreskin to remain retracted at all times, since when, I think the glans rim has enlarged, making it less easy to draw the foreskin forward, which suits me as I prefer the glans uncovered.

I have occasionally thought of having some of the excess skin removed to make for a smoother shaft, but don't really consider the cost justifiable.

Since contracting malaria in 1990, I have also developed diabetes, needing injections twice daily. This seems to have reduced my sexual capabilities, which is more worrying than the form of my penis!

As my parents were both from large families, I have a plethora of cousins worldwide. Of the ones I know about,  $\frac{1}{3}$  are circumcised.

Books

In reply to the enquiry by G. – Birmingham in Issue 7/94:-

The Joy of Uncircumcising by Jim Bigelow is available from UNCIRC, PO Box 52138, Pacific Grove, CA 93950 at $16.95 plus postage and packing. This is going to be more than the $2 quoted for U.S. rate but unfortunately I cannot remember how much they charged me some two years ago.

Two more books in the same vein:-

Decircumcision by Gary Griffin, available from Second Skin, 1335 Kentucky Street, Dept. 5, New Orleans, LA 70117 at $14.95

Say No To Circumcision by Thomas Ritter, available from NOCIRC, PO Box 2512, San Anselmo, CA 94979 at $10.95 plus P & P.

This organisation also produces a good deal of anti-circumcision literature and information.

What a Business!

Submitted by an Acorn member, taken from Bedside Manna, by Rabbi Lionel Blue.

A lady passes a shop with clocks in the window. She goes in and says to the old man behind the counter, "I'd like to buy a watch. What do you recommend?"

"I know nothing about watches," he says, "I am not a watchmaker."

"Then what are you?" she asks tartly.

"I am a Jewish ritual circumciser", he says.

"Then why do you have all those watches and clocks in the window", says the lady indignantly.

"Madam", he replies wearily, "What should I put in the window?"

Words

Anthony betrays he's had a good classical education in 'Words' 8/94. He and others may be interested to know that I mischievously coined the word 'circumcisee' as a derivative to 'amputee'. Would you admit it describes, more precisely, the same thing? In my account 'Anxieties' 3/94, I mentioned that the word 'circumcised' didn't enter my vocabulary until early teens. It was explained in a scripture lesson by a red-faced male teacher responding to the provocative questioning of one of the girls in our class. Prior to that, from primary school days, my condition, and those likewise, had been described and accepted as 'cut'. Until I began reading Forum, and then Acorn, I didn't realise that this simple crisp word had such specific common parlance amongst the initiated. Those so conscious of it, like me, have many a smile when we open newspapers and see headlines like 'Gas showroom staff to be cut'. (Bet that didn't include the Chairman!)

I enjoy the double entendre of words and malapropisms, and there must be many still to come in the Acorn sphere of interest. That word alone is such a perfect title for our Society. How I wish that I'd thought of it! But perhaps I should now own up and say it was me who chose the typeface and made a naughty addition to the letter 'A' for our magazine masthead. I'll hitherto sign my contributions G.D. for 'graphic designer'.

Acorn Gathering and AGM

An Acorn gathering will be held in Croydon, South London over the weekend of 1st/2nd April and will incorporate the AGM on the Saturday afternoon.

If you are interested in staying overnight on the Friday and/or Saturday the price will be £33-50 per person per night sharing a twin room. This includes Evening Meal and Breakfast (Single room prices on request.) £10 per night deposit (payable to Croydon Park Hotel) will be required with bookings. Please contact Brian, by phone or via Acorn, as soon as possible to ensure that the hotel has enough room for us.

Note that it is not essential to stay overnight in order to attend the AGM, formal details of which will be in the next issue.

Subscriptions

Those who haven't yet renewed their subscription will, never the less, have received this first edition of the year. I would ask that the renewals come in quickish so that we can set a budget out before the AGM. Many thanks in advance.

Editorial

In with this issue are the AGM agenda and voting forms, all of which are self explanatory. All I'd like to say is that in it all, confidentiality still abounds.

Through the good offices of Brian in California I have been introduced to an organisation called GNU, standing for Glans Naked and Unashamed. It is newly formed, the first issue of its quarterly newsletter went out in December, and has 39 members in 4 Continents, 80% of whom are circumcised. From what the Organiser tells me of their aspirations, they are a mirror image of ourselves, the Name belying the fact that it is 'For and about men whose foreskins, or lack thereof, are a source of fascination for them'.

He has a copy of one of our newsletters and is very impressed with it. In turn he sent me a copy of their first newsletter and asks if we could have a mutual reprint agreement, so that he could put some of our items in his newsletter and vice versa. In this way a lot of personal contacts might ensue, but I would like to know if there are any objections to this.

American Trend

You may have read or heard that the current trend in the U.S. now is not to circumcise newborn babies routinely. In fact the process is questioned in all areas now. Lots of magazine articles spell out pros and cons, radio and TV talk shows feature heated debates, by both men and women, on the advantages and disadvantages of the foreskin. It's today's hot topic. One sees addresses and phone numbers listed where one can get foreskin restoration information (probably at great expense).

The following is a cutting from The San Jose Mercury News by one of those chatty columnists.

"They were talking about circumcision on the car radio. I wasn't paying much mind. Circumcision is a decision that has come and gone in my life. For me and my sons, the foreskin follies were a foregone conclusion. It was ritual.

"But now, I understand, lots of 'experts' disdain the practice, be it for religion or health. There was one woman on the programme who was really upset. She said that circumcision was an attack on human rights; that it was an act of brutal disfigurement; that it had a psychological aftermath that led men to become violent. She said that for many circumcised men, way down deep in their psyche is a resentment toward what had been done to them, and then as adults they try to get even. I thought she was going overboard.

"But then, as one red light turned green, someone said something that really shocked me. 'Men who have been circumcised,' said this panellist, 'enjoy only a small percentage of the sexual pleasure of men who have not been circumcised.' I almost drove off the road. Now I was listening closely.

"One male caller said that he had been circumcised as a baby, but then had the foreskin replaced as an adult. 'And it was fantastic,' he said, speaking of his sexual awakening. 'All those years,' he said, 'I had never known what I was missing.'

"There were more calls similar to that. Testimonials to foreskin. 'Don't you see?' said another caller. 'That's where the nerve endings are.'

"The woman who had spoken of human rights – to nobody's particular interest – now was animated. She chortled that men everywhere were seeking to have their foreskins replaced. 'Parents should realise just how serious a deprivation circumcision is,' she was saying, glad to have everyone's ear. Well, she had mine. 'Men who have been circumcised have no idea what they've been missing!' I let that waft through my cerebrum.

“Could this be true? This is the sort of idea that can drive a man mad. How would you like to be told, for example, that your taste buds are defective? That you just don’t know what pizza tastes like because you lack a facility for spices? Well, unfortunately, there is no way of knowing. Sex certainly has seemed pleasurable in my life. I keep thinking: ‘seemed.’ But if these experts know their stuff, imagine what it must be like for non-circumcised men.

“Well, as I drove along, I decided to change the station. But my mind wandered. Most men, I mused, even if they have concerns about circumcision, are unlikely to hunt around for their old foreskins. And who wants somebody else’s? Still, I hated to think that life is full of champagne and caviar, and I’ve spent it all sipping Kool-Aid. It’s like when I tell a friend I had a wonderful time at Lake Tahoe, and he smiles and says, ‘Nice, but have you seen the Alps?’ It’s like when I show an old friend my best column and he just nods, then adds, ‘By the way, have you read my 12-volume series on the rise and fall of the Roman Empire?’ That’s show-off stuff.

“That’s what I believe. And I wish they’d shut up.”

In Response to Penelope

May I first thank you for your splendid letter in 1/95. It had all the good things many of us like to read: a woman’s view of our favourite topic, intrigue, experience, humour and a serious question at the end.

In respect of the latter, I do urge you and your husband to overturn your ‘final reluctant’ decision and follow your instincts to circumcise your baby son. In support of this advice I make the following points:

1. The great majority of us who had our cocks cut without our consent are grateful to our parents for doing it, and wish to pass the perceived benefits on to our sons. Your husband is clearly one of us and well satisfied with his own circumcision or he wouldn’t for a moment have been party to the first accord you reached.
2. You are better informed to make a judgement than most mothers in your position, having experienced seeing both sorts of penis during childhood and sexually testing them as an adult. Whilst you’ve recognised your cousin’s criticism of foreskins was overdone, your letter clearly indicates a preference for your husband’s circumcised willy. You should endorse this on your son.
3. Your mother’s mode of expression on the subject may now seem quaint, but the substance was sound. Circumcision is the mark of a gentleman because no gentleman would service a woman with his penis unclean. Of course, most men with foreskins follow this code and, like your college boyfriend, are scrupulous about penile hygiene. The point is, that in their case, there is always room for doubt in a woman's mind, and as you discovered, even asking leads to outrage, hurt and embarrassment. When a lady is confronted by a circumcised penis she has absolute physical assurance of cleanliness there in her hand, and thereafter has no reason to mention it.

4. You and your husband's perception of the current anti-circumcision campaign in the media is quite correct. It is selective and greatly biased. Millions of men throughout the world have lost their foreskins so you are bound to get a few hard cases and dissenters. They are more than matched by those who regret having been left uncircumcised, and especially by those who've had problems as a result. Our own Acorn survey and letter content over the years will bear this out. Remember that this male operation has been practised for thousands of years, independently, in many cultures, ancient and modern, around the world. It wouldn't have endured if both men and women hadn't found its results prophylactically and sexually beneficial. At the moment our society is on a down cycle of circumcision fashion and, like many other time-honoured traditions, is due to be 're-discovered' in a decade or two. It is strange now, when the whole slant of medicine is on preventative action and healthy lifestyle, that circumcision is an exception in not taking its rightful place and gaining acceptance in that cause.

5. There is an emotional dimension shared by pro-circumcisionists which is hard to explain to those who are anti. I was pleased to be circumcised like my father, and wanted my sons to be circumcised like me. Wives and partners often pick up this feeling and are very supportive of their men in this matter. My wife is, and I suspect you are too. Over twenty years ago we were in exactly the same position as you and your husband. We wanted our boys cut, but were defeated several times by prevailing medical opinion. I've always regretted we didn't go privately and have our wish for them carried out. From this disappointing experience I recommend you go right ahead now. Don't be fobbed off with 'wait and see' and alternative remedies if trouble should arise. The time is now. His foreskin should be back behind his glans before he ever knows it once covered it! Later on, it's harder to find a co-operative practitioner, and it's more expensive, more painful, and more embarrassing to have it done. You will have great satisfaction seeing your son grow up neatly circumcised, clean and trouble free, and knowing he is going to delight some future sexual partner(s) all the better for it. Who knows, it may well be a sought-after novelty then.

Why Boys Are The Cry Babies

Baby boys are well known for crying more when they are vaccinated than baby girls. And now doctors from Canada believe they know why.

They say that boys who have been circumcised have their pain response enhanced – an effect that can last for several months after the procedure has been carried out. That means pain relief should be given to the babies before circumcision to save them from pain later.

Curious as to why boys appear to experience more pain, Doctor Gideon Koren of the Hospital for Sick Children, Ontario, set up an experiment to measure the distress caused by the needle. The boys, aged 4-6 months, were having routine diphtheria-whooping cough-tetanus injections. Some were also given an injection for meningitis. Half the babies had a local anaesthetic cream rubbed on their thighs half an hour before the injections. All their responses were recorded on video and assessed by an impartial observer.

Dr Koren says in The Lancet that the circumcised boys, who made up 71% of the total, overall had more pain. 'Male circumcision is the most common neonatal surgical procedure. It causes intense pain and measurable changes in behaviour that last up to a day. We found that circumcision was associated with increased infant pain response. Circumcised boys had significantly longer crying bouts and higher pain scores.'

Pain was measured by evaluation of the expression on the baby's face, his movements and his crying. Dr Koren says that although his observations are speculative, given the small number of babies in the test, pain relief should be given routinely to those to be circumcised.

This report appeared in The Independent of February 3rd. and touched on a subject which seems not to have been talked about very much since I became a member. (Admittedly, I have been a member for only a year and a quarter.)

Circumcision experiences in Acorn and the letters I have received on the subject mentioned only a slight discomfort for a few weeks after a circumcision as being the normal experience. Why should babies suffer pain and adults not? Individuals differ in their pain thresholds, of course, and I suppose different penises have different quantities of nerves and blood vessels. Other operations involving cutting flesh are assumed to be painful. Why should circumcision not be? Is it to do with the psychology and/or upbringing of men?

Because I had heard so frequently about 'a few weeks discomfort at most', nothing had prepared me for the agony I had to endure after my re-circumcision 7 months ago. I suffered the most extreme constant pain for 3 months, unable even to touch my penis without feeling I was going to faint or vomit, severe pain for another 3 months and now, 7 months later, I still suffer when not actually having an orgasm. My cock has ceased to be a source of pleasure.

Did I have a particularly sensitive penis? It doesn't seem likely. Did other Acorn members who felt only a little discomfort after their operations have non-sensitive foreskins? It seems improbable. Do men who have frequent sex or who masturbate frequently suffer more or less on being circumcised? I don't imagine anyone has done any research on the subject. It seems that circumcision is a very hit and miss affair. Very little medical/scientific study seems to have been done on the subject, and we seem to know very little. For example, what happens to the nerves and blood vessel endings when the flesh of the foreskin and penis are cut away? Are they damaged beyond repair; do they regenerate in some way? I had a very thick vein running down the front of my erect penis. It has now gone. What has happened? In addition, I have lost  $\frac{3}{4}$ " from the length of my penis. No one can explain this. No one even hinted that this might be a possibility.

I have been told that, before I became a member, there was some discussion about how much skin should ideally be cut away, but this subject hasn't cropped up since I have been a member. (Is it possible that the pain I suffered is associated with the amount of flesh removed?)

As might be imagined, my very sobering experience has turned me from a pro-circumcision man into a convinced anti-circumcision man.

Now for a slightly different, but connected, subject. When re-reading letters sent to me more carefully, it struck me that many Acorn members like cut cocks very much, and the more extreme the cut the better. Some letters were less than objective. I had many letters from the 'tight as a drum school'. (Stupidly, I fell for it). In these letters, the excitement engendered by the idea of severely cut cocks was often cloaked in authoritative or semi-medical language. On reflection, it is impossible to be 'tight as a drum' when both soft and erect – unless one's cock remains the same size in both states (possible but unusual). This is the kind of fantasy, parading as fact, which can be dangerous. Likewise, cutting frenulums with scissors (7/94) must surely involve a certain risk. (This article appeared without an editorial caution of any kind).

I have considerable sympathy for the point of view of R.B.W. (1/95), when he says that some articles read like straightforward male fantasy (I was going to say pornography), rather than factual events. I enjoy erotic fantasy a great deal, and I imagine most Acorn readers do too, but I do think that in a responsible magazine such as Acorn is trying to be, there should be a clear distinction between fantasy and scientific or medically accurate articles. Circumcision is a very interesting subject, because it is the meeting place for a number of interests, religion, sexual fantasy, the opportunity for hetero and homosexual men to discuss a semi-taboo part of their body, hygiene, aesthetics of the male body, etc, etc, but because there are these superimposed layers, I think it is important to acknowledge the strength of suppressed sexual fantasy when we talk about our subject.

I would be interested to hear what other members think about the points I have raised. I would also, in view of my new shortened state, be interested to learn anything about cock lengthening operations.

William

[I am not medically qualified to state whether anything done to one's body is dangerous or not. We have from time to time stated that we cannot take any responsibility for anything said or done by members: and I reiterate here.

On the question of sorting fact from fantasy, if I'm not told an item is fantasy, who am I to be the judge and jury. Your letter has really touched me, but who is to say that another member might read it and not say to himself that here is a bloke who gets his rocks off with a pain and mutilation fantasy? At the moment, the only published known non-factual item is 'The Clinic' — D.A.]

Better Late Than Never

Born in the 1940's, when it was fashionable to have baby boys circumcised, I was duly 'done' when a few days old, so I believe. I have never regretted it since. The cut was almost perfectly made to the small penis and obviously with no lasting memories of pain or other discomfort, resulting in a good-looking cock which I am proud to possess for the rest of my life!

I was to grow up in a North London suburb, going first to a primary school and then on to a mixed secondary school with other boys, many of whom had also been cut at just after birth. Little boys are always inquisitive and fascinated to compare attributes and I was (and still am for that matter) no exception. I formed some general schoolboy observations, such as how pleased I was with what I had – a large knob uncluttered by the folds of skin I saw on the shafts of the majority of my school friends – only some 30% of them seemed to be like me. Also I noticed that, as a general rule, taller boys and shorter boys than me both generally had smaller penises (particularly in girth) than those of us who were, like me, of average height.

As a young teenager, my sex organs had matured to adult size and I masturbated a great deal, deriving hours of mental and physical bliss from wanking, often many times a day (perhaps yesteryear's equivalent of today's feeling of euphoria experienced by teenagers in drugtaking, but with no addiction or side effects!)

When I wanked, it was not long before I became aware of a small tag of skin that, when my penis was erect, stretched from the rim of the glans to the top of the shaft. It was only about 4mm wide and, fortunately, was exactly in the centre on the top side, but caused my knob to be pulled at this point. I found I could even pass a needle and thread through a small hole underneath the tag of skin, which was quite fun, and I frequently wondered whether to tug extra hard to break the tag, but I thought the pain would be too much. No real problem when masturbating – all worked extremely well but, then in my late teens, I wondered if the tag would cause problems if I had sex.

I consulted my GP, who took a look at my cock. He forced me to erect it in his presence (by placing his fingers under my balls and pressing hard). From what he saw he concluded that no problems with intercourse would be caused, but suggested that, if I had surgery at any time in the future for anything else, I should request that the tag should be snipped.

Later I went on to father three sons with absolutely no difficulty at all, but in 1982, following the birth of our third son, I was told by a doctor that there would be roughly an 80% chance of me fathering yet another son if we were to have more children. 'Enough is enough', I thought, and immediately requested a vasectomy, which was granted and organised as one of four to take place during a lunch time at the National Women's Hospital in London (the only operation carried out on men there) a week or so later.

With some trepidation (you don't like to risk upsetting a surgeon who is just about to attack your balls!) I asked if they would be prepared to remove the post-circumcision tag from my shaft at the same time. To my astonishment they agreed. The vasectomy took place under local anaesthetic which, as I'm not squeamish, allowed me to sit up a bit and watch. It was a strange feeling seeing some of the tubes attached to your most manly parts being tied off (by a woman) but, viewed in a detached way, quite exhilarating at the same time. Then, quick as a flash, out came the surgeon's snips, and the 39 year old tag was no more.

After a couple of weeks, when the bruising from the vasectomy had subsided, it was time to do some experiments. And yes, the erection was now perfect and the site of the tag was hardly noticeable, the big knob now perfectly shaped – and I had a bonus: even more erotic nerve endings, hitherto covered up, exposed to give me more pleasure still! As some of you who come to the Croydon meeting in early April may be able to see, I am lucky enough to possess an organ which has very little scarring (the result of having been circumcised as an infant) and now, thanks to the tag removal, complete in every way.

I am a keen club and beach (and anywhere else that it's legal) Naturist, so I have, for over ten years now, been able to present a perfectly formed circumcised penis which I am not reluctant to have seen on such occasions, and to advance my feeling of 'openness' I decided after the operation to remain in the shaved state they had given me, indefinitely. So I am still one of the ever growing number of smoothies amongst naturists who enjoy the advantages of depilation. (If any readers of Acorn are interested in Smooth Naturism or in The Smoothie Club – a UK based international club of some 200 member units – I should be only too happy to hear from you via the Editor.)

Postscript

It is so sad that the medical profession has deemed circumcision an ‘unnecessary operation’ to put a baby boy through, and thus my three sons (and eventually their partners) will not be able to benefit from the cleanliness and elegant good looks of a splendid roundhead.

Sensitivity

Are there any readers who are in their late forties or early fifties, and who have been circumcised from childhood, experiencing a considerable lessening of the sensitivity of the knob during masturbation or when having sex, compared with, say, ten years ago? I have asked my doctor about this and he says it is ‘all in the mind’. I remain unconvinced, and continue to feel less sensation when rubbing. Is it because I have wanked my unprotected (ie. no foreskin) penis for all these years, or does it happen as we all get older anyway? There is one bonus: because of the sensitivity being less, it takes longer to climax, but when the climax is reached, I find it is far ‘higher’ than before, and spurting more powerful (the yield remains as much as before). We would be interested in your related views and experiences.

The Favourite Pastime

I am a new member of Acorn, so please forgive me if my letter oversteps the bounds set by the Society. I write regarding masturbation, something that I get a great deal of pleasure from. I have a fairly loose foreskin and usually rub that backwards and forwards over my glans, although sometimes I keep it pulled back and wank on a lubricated shaft à la roundhead.

I much prefer the use of the foreskin, which leaves me asking, ‘Do cavaliers masturbate more than roundheads? And how often?’ I average between 50 to 70 times a year.

If any members would like to contact me direct I’d love to hear from them, via Acorn.

Taking Care of Willy

I suspect that members join The Acorn Society for many and varied reasons not entirely associated with a detached, altruistic, scientific interest in the male genitalia and, especially in circumcision or the lack of it. In spite of all manner of protestations of innocence I guess that most of us belong because, one way or another, we are sexually turned on by talk and thought about willies, balls and all the paraphernalia that goes with them. There are not, to my knowledge, similar fan clubs for those intrigued by, say, thumbs or ear lobes or the length of our eyelashes.

Asked to justify my membership publicly, I could claim professional interest as a doctor and the need to keep abreast of society's social and moral attitudes to matters on the sexual agenda. However, if the truth be known, I'm addicted to my cock and, because I'm an obsessively sexual gay man, other guy's cocks as well, along with what they do with them.

You may well say, 'Speak for yourself'. Nevertheless, I imagine that I also speak for many other members in the supposition that, either heterosexually, homosexually or solosexually, we use, and possibly in the process 'abuse', our dicks rather more excessively than a high percentage of 'ordinary' guys in the community. (Please don't pick me up on the political correctness of the use of the word 'ordinary').

Many is the time when I've emerged from a sex session with my willy red, raw and ever so sore, having earned its keep the 'hard' way. What's to be done in such circumstances and, more to the point, what steps ought we to take to keep our dangly bits in good condition to minimise this 'trauma potential' (to coin a bit of highfalutin jargon)?

I'm old-fashioned by nature and, when the heat's on, my lifelong standby has been good old pink Germoline, regardless of its mentholic or eucalyptus smell – after all, the colour is right! A little smeared thinly onto a piece of lint, which is then wrapped around the offending plonker and held in situ by wearing a pair of snug fitting briefs overnight, usually sees me right and ready for getting married (again) in the morning. I guess any simple antiseptic cream, like Savlon, would do just as well, but I think we should pay more attention than we are often inclined to do to friction abrasions of this kind. There are too many nasty infections capable of getting into the system through minor breaks in the skin, and it's important to clear up any blemishes as quickly as possible.

Of course, the risk of getting such problems can be minimised in the first place if sensible precautions are taken beforehand. We don't all produce sufficient pre-cum 'love juice' to lubricate our willies as thoroughly as we might, and not all other orifices necessarily make up the shortfall when we take an exploratory trip inside. So extra preliminary lubrication is often a great help, especially if you plan to take your time over the foreplay and the bang.

Remember that pre-cum, spit and even KY tend to evaporate quickly, and the resulting tackiness can actually increase the risk of friction damage during 'non-penetrative erotic genital stimulation' (the posh phrase for wanking!). In such circumstances, an oily lubricant – eg: baby oil, vaseline or even butter – has its merits, but remember that such products will destroy the latex from which condoms are made. So if you intend to don a rubber mack as the moment of pica approaches, then you must stick to a water-based lube like KY.

By the way, the Health Promotion Department of the Huntingdon Health Authority in Cambridgeshire has produced a helpful leaflet recommending 'gel charging' of condoms before use either during masturbation or intercourse. It suggests that a teaspoonful of a water-based lubricant gel (eg KY) squirted into the teat and flared end of a contoured condom can not only make intercourse 'more pleasing than not wearing a condom' at all, but also that it is 'fantastic' for solo and mutual masturbation. There is no doubt that a condom used in this way affords a good barrier protection against friction burns.

The ultimate in looking after Willy must be the on-going regular attention which you should pay to 'him' every day. After all, any good workman always looks after his tools. You know what happens to a housewife's hands when she has them in and out of water every day. They become soggy and the skin loses its elasticity and strength. That's why they resort to regular massage with emollient creams or lotions like Nivea, Attriba or liquid lanoline, and your dick deserves the same treatment. Each morning or each evening – or both if you enjoy it sufficiently – you should gently massage some cream into the shaft and glans. Pay special attention to the scar area behind the glans if you've been circumcised and to the opening at the tip of your foreskin if it's a bit on the tight side or inclined to split. 'How much cream?', do I hear you ask? Well, I guess the size of the job depends upon the size of the knob, if you get my drift, but truly only a little is necessary, and it should be massaged well in.

From time to time the skin may need to be toughened or hardened a little. The glans of roundheads is particularly vulnerable. This is when a daily application of a little surgical spirit comes into its own. Only do be careful if you already have slight abrasions, because the smarting 'ouch' factor can be pretty high in such circumstances.

So there you have it. A little caring forethought for your foreskin and preparation for your prick will certainly pay dividends when duty calls. Ahhhhh... Bless your little sodden cocks.

Ray Hamble

Yes and No

After a rather dreary patch, I feel the newsletter is getting better again. You got a bit clinical with lurid descriptions of the operation of circumcision. If there is anything which puts me off circumcision it is the pain that I may be inflicting on my son in the early days of his life. My wife's views on the subject are interesting as she has been married several times and has had children on both sides of the Atlantic. She cannot believe that the medical profession cannot make up its mind whether it is a good thing to cut or not to cut, and then to stick with it and avoid all the harmful penis envy that results from being different.

She is English and born into a middle class family in the late 40's. Given her background, her brothers were all circumcised, as were most of her early boyfriends. Her first husband was, surprisingly, uncut, which she found rather novel and quite a thrill. Her first son was delivered in a private hospital in the mid 60's, and she had a genuine dilemma as to whether to have him done. Her first husband had always rather regretted his foreskinned state – most of his peer group had been circumcised – so encouraged her to have him done. Because of a change of circumstance the second son was born in a National Health hospital in the early 70's and circumcision was not available. In fact she was told that it was out of fashion, and although her firstborn was done, no-one was being circumcised nowadays – that was a barbaric hangover from the past.

She then divorced and married an American who, of course, was circumcised. She had a son in America in the mid 70's and almost without her being asked, he was circumcised in hospital with a substantial additional medical fee. By 1980, when her next son was born, circumcision in USA was 'optional'. In fact, the 'avant garde' were moving against it. At that stage it was 2:1, so she was happy to leave him intact to make it 2:2.

Now she is back in England, married to me, and we are considering, rather belatedly, having children of our own. I am circumcised and, on balance, she prefers the circumcised cock. But she hates subjecting her little ones to pain and circumcision is still 'out' in this country. I gather however, that the Americans are rethinking their position and the pendulum seems to be swinging back in its favour again. I gather AIDS and STD's are less likely if circumcision has been performed.

The important thing however, seems to be not our own views, but what our peer group is doing. For a child, the most important thing is to be the same as everyone else. I know that, as a 52 year-old I am relieved at having been circumcised. If I was a 30 year-old now, I would be marginally upset at being in a minority. If I was a 20 year-old and circumcised, I would be angry at my parents for making me different.

On balance therefore, I suspect that we will leave our prospective son intact, because the balance of opinion appears to be against circumcision, despite both of our preferences. This would make my wife's score 3:2 in favour of the foreskin. Both my own sons (from my ex-wife) have foreskins, the NHS being continuously against it.

So – are we right? Will the pendulum swing again as it may be doing in USA. This is a much more interesting subject for Acorn than dorsal slits, Plastibell cuts, etc. I'd be interested if others had experienced the same dilemma.

4. The Men In Her Life

(With thanks to the member who contributed much of the material for this episode.)

Julie had been 12 when her brother Clive had been born. Her mother had seen this as the perfect opportunity to introduce her and her 14 year old sister Anna to the practicalities of child care. They were closely involved in feeding, bathing, nappy changing and so on. When Clive was 6 weeks, a doctor and nurse visited the house by appointment and carried out a circumcision.

Julie and Anna had been intrigued by this and their mother had explained that their father was circumcised and that they wished Clive to be the same. She explained the hygienic and sexual advantages of circumcision, and was especially enthusiastic about the neat and tidy appearance of Clive's penis as the wound healed. They all thought it a great improvement after the long straggly foreskin which had previously adorned his penis. Her mother suggested to both girls that they should try to choose circumcised partners for their own health and satisfaction, and should ensure that any sons they might have were done to match. All this took place at a highly impressionable age, and the advice had been fixed in Julie's mind ever since.

Julie admitted to a strong sex drive and by sixteen she had been ready to lose her virginity. Her boyfriend had been very shy about the whole matter and had taken some seducing. He had insisted that their first lovemaking take place in the dark. When Julie at last saw him naked, she was delighted to find that he had been beautifully circumcised. She told him how pleased she was, and he confessed that he was embarrassed about his cut penis. She reassured him that there was absolutely no need – nothing could be better!

This first love affair had been very happy and most satisfactory in bed. It had lasted all through the sixth form but inevitably, after they had gone to different universities, they had drifted apart.

University had brought new men into her life, and with it her first experience of foreskins. She had several boyfriends. Each time at the critical moment when she saw or handled their penis for the first time, she hoped to find it circumcised. Each time she was disappointed. Were there no circumcised men left in the world? Her closer acquaintance with the foreskin did nothing to endear it to her. If anything, her latent prejudices were reinforced, and she looked back nostalgically to her first boyfriend and his beautifully crafted dick. Eventually she met, fell in love with, and ultimately, at the age of 22, married Mike. Her marriage was very happy but she had to confess that she still found his long wrinkly foreskin a turn off. What's more, he seemed over sensitive and didn't last long enough to satisfy her. If there was a cloud over her marriage, it was in bed. After a couple of years she had gently mentioned her concerns and asked how he would feel about having a circumcision. But he had clammed up and had refused to discuss it in any depth. It was alright for babies, he implied, but not for adult men. And that was it.

A year ago, she had become pregnant and had given birth to her baby son, John. She was determined that the new man in her life should be circumcised. She told Mike of her wish, but he had not been keen. She reminded him that he had said that circumcision was OK for babies. Eventually, after a lot of pressure, Mike had agreed to leave the final decision and arrangements to Julie. But having overcome one hurdle, she was confronted with three more; the hospital, health visitor and GP had all refused point blank to arrange for John to be circumcised. She had rung several other surgeries but none performed circumcisions either on the NHS or privately. She didn't really know where to turn next.

One evening, when John was already three months old, Julie and Mike had dinner with Sally and Alan Morgan. Julie and Sally had met at the antenatal clinic and had soon become firm friends. Sally had given birth to a son, Darren, about a month after John was born. Both babies slept peacefully through dinner, but as coffee was being served, Darren started to whimper. Sally went out and comforted him and was soon back.

"Is everything alright?" asked Julie solicitously.

"Yes, he's OK. he's got a sore willy because he was docked this morning."

"What do you mean?" asked Julie.

"We've just had him circumcised. He's a bit sorry for himself now, but I'm sure he'll thank us for it in the future."

The wine and brandy had made everyone a little less inhibited and there then followed a very frank and open discussion on circumcision. At least between three of them – Julie noticed that Mike stayed very quiet. Both the women were enthusiastic about male circumcision and so was Alan. He recounted how he had had to be done as a teenager, and how much better everything – comfort, hygiene, sex, appearance – had been afterwards. This is why he had been so keen for Darren to be cut.

Walking home afterwards, Julie was wondering whether to raise the topic with Mike, when he suddenly said:

“You know, I think you’re right. Perhaps we ought to have John circumcised. Why don’t you get that doctor’s name from Sally?”

Julie smiled to herself, for already in her handbag was Dr Bishop’s address and telephone number safely written down.

And now Julie was sitting in Dr Bishop’s surgery, nursing John. The doctor had explained the procedure and she was just signing the consent form.

“Do you do adult circumcisions as well?” she asked.

“Yes, of course. Why – do you know someone who wishes to be circumcised?”

“My husband isn’t circumcised and I think he would benefit from it. Would you see him and try to persuade him?”

“Why do you think he would benefit?” the doctor queried.

Given this opening, Julie told her story. The doctor listened patiently and with some sympathy, and wondered how he could help her.

“And so,” she ended the saga, “that’s why I’d like you to persuade him to have the operation.”

“I’m afraid it’s not my job to persuade him. I shall be very happy to see him and discuss with him the pros and cons, how he might benefit, what the op would entail and so on. But in the end, the decision must be his. After all, it’s his foreskin, and he must be convinced that it’s for the best before he consents to have it removed. Why don’t you get him to bring John in for his check in two week’s time. Then I can have a chat with him, and see what his real worries are.”

Julie realised that this was as far as she was going to get; but she doubted that it would be enough to persuade Mike.

“Thanks,” she said, “I’ll get him to come in, and if you could be just a tiny bit persuasive, just for me, I would be eternally grateful.”

“We’ll see,” he responded. “And now if you would like to bring your baby over to the couch and take off his nappy, we can make sure that at least one of the men in your life is circumcised.”

Croydon Meeting and AGM

We hope that as many members as possible will attend the AGM in Croydon on 1st April. This will be an ideal opportunity for you to have your say in how The Acorn Society develops during 1995.

To complement the AGM there will be a more general gathering of members on Saturday afternoon and Sunday morning (with a few coming Friday night!) If you have not already booked a place for the Acorn Gathering then please see the note Brian added with Issue 1/95. Bookings should now be sent to Brian as soon as possible to ensure enough space at the hotel.

Note that it is not necessary to stay for the general Gathering in order to attend the AGM, but it does provide a relaxed atmosphere in which to get to meet other members and discover the 'faces behind the initials' in the magazine.

Vernon - London

As a woman I think...

Acorn thanks all females who have contributed to our eternal debate and invites more to do so. Yours is a different and valued viewpoint.

After all, it's the 'end user' who really matters.

Editorial

The write-up of the meeting is being done by a member but isn't finished yet, so will be in the next issue. I would just like to say thank you to all who attended and installed me as Chairman of the Society. It is an honour. My only disappointment there was that the time went so quickly that I didn't get the opportunity to have a long chat with everyone, but 26 is a large number. I expect others felt the same. Next time I hope. But still, what a great turn-out!

Circumcised Stammerers

As a new member of the Society I am unaware of the full range of topics which have previously been discussed, so accept my apologies if I bring up something that may have already been done to death.

The article in Issue 2/95, 'Why Boys are Cry Babies', brought to mind another problem which one never seems to encounter now. In my younger days I was aware that a considerable number of people were afflicted with speech problems – some with quite bad stammers.

Letters for forwarding should be marked in pencil with the recipient's identifier. They should be stamped 1st class and be enclosed in an envelope addressed as above.

As far as I was able to observe at the time, they were all circumcised. Over a period of time I knew three stutterers quite well. One in my teens was a local boy of about the same age who was tightly cut and said he vaguely remembered being done at about the age of five. Later on a man in his late thirties, and very difficult of speech, told me much the same; that he had been done about the age of four, and he too was tightly cut. The third person was a younger man in his twenties from the Antipodes, not so badly affected speechwise, but displaying the other characteristics of tightly cut and at about the age of four.

Is it possible that, if circumcision is performed on a boy during the speech formative years, approximately between the ages of 2 and 5, the pain trauma could affect the boy's speech patterns? I would not expect either immediate neo-natal or later life performance of the operation to have any such effect. Members experiences and observations would be welcome either directly or in the magazine. Perhaps Dr Ray would like to comment!

Wishing

There's nothing like a delivery of Acorn to stimulate the...pen, so here is a view and some comments from the other side of the fence.

I became aware of my circumcised (dorsal slit) state at about the age of 11 or 12. I was unable to join in some of the games that little boys played (seeing how many sixpences you could put into your foreskin, or seeing how large a bulb you could make when ballooning), and felt very different.

Also, a rather insensitive girlfriend when I was about 20, openly stated that she preferred a foreskinned penis. I have found that most women are just polite, but secretly prefer foreskins.

I have for years fantasised about having a long tight foreskin – I avidly search adult videos for them – and have tried almost everything to stretch my skin. I've tied weights to it, sticking plaster, and even superglue to try to re-create a foreskin. I contacted the Surgical Advisory Service in London, but all they wanted to do was cut off what I have got. I've asked my GP if he could do anything or refer me to someone (that took some nerve on my part). He told me not to bother so much about it.

I read in Acorn of men and women who want to inflict this 'minor operation' on their sons. Why? A woman can never begin to understand about a man and his bits. Why does a father wish to deprive his son as he has been deprived. He must know of the conflicts, and the grass always being greener, etc. Leave a boy to make up his own mind – if he wants to see if the grass is greener, he can, but not if he has already been cut. An uncircumcision is almost impossible.

If I could sue the GP who slipped a pair of scissors into the end of my penis, even if it was a parental whim, and in one quick snip cut so much away from me, I would take him for everything.

I am sure I'm not a voice in the wilderness. I am also sure that some doctors and surgeons who have been cut understand the dilemma. Is there no surgery or clinic that will re-constitute a foreskin, or re-sew a dorsal slit (a lateral cut and 6 sutures would do the job for me). I'm sure that if gender re-assignment clinics can make an artificial vagina, they can also make a foreskin. How about you, Dr. Ray – or do you know someone who would do it.

D.C. – Wales

P.S. Has anyone got any videos with suitable material – I'll trade!!

[Here's another member one must feel sorry for. The only help I can offer, D.C., is to ask you to ring NORM(UK) on (01279) 429771, and I hope you get your wish one day. – D.A.]

Frenulum Removal

As a long-term supporter of the Society, I write as one of those who have been circumcised at their own wish as an adult. I can honestly say, having had sex both with and without the luxury (?) of a foreskin, that I have not had any misgivings about losing forever the 'cap to my acorn'. I accept without reservation that I could (and probably correctly) be accused of bias. I am not one, however, of those who think the operation should be mandatory – in fact I get the impression that most Acorn members feel that it should be the right of the individual to choose.

My preamble over, I now come to the point of this letter. At the time of my circumcision, much to my everlasting regret, I did not elect to have my frenulum removed, resulting in a tag of flesh beneath the neat circumcision that was given me. My decision at the time was based on :-

a) ignorance of what I would be left with (Oh, for Acorn then!), and

b) fears from vague stories that I'd heard, that removal of the frenulum would result in enormous loss of sensitivity, and possible problems with sexual performance.

Now, some twelve years later, I still have not come to terms with the proof that my frenulum still exists. I have approached several clinics and asked about frenulum removal, but have been put off by their replies; basically, 'No, there are too many nerves associated with it' etc. I still hanker after the removal of the frenulum, but I would be interested to hear from fellow members, either through the newsletter or directly, on their views and suggestions, ie, how many had their frenulums removed at the time of circumcision, and did they have any regrets? And have any members had a frenectomy after a circumcision, with what results? Would they recommend or advise against me continuing in a search for a frenulum removal? If they do, I would be grateful for contacts, as, unlike some of our braver members, I do not relish (or intend) to carry out the act with my own hands. Nor do I get turned on at the thought of paying £500 for the loss of that bit of skin.

I will, of course, reply to any letter I receive.

C.W. – Fife

Mum from “Mum’s Dilemma”

Thank you for printing my letter in Acorn last year. Since writing, more has emerged. First – my son, quite out of the blue, told me his close friend, with whom he was playing pissing games when his own problem arose, has his willy skin pushed back all the time. I gathered he was circumcised. As I have, through their close friendship, got to know his mother quite well, I told her our story, and she confirmed that she’d had her son done at a few days old. This was when they had been living in an ex-pat community whilst her husband had a contract in the Middle East. Apparently some of the men had encountered foreskin problems in the heat, and after one brave chap had had the chop and enthused, others had followed, extending the fashion to their male children too. Out there it was a routine matter at the hospital where her son had been delivered. She was now convinced that all boys should be done at birth, and was surprised at the opposition she encountered when she returned to this country to have her second son cut.

Following your own very good advice, David, I raised the matter of the lesser operation with our practitioner. She said she would be quite willing to refer my son for this procedure if that was my wish, but she remained personally in favour of full circumcision. She sees it as a permanent solution to a range of potential problems which a defective foreskin can cause, including those for any future sexual partners. She also disclosed that she is Jewish and therefore prejudiced in this matter, her own son having been done in her faith.

My husband has also told me that he had difficulty with his foreskin as a child and was at one time due to have it circumcised. Fortunately, he thinks it was forgotten when the trouble passed. I have noticed that his foreskin is a bit on the tight side and he doesn’t like me to push it back too far. This makes me wonder if the problem could be inherited by our son. My husband is used to delegating what he thinks are ‘small problems’ at work, and in his usual management style has delegated this domestic one to me. I actually think he is a bit embarrassed about the whole thing!

Reading Acorn and your contributors' comments has made me have a re-think on my own view of circumcision. I can now see some merit in the procedure and wish I'd had my son done when it was suggested at the time of the original incident. However, it seems best, because of the variety of the opinions given, to wait until he is between schools, and in the light of the timely item 'Informed Consent' in the same issue, provide him with all the information to make his own decision. For this purpose I am saving a file of our correspondence and other cuttings relevant to the matter. All this is some years away, but if Acorn is still around, I'll write and tell you the conclusion. Thanking you and all your readers.

Mrs M.B. – Oxford

Operative Record

Bil Brierley has sent me a copy of his operative record from a Californian hospital.

O'CONNOR HOSPITAL

Room Number:

OPT/SURG

Patient:

WILLIAM BRIERLEY

M.D.

ROBERT ANDONIAN

Date:

9-2-82

Surgeon: Robert Andonian

Assistant: —

Anesthesiologist: —

ANESTHESIA: Local – 18cc's of 1% Xylocaine injected circumferentially at the base of the penis, and on two occasions about thirty minutes apart, 9cc's each time.

PREOPERATIVE DIAGNOSIS: Redundant prepuce with frenular tattering.

POSTOPERATIVE DIAGNOSIS: Same as above.

OPERATION: Circumcision and frenuloplasty.

COMPLICATIONS: None

DRAINS: None

BLOOD LOSS: 20cc's

FINDINGS: The foreskin was redundant. There was marked vascularity explaining the need for a second anesthetic injection about 20 minutes into the procedure. The frenulum was broadly tethered, and repairing a transverse incision vertically.

PROCEDURE: In the dorsal supine position, the patient was prepped and draped for surgery. 1% Xylocaine anesthesia was injected circumferentially. Using a scalpel the outer surface of the redundant prepuce was circumferentially incised. The skin was then pulled back and the inner surface was incised, and then the skin was incised. The frenulum was repaired by cutting transversally the broad tethering band and then repairing this with interrupted #4-0 chromics vertically. Hemorrhage was controlled with #3-0 chromic ties and bovid. The severed margins of prepuce were then reapproximated with interrupted #4-0 chromic sutures.

A vaseline gauze and then Coban dressing was applied, and explicit homecare instructions were given to the patient in the Operating Room. He was taken to recovery with an ice bag on his circumcision site for discharge from the Outpatient Clinic.

How Come

On casting another eye over 6/94, a couple of points arise which could do with a mention. Firstly, I wouldn't dream of calling Brian a liar when he watched his nephews being circumcised "without a whimper" since I have never been privileged to witness such a scene. But it does require a suspension of imagination, if not belief, to accept that living flesh can be sliced from his nephews without pain. Can any amount of technique, short of anaesthetic, achieve such a miracle? If so, I should think it's very much the exception rather than the rule.

Secondly, Brian's account, read in the context of his family relationship, clearly indicates his membership of the Jewish persuasion. So how come he himself has "been in both states" (ie. cavalier and roundhead)? To their credit, Jews don't go grubbing after converts, and marriage to a Jew would more likely result in her exclusion rather than his acceptance I should have thought. Just thought I'd mention it.

R.B.W.

Thoughts on 2/95

Unfortunately I did not have the time nor opportunity to attend the AGM. This was a pity, as my project would have made significant progress; although, to be fair, it would have put members on the spot who would, perhaps, have felt somewhat pressured to reveal all unannounced and at 'short' notice. [This was done at the meeting by another photographer and most were happy to take part and possibly go down in posterity. – D.A.] Nevertheless, I fully (eventually) intend putting these photographs together and feel that the publishers of Femalia (a truly enthralling 'life-size' photostudy of female genitalia) in San Francisco – 'Down There Press' – may be sufficiently interested. Incidentally, also available through them and via the famous 'Good Vibrations' store in the city with the Golden Gate, is Men Loving Themselves by Jack Morin, Ph.D., a photostudy of male masturbation, and the female equivalent, I Am My Lover by Joanni Blank. Although many would consider such photography to be of gay interest, this is not so, and is of equal value to females and anyone who has a natural fascination for, as a male, one's own sexual organs, and females so that they can more fully appreciate the variety of male genitalia.

Browsing through some Italian erotica, I was astonished to see the likes of Jean Claude van Dong – OK forget the cliché – who has two penises and two sets of testicles, all of this equipment(s) being fully functional. Does this mean he doubles his pleasure, I wonder?

Re: Issue 2/95. A genuinely fascinating read, showing great insight and perception on the part of these members. Personally, I disagree with circumcision as a fashion 'accessory' or for purely cosmetic considerations. I really can't see the point of 'butchering' a perfectly good penis because it may look better. For feeling perhaps, appearance never. However, if circumcision is done for medical reasons (in my instance, phimosis – overly tight foreskin), or because a person really has a desire to be circumcised for, perhaps, religious reasons (and I do know a few who have had to have this done), then it has done me no harm (having been cut a decade ago) and rather has increased my level of pleasure without unwanted over-sensitivity and discomfort when flaccid. I can assure M.L. of Norwich that I had the same misgivings when I was circumcised, and was most concerned that the glans, having been 'under wraps' for so long, would become irritated through friction on clothing. This did not happen and I found no such irritation. Even whilst the wound was healing there was no great discomfort but, do please try not to have an erection. This really is uncomfortable! Thankfully at least, M.L. has the opportunity to choose whether he needs to be circumcised when there are others, especially in the U.S., who are now considering reversal operations, whilst forgetting that the pleasure comes not from the penis but from the brain. Sexuality is more a state of mind than erection!

In the same breath, J.H. (Middx) states a contra-opinion and one that may well be equally valid. I cannot comment on loss of sensitivity from childhood, but it seems to me to be no great loss, since J.H.'s pleasure is on par with what he has experienced in the past whilst reaching plateau takes longer – something any woman would appreciate. Supposedly, we're 'all off and running' before a woman has a chance to 'warm up'. Of course, the psychology of sex is far removed from its physiology; sensitivity is something of a state of mind rather than the condition of the glans, but then again, each person responds in differing manners.

William's penis-size worry is something that medical science or surgery has, as yet, not found an answer to. The respected U.S. journal, Medical Post, reports that the results from phalloplasty operations for penile enlargement and/or fattening proved disappointing. Surgeons carried out this procedure on 162 men and found that, immediately after surgery, the penis lengthened from 3.8cm to 5.5cm, and by 5.0cm to 7.3cm in girth. BUT, six weeks later, these enlargements had 'shrunk' by 50 per cent, and some patients reported their gain had amounted to NOT ONE MM. Much worse were the side effects – distorted penises, poor symmetry, and post-op complications. Costs were quoted at $4,725 for the 'basic' operation, to $6,100 for the 'ultimate' version (including thickening). The health authorities in the U.S. now recommend regular 'exercise' to increase blood supply to the nerves and tissues of the penis! Exercise? Clearly a recommendation to masturbate frequently! If blood isn't pumped to this area on a regular basis, the nerves can be damaged through 'starvation', and thus desensitised. Sounds Silly? Not really. Think of a muscle; the more it is exercised (up to a point) the stronger and more resilient it becomes. The penis is no different. If you're not 'beating the meat' regularly, viz solo-sex, then the penis, and through it, orgasmic potential, may not be as great as in full-blooded youth (and why should they have all the fun). It also means that erections may take much longer to rise, and even manual stimulation won't feel quite the same. Add a little more exercise to your normal routine over the next 24 hours, pump the testosterone, and this could make a real difference. I hope this has provided thoughtful reading for William, and whilst you're at it, try some porn as an exciting appetiser.

To end, and I could have written much more, but think it better for as many as possible to have say in the newsletter, I have no objection to Brian Rogers's proposition. The more who are interested the better. Women have this sort of inward-looking self-sexuality/awareness thing (through the likes of Betty Dodson, the 'Mother of Masturbation'), so why not men, and perhaps, encourage further contact between the U.K. and the U.S. It doesn't mean women who have a genuine concern for their sexuality are lesbians, and this applies equally to men.

I very much believe that initialled letters and correspondence directed through The Acorn Society as some sort of 'clearing house' is a bit silly. From what I have read it seems, at least to myself, that the membership is intelligent, literate and sensible. We all know why we read this newsletter and have become members. The 'feeling' is mutual, and it is also clear that many members are married, others single, gay, hetero, bisexual, so we should be able to use our names and addresses, if desired, without fear of being pestered. Common sense dictates that writing to another member should be done sensibly, privately, and above all, discreetly. I have no objection to people writing direct, and the membership should really feel the same way.

I trust this letter and its contents will have something to say in the Newsletter (how about adding the odd photograph or photocopy of a photograph/diagram or line drawing. This would improve the newsletter's appearance and presentation no end). And I too emphasise the need for the female contribution to the newsletter. It would be really interesting to read what women have to say about the male genitalia. I think it would be most illuminating and, perhaps, unexpected. Above all, it would perhaps, open our eyes to exactly what women know or are curious to discover.

Aldo G. Rabaiotti.

Editor's Response

I feel I must say something here about anonymity. I know that all members hope that all other members are able to speak about their feelings honestly and freely. Is it a British or totally human trait that one finds it hardest to "bare one's soul" to either the nearest and dearest or other close friends? It may be due to the fear of being ridiculed, not taken seriously or just thought of as not being normal ("Darling, I have this urge to put a steel bar through my glans and stick something up my peehole!"). For whatever reason, if this weren't true there'd never be a need for The Samaritans.

It is very difficult for most people to keep secret material in the home or workplace, therefore there is always the chance that the newsletter may be found and read. It isn't difficult to explain that you have an interest in circumcision for some reason or another, but there is no 'out' when a letter of yours, duly signatorised, is published on an aspect that other people wouldn't understand, and could then be bandied about.

As will be seen from one of the letters in this issue, we do have some public figures amongst our readership. There has also been an instance where a newsletter was thrown away and found by someone else (in this case he joined us). It could have been sent to a Sunday paper for cash if prominent names and addresses were on it and then we would have been a household name.

Acorn can only live because members have total confidence in being able to write exactly how they feel in the certain knowledge that when they ask for 'Anon' to be put on the end of their letters, that's what will happen, and the only person in the world other than themselves who knows who wrote it is me, and to me everything is totally sacrosanct.

With regard to the other items. We have had diagrams and line drawings in the newsletter, but are still trying with photocopies of photographs. Unfortunately most photographs nowadays are coloured and these don't take too well to be copied. Also, our system is that I script out the newsletter on software called ABILITY and send it on a disc and a printed A4 copy to Vernon who does the artwork, composites and prints onto the final A5 version and sends it on to Brian who photocopies, makes it into the booklet and sends it out to you. Fitting photographs through this process is difficult as they don't double photocopy very well.

Lastly, hardly an issue goes by when we don't have the views of at least one female, this one being no exception.

I've written this for the benefit of all newcomers who may be wondering about the same things as Aldo, but for goodness sake don't be deterred from writing about anything at all by what I have said.

D.A.

Restoration

Forgive me for insisting on anonymity, but I hold a position in public life and I am keen to avoid the attentions of our fearless press. My wife brings home Acorn which is made available by a colleague in her common room. As a potential member I have been following your reports with interest for a couple of years, and I think you are doing a good job – there is nowhere else where such matters get discussed. My wife too finds your paper compulsive reading. Her previous husband was uncircumcised, whereas I have been 'done', and she has some pronounced thoughts on the subject – she particularly enjoys reading the occasional letter from a woman, and finds an identity of views with most of them.

I would like to respond to a couple of points raised recently. Firstly, I see your new constitution commits you to monitoring new developments in the field of foreskin restoration, and I notice you have printed a couple of letters on the subject, one containing an eye-watering diagram of surgical restitution (which looks like a pattern for a patchwork quilt) and another on stretching.

As an 'unhappy circumcisee', I followed the BUFF skin stretching system for a couple of years and then bought Jim Bigelow's The Joy of Uncircumcising, which, despite its name, is an angry little book. I was impressed by the mass of strongly worded letters quoted in it from men who were not prepared to go through life with the mark of their parents' neurosis (or the American medical profession's greed – they are reported to buy a yearly Mercedes on the income from circumcisions) stamped on their genitals. Amen to that! Incidentally, one man said that his aim in restoration was to be able to go on a nudist holiday to Europe without feeling humiliated, and I can identify with that because I have always had a yen to do the same thing myself but have never been able to face the idea of being a curiosity.

I started off using the surgical tape system you describe in 7/94, and after a couple of years had enough surplus skin to go to the next step. This involves using a large stainless steel ball-bearing under the new skin which is taped shut over it. I found surgical tape quite impracticable since it meant ripping it away from the skin every time you took a pee, and used instead a half-inch diameter, quarter inch wide ring of cohesive bandage (sticks to itself, not to the skin), which gave enough grip to hold things in place.

You can also buy a tailor-made stainless steel 'distance piece' directly from Jim Bigelow for about $100, but unless you can be sure of the size, you will probably be wasting your money. Latterly I have been using a cheap and effective device using the same type ring, a baby bottle teat of the rounded sort with the flange trimmed off and a hole drilled from side to side through the tip, plus a handful of elastic bands. The teat should fit neatly over the glans and the skin then pulled forward beyond the end of the teat. The ring is then applied to the rosette of 'foreskin' which is rolled back with the ring riding over it to be nipped into place at the narrowest part of the teat. An elastic band is then threaded through the holes in the side of the teat tip which should just be protruding beyond the rosette of skin. Other bands are then plaited to it to form a loop at the end which is applied round the leg just below the kneecap. The length of the elastic should be adjusted to maintain a constant slight tension. The beauty of it is, that the whole device can be removed in a moment or two, and if the worst happens you are not left feeling the need to explain away the huge ball-bearing which has just clunked to the floor down your trouser leg.

In this way I have now reached the stage where my glans remains fully covered under most circumstances, and I actually have some overhang in cold weather or after activity. My wife is pleasantly surprised by how much it resembles the real thing, but has reservations about its function in sexual activity – it does not behave like a proper foreskin, being anchored much further back, has no frenulum to flip it back into place and no taper to provide resistance against retraction, which my wife found so rewarding to do with her previous husband.

One of Jim Bigelow's claims is that, although you can never repair all the damage done to you by circumcision, you can restore some sensitivity to the glans by keeping it permanently covered. This may well be the case, but it only works if you're young enough to still have some residual feeling in the organ. After 60-odd years of exposure, my penis head has become totally numb to direct stimulation, and my only hope for orgasm is a powerful fantasy to accompany frantic sexual activity or manipulation – with a high failure rate. This is now a major cause of friction, in every sense of the word (or if you prefer, sore point), with my wife, since my chances of achieving a come without making her sore too are almost nil. The only way left to me of keeping her sexually fulfilled is by frequent cunnilingus, of which I'm not particularly fond. As far as I'm concerned, my only recourse is a porno magazine and a tired wrist, although the extra skin does make manipulation so much easier. Perhaps this will answer J.H.'s query about the sensitivity of circumcisees as they grow older – the message is, make the most of it while it's still there! As Alex Comfort said in his Joy of Sex in his case for retaining the foreskin, "in bloody old age you need all the help you can get!".

Although I obviously take a similar view to R.B.W., I do think he was very unkind in pulling someone's leg for pleading for female understanding and avoidance of criticism (1/95). A disapproving reaction from a girl to your circumcised penis can really destroy your confidence for years to come, as I know to my cost. As a thirteen year old in the late forties, I went on a farm holiday near Brean Sands for a couple of weeks. One day when it was raining, I joined up with another lad of my age and went to watch the cows being milked. In the cowshed we watched the milkmaid, known to the family as Our Madge, who was about our age, pulling steadily away at the long pink dangles, and the thought which was uppermost in my mind was voiced by my companion – “That reminds me of something rude,” he said. Our Madge grinned at him and replied, “Oh, Ar, whatsat then?” “I don’t know,” he said, “but I wish it was me!” Madge then turned to him, grinning, and pulled his shorts down to reveal a penis which closely resembled the cow’s teat, except that it ended in a long rosebud-tipped foreskin. I watched closely as she gave it the same energetic treatment she had used on the cow, feeling desperately envious, not just of what the girl was doing, but of the lad’s long foreskin. When eventually he shed his offering on the cowshed floor, Our Madge generously offered me the same service, but was startled to see my skinless organ which was a complete novelty to her, and she made no bones about her disapproval of it. I tried to explain what circumcision was and why, but she said she thought it daft, cutting the skin off, “You can’t ‘work’ it properly!”. I found the whole incident dreadfully embarrassing and still wince when I think of it.

To change the subject. Mary Whitehouse has spent the best part of her life campaigning for the suppression of porn. Some people condemn her as a hypocrite, but she is not. She is, however, a woman, and women can have no idea of the power of what I call the male sexual imperative. They consequently have no inkling of the misery and desperation faced by men who, through psychological or emotional damage (in some noteworthy cases, from circumcision), are unable to form relationships which defuse this imperative in a socially acceptable way. I am talking here of men who would like nothing better than a normal relationship with a normal girl, but because of mental or physical shortcomings, real or imagined, lack the confidence to do so, and spend their lives in loneliness and misery as a result. The only relief such people can have is pornography and the five-fingered widow.

By doing so much to suppress pornography, Mary Whitehouse has succeeded in lowering yet further such men’s feelings of self-worth by criminalising them and branding them all as perverts. They are not perverts though. The criterion for pornography in my book is whether it causes harm to those involved. The real perverts are those who demand material which do damage to those involved, ie. child sex and so on. But where the participants are willing and perform harmless and natural sexual acts which have no bad effect on them, it is a totally different matter; a quick glance at the enthusiastic ladies who volunteer to be Readers’ Wives should support this point. It is for this reason that I must take R.B.W. to task again, for his rather cruel and contemptuous reference to “Forum pud-pullers” in 1/95: such people may have little other choice.

I notice that G.D. in the same issue is eager to get Penelope Baxter to circumcise her little boy whilst admitting that his boys kept their foreskins – he should put his money where his mouth is! And another pro-circumcision correspondent not only has two uncircumcised boys of his own, but ably defends foreskin retention for an unborn son.

I find reports of the American group ominous – the sort of chap who joins an organisation with a name like Glans Naked and Unashamed is hardly likely to fulfil the balance you aim to strive for, and publishing their material could well bias the paper in a way a lot of your readers would not approve of. But what really interested me in your excellent paper was Brian Rogers' report from the American newspaper. What if the writer's reaction is that of the typical American, circumcised like all his friends and never thinking of it as anything but the norm, but suddenly being told that an enormous wrong has been done to him? As the writer said, "that sort of realisation can drive a man mad". He then switched off his radio and his mind to the whole business. But you don't just conveniently dismiss a thought like that, and I wonder how many Americans who heard the same programme tried to do the same thing, but find it all comes back to them in the small hours of the night when the thoughts of the troubled and sleepless race away? But time can be no healer when you are reminded of it every time you take a pee. So my advice to them is – get Jim Bigelow's book and start stretching NOW!

Revision

Just a quick query that perhaps you can raise in the magazine. I was most interested in the item 'Tight as a Drum' in 1/95 as I have a personal interest in the subject of revisions. Would it be possible to discover from 'Anon' as to which doctor performed the revision to give such a good 'tight as a drum' result? It would also be interesting to know whether the frenulum was removed as well.

The result that 'Anon' describes is something that I long for, but I had just about given up being able to achieve, because when I have discussed this in the past, the doctor has tended to be a bit vague on the final appearance. I am sure that other people could be interested too.

I am happy to receive correspondence from anyone regarding the subject of revisions.

Doing Things

As a one-time reader of Forum I was delighted to discover Acorn. At last, an exclusively cock-orientated forum for cock conscious guys like myself. Long may it continue. Thank you for your dedicated efforts. In time, maybe we'll be able to see each other's cocks in print, even.

I've been 'doing things' to my genitalia for almost as long as I can remember. I hadn't had pubic hair long before I shaved it off, which I continued to do periodically. Nowadays, due to the successful but long and tedious application of a home depilation kit, I no longer have any pubic hair to shave!

Then there was the time, some twenty-odd years ago, when I started to wish I could keep my piss-hole to stay 'open' (don't ask me how this strange desire arose). It didn't take me long after that to discover I had a thin triangular web of skin at the underside end of my piss-slit. Having discovered the previous year on holiday in Greece that it was possible to cut oneself underwater painlessly (unseen jagged rocks in this case), it occurred to me that I could submerge my cock in the bath water and dispose of this 'unwanted' bit of skin with a scalpel. I hadn't achieved it yet by any means, but I was definitely on the way to getting my piss-hole to stay open of its own accord.

One further means to this end was by, firstly, a Prince Albert piercing. Then, more effectively, by similar rings in the glans through either side of the piss-hole, helping to part the 'lips'. Above all this, nothing has been quite so successful as the progressive sub-incisions which to date give me a piss-hole open to approximately half an inch below the glans rim. At this stage, my piss-hole will no longer close up of its own accord at all! And anyway, it has a new, lower-placed P.A. and an inverted P.A. – with a 5mm thick ring in it – to contend with.

Needless to say, I am delighted with things as they are, not least because of the additional bonus the sub-incision provides – that of digital access to the delightfully sensitive inner skin of the piss-tube. This alone is good enough reason for sub-incision.

Reading through back numbers of Acorn, I notice an item from P.D. of Dublin about his sub-incision. I would be quite interested to know how he came to the conclusion that cutting the urethra open halfway down his cock was the optimum incision for ideal pissing. Did you, P.D., do it in one go, on a recommendation, or cut it by degrees in the hope of finding such a point – or is it coincidental to some other motivation? As one in a similar position, I'd really like to know. I piss somewhat untidily these days and haven't spurted on climax for ages, although neither worry me unduly. At least part of the reason for this is no doubt my PA, which, with the ring out, provided an extra underside outlet for piss. The ring in position obviously disrupts the flow. I have considered cutting my PA away, thereby extending my sub-incision, but feel I would probably succumb to another, even lower, PA (no doubt eventually continuing the sub-incision process). In fact, at one point last year, I did partially cut and considerably 'weaken' it.

A point I want to raise, for someone I hope to answer, with regard to sub-incision, is, could I now be circumcised? My foreskin is quite loose and covers the head easily, but can usually be persuaded to stay back for a few hours at a time below the glans rim. I guess if I did/could get cut, my scarline would, of necessity, be below the sub-incision. Can anyone confirm?

I'm not 100% certain yet if I want to be circumcised, since I am able to keep it back off the glans at least temporarily. Conversely, it must be years since I used my foreskin for masturbatory purposes. I usually use dry stimulation of the glans etc., holding the skin back tight. This I would obviously not have to do. I have none of the usually-cited concerns – ie. cleanliness, causing cervical cancer etc. – plus, if two photos in certain American magazines are anything to go by, cut cocks look pretty good to me.

Should I go ahead with this momentous and expensive decision? I only have one chance, so I have to get it right, don't I? What do other Acorners think – and – has anyone ever kept their severed foreskin?

ZED

Self Circumcision

Some of my first memories as a child are of two or three very painful visits to the family doctor. It seems my mother had noticed that my foreskin was very tight.

The doctor used a small wooden spatula to push down between my foreskin and glans to release the tight skin. My parents would then, every night, try to push back my foreskin. On one occasion it became stuck behind my glans. I remember the doctor visiting the house to push it back over the tip of my penis. This course of treatment must have worked as my foreskin became very easy to retract, although my mother would often tell me that one day I might need a circumcision.

I think my mother's words and my experience at the age of three must have drawn my attention to circumcision. By the age of eight or nine I had noticed that some of my friends had very different shaped penises to my own. This, I realised, must be circumcision.

I found myself pulling back my foreskin and liked the look and feel of my penis this way. As my foreskin was now in good working order it would always roll back over the tip of my penis. As I reached my early teens I tried lots of different methods to hold back my foreskin, including the use of paper clips, glue and, most successfully, a small rubber band. This I would place on the tip of my foreskin and then pull back over my glans. The rubber band would be hidden under the folds of skin below the rim of my glans. This gave the look of circumcision and would hold back my foreskin for as long as I wished, which I would do for days at a time without any problem at all.

At the age of eighteen I started work. Now having a regular income I thought of having a properly conducted circumcision. I contacted three private clinics, but the price was very high, £500 in some cases (I now know of places in London where it is possible to have it done for £200, but sadly this was not the case in the 1980's).

My girlfriend at the time was going to work overseas for 3 months, so I thought this was a good time to have the operation, but I had no cash for it. My only option was to do it myself.

I spent many hours looking at books to get to know how it could be done. I found the idea was not such a bad one, and was quite possible.

To start with, I froze my foreskin, using ice cubes in a plastic bag. I then stood over the bathroom sink and slowly cut off the tip of my foreskin. I then pulled the outer layer of skin back over my glans, which left the under layer of skin still covering the glans. The top layer could now be cut off completely. The next thing was to pull the under layer back over the glans and join the two open wounds. I then used six stitches from an army first aid kit to hold the two edges together. The whole of this took about ten minutes and was very painful. The wound took a week to heal together and the result was very good.

My first erections were very tight, but this soon passed as the skin stretched again. My girlfriend was very shocked when she came home, but she soon got used to it and admitted that she had always hoped that I would have it done. Sex is very exciting even after ten years without my foreskin, and I have noticed no loss in sensitivity at all. I still find it exciting when a new girlfriend discovers my circumcision, the reaction to which is always good. I think most females like circumcision as I have been told that it looks better and can be more fun.

Editorial

We had hoped to get a member to do a write-up on the weekend and AGM at Croydon in April, but so far he hasn't been forthcoming, so I thought I'd better do a bit of filling in. The hotel was first-class, new, large and grand. All meals were on a help yourself basis and eat as much as you like (I can tell you we have a few gluttons amongst us). About 25 members turned up so a small conference room in the hotel was hired, where we all gathered at about 2pm. I was asked and agreed to take the Chair until a Chairman was voted in at the AGM, and as some members couldn't get there until 3.30 I asked everyone to talk to everyone else for a couple of hours, reminding them of the subject which brought them there. In previous meetings members had started off very tense and embarrassed, but I'm pleased to say that in no time at all the room was abuzz, and everyone moved around to chat in singles and groups which formed and reformed.

When the AGM got under way, the necessary Officers were voted in, and it was an honour for me to be nominated and voted in as Chairman, the duties of which I hope I can carry out to everyone's satisfaction. The minutes of the meeting will be published in due course, with all the Officers and proceedings. Most of the time was taken up with discussing the Constitution, which was eventually not accepted in its present form but would be re-written more simply.

Afterwards, there was a scar photography session in one of the rooms, the prints of which (black and white) didn't turn out too well, lacking definition. The next morning we were shown a video of an operation with the patient there to show what it looked like a fortnight after. All very interesting, and from letters I've received, everyone seemed to enjoy the whole weekend tremendously, with a lot of new friendships being made.

Funny Foreskins

Having read a copy of Acorn at a friend's house, I have been persuaded to write of my experiences and preference.

When I was at college I had a boyfriend who became a lover. He had a very tight foreskin. At the time I thought this was as it should be. His cock was quite thin and tapered to a tight ruckle at the tip. When he was hard he could pull the skin back to reveal a point of purple. When we did try to have sex his skin was always forward and the whole thing lasted only a minute or two. (I didn't really feel very much of his cock when it was inside me.) He taught me to wank him and I enjoyed this more than sex. I used to have to roll the tassel of skin between my fingers and gently pull it forward. When he had a come his sperm was still inside his skin and I enjoyed squeezing it out. Sometimes he pulled his skin back to finish off but he stopped me from doing it.

Later on I had a much older man friend. He had a very short cock but the tip was very big. He had a long but loose foreskin that hung over the end, and when he was hard his knob end swelled up more than the shaft (when I first saw it I thought he had a deformity) with all his foreskin rucked up behind it. I never had a chance to wank him but his cock felt very nice inside me. It was with him that I started to enjoy sex.

My present man has a thinner but longer cock. His foreskin is easy to push back, is not too tight or very long and when he is soft you can see the end of his knob. He has a little trick. When he is inside me he can pull on his skin and the tip of his cock bends up. That is really nice.

I was interested in J.H.'s account ('Better Late than Never') in 2/95 where he mentions the offending skin tag resulting from his otherwise excellent neonatal circumcision. Similar descriptions of the freak feature have appeared in one or two other stories I've read over the years in Forum and elsewhere. All have mentioned the same experience of having a hole or free passage behind the tag, through which they can pass a thread etc. It certainly is an intriguing variation, and I would be glad if members or Dr. Ray could give an explanation as to how these tags arise, and why they are not picked up and remedied at the post operative inspection.

A good suggestion too from R.B. in the same issue, proposing another poll of 'register of members interests', as it is ever changing. Possibly it also prompts some of the more reticent to add a few sentences of potted life history to the good headings he lists, when they wouldn't bother to send in a full blown article. It may seem simple and mundane to them but, be assured, they make interesting reading to the rest of us.

Famous Name's Status

Actor Tom Berenger. In the film At Play in the Fields of the Lord (video available), directed by Hector Babenco.

In one brief scene, Berenger enters the Amazon Forest. In order to merge with the scenery and not to antagonise the naked Indians who might mistake him for a missionary and aim their poisoned arrows at him, he strips completely naked and offers a full frontal view of his genitalia to the camera.

Berenger certainly lives up to his macho image. He is circumcised and extremely well hung, with a thick and long penis and large testes.

Status

We hear a lot about the circumcision status of various personalities in the world of sport and theatre, but has any member any information concerning the status of television personalities, newscasters, weathermen etc. in this country?

The Circumcision Controversy

There is a very interesting article in the latest edition of HONCHO magazine of Feb 1995, under this title. It is the result of a 15 year study, reviewed by Chuck Thompson.

Although in the USA today the rate of circumcision has dropped to 60% according to the National Institute of Health, it is thought that this is higher as the figures only state those carried out in hospitals, not those done later in doctors' offices, or privately instead of in a hospital to save money. Of course, that doesn't include those done by the Mohelim. The figure is more like 80% today.

'The major health risks for the uncut male are due to the moist warm space between the foreskin and the head of the penis, which offers microbes a natural harbour where they can multiply, fed by smegma.'

He states that, in the USA, the ones who suffered most, of all the men he has spoken to about their trauma and ridicule by their peers, were those who were not circumcised during the post world war period. Even in Britain 100 years ago circumcision became popular initially as a preventative against masturbation. Let's face it, those who are 'cut' don't have any problem masturbating, do they? Urologists encouraged routine circumcision in the USA, Dr Spock urged all parents to ensure their boys were done, in all his baby books.

In 1971, against all the advice given by urologists, the American Academy of Paediatrics determined there was no medical value in circumcision of the newborn. In 1975 this was echoed by the Obstetricians, gynaecologists, and was quickly echoed by those who were already opposed to circumcision. Major campaigns by NOCIRC and NOHARM gained momentum.

'While circumcision advocates offer many health-related arguments for their point of view, the overriding argument for retention of the foreskin on the part of anti-circumcision groups is the greater sensitivity they believe the foreskin provides.'

In 1989, with much more research available, and with the growing concern over sexually transmitted diseases, especially AIDS, an AAP Task Force on Circumcision changed its position. The members concluded that there were in fact clear medical benefits conferred by circumcision, including prevention of phimosis, para-phimosis and balanitis, and a reduced risk of penile cancer. They also found strong evidence associating circumcision with a much lower incidence of urinary tract infection. This position coincided with the long held opinion of urologists who have always favoured infant circumcision. Dr Thomas Wiswell, a paediatrician who was vehemently against circumcision, changed his mind completely after he became involved in the studies of 200,000 boys born in military hospitals. He discovered a twentyfold increase of urinary tract infections amongst the uncut baby boys during the first year of their lives. Research shows that, based on studies in the USA, the overall figure is twelvefold. The more alarming fact is that 10-15% of these infected males end up with permanently scarred kidneys. 10% of this damaged group later developed high blood pressure. Adults who had urinary tract infections as children make up one quarter of the patients who need dialysis or transplants. This points to the fact that urinary tract infection as a baby is a serious condition.

Of the 60,000 cases of penile cancer which have been recorded in the USA since 1930, only 10 have been circumcised men. It was widely reported that uncircumcised soldiers suffered greatly during the Gulf War due to sand getting under their foreskins. This was also a problem in WW2 in the African campaign. These are just a small amount of quotes from the whole article. Chuck Thompson has a group which publishes a quarterly magazine. Anyone who wants further information should write to Chuck Thompson, PO Box 691024, Hollywood, CA 90069, USA enclosing a SAE and IRC.

Many A Slip

Condoms are more likely to fail when worn by young inexperienced circumcised men, according to Australian researchers. In a survey of 108 men who, over 12 months, used 4809 condoms between them, they found one in thirty sheaths slipped off and one in twenty broke during use. Failure was also caused by the conventional method of rolling on the condom, rather than pulling it on like a sock, say the authors in the International Journal of STD and AIDS.

[Not very convincing statistics really. How many were circumcised, and what was the breakdown of failures? Also, they weren't very virile, averaging out at just once a week. — D.A.]

Soaps' Social Stance

For some time now, Celia Hall and Cherrill Hicks have been waging a hard hitting campaign in the Independent to keep the hackers and slashers away from little boys' bodies and defend their right to retain and enjoy their foreskins (or dispose of them if that's what they want).

It seems that their message has reached far afield and is now well-understood in Australia. Last year (or was it the year before?) I remember being revolted and sickened in Sylvania Waters at the sight of the feckless, workshy son-in-law, grinning idiotically as he held his crying baby up with its penis wrapped in a blood-soaked bandage, explaining what a good thing it was. I wonder what the baby would have said if he could talk?

This time it was Neighbours turn to raise the subject, as an older man looked at his new grandson, sleeping peacefully in his cot, and remarked that it would soon be time for the 'big op', making a stretching gesture with one hand and a scissors motion with the other. I was surprised and delighted with what happened next. He was immediately slapped down by both his daughter-in-law and his wife and after stammering that he thought it was better for hygiene, vigorously denied by both women, lapsed into hurt silence. The girl said she was having none of that nonsense and that no-one was going to touch her baby, whilst the older woman joined in energetically, saying it was a barbaric thing to do to a baby and out of place in these enlightened times. Here, here!

If you consider that these soaps, particularly American – and it would seem, Australian – toe the line on current thinking and try to get social messages across to the people who watch them, it would seem that Australia is following Britain and America's lead, working to convince young mothers and women in general that they should fight off the residual pressures for circumcision from well-meaning but misguided parents.

Another nugget of wisdom from Cherrill Hicks' column is the preceding item about condoms. Only a minor point of course, but when added to the mass of Cherrill's and Celia's hammer blows, chipping away at the edifice of entrenched circumcision, you cannot fail to raise a cheer that women are fighting to preserve the integrity of men's bodies.

PS. Please don't suppress all strongly-felt expression of views as being 'hurtful' – if we're too mealy-mouthed our paper will fade into platitude and boredom, which would be a pity.

R.B.W.

[Happy to oblige sometimes. See 'Circumcision Controversy' — D.A.]

Self Indulgence

I have been a regular reader of the newsletter for two years now. I thought that perhaps it was about time I wrote a little article.

I look forward to each gripping instalment of Acorn for the variety of entertainment it provides. We have the horror stories of nervous grown men having to undergo radical surgery. There are the psychological features: "I was butchered as a baby, that is why I'm a wonky adult!". The cultural features, looking at circumcision in other countries, and finally, the best bit of all, the sexy features.

Let's face it. I am 21 years old. I was cut when I was 19 (although everyone in hospital kept telling me I must be 20!). I've been wanking for as long as I can remember and I've been gay ever since I was born. I enjoy the sex bits best. You don't really want to know about the traumas of adult circumcision because you probably know more than I do about that.

I believe that wanking is perhaps the most wonderfully thrilling experience a man can have in his life, and thankfully we men can have lots of these thrilling experiences. But not as many (so we are told) as women.

My ultimate pleasure comes in the form of a bottle. Unfortunately, as I am only a poor student I cannot afford a masseur, so I borrowed a book from our local library and read up all I needed to know on the art of self massage. Couples can try this out too.

Firstly, take a king-size bottle of baby oil, squirt huge quantities into your palms and rub into your body. It doesn't really matter where you begin, you simply need to get yourself covered. Once you have become more slippery than a tin of mackerel you need to rub the body all over. Try to use long slow movements. Pay particular attention to the chest, lower back, stomach, palms of the hands, soles of the feet, buttocks, inner thighs and dangly bits. These areas are called erogenous zones or 'love buttons' if you live where I do. Personally I concentrate on inner thighs, buttocks, palms of the hands and ear lobes. However, every man to his own, so you must find your own favourite love buttons.

Setting the right atmosphere is all important. Do give yourself plenty of time to really ease your body. You need a warm room. I have candles (don't use domestic lighting). Blazing log fires and a soft white rug are optional extras but I manage without them! Some gentle music can help. There are lots of CDs available with tranquillity and relaxation mood music.

If you like aromatherapy, try essential oils like Jasmine (said to strengthen the male sex organs), or sensual Ylang Ylang which smells like sin in a bottle. Whether these potions actually perform the miracles they claim to is not something I wish to debate. However, they smell lovely and send me to sleep.

Now then, what you do after that is entirely up to you. Sometimes I fall asleep, sometimes I give certain love buttons a bit of a seeing to. The main thing is relaxing more, enjoying the feel of sensual massage and loving yourself a little bit. Worship your body whether you are circumcised or not (tenuous link).

I hope, readers, you like my little article. Next time I'll tell you how to choose winning lottery numbers.

Traveller's Tails

“Traveller's tales don't normally impress me,” I told the somewhat ragged stranger over mulled ale, “they can be no more substantial than tankard froth!”

“But you are far too cynical for your own good,” went the olive skinned, bearded stranger, “I may be well versed in mysticism, but I can distinguish between truth and fiction.”

“Mysticism?”

“Yes, the Kaballah, and years of studying it!” He stroked his dark beard. “You and I have one small feature in common,” he grinned mischievously, “from a glance in the urinal – an unintentional glance – I see that you, too, are circumcised.”

I blushed in surprised embarrassment. I usually manage to successfully conceal my status with the cupped palm of my left hand, while the other steadies the glans and gives concealment from the other side. What a wily voyeur he was!

“We are few these days, but in that far off land, the country of Cuttingem, things were decidedly different. It was a land of conformity, tradition, inconsistency...and, er, circumcision!

“The inhabitants were mainly Tidies, who were staunchly loyal to the ruling House of Klip, and I was immediately accepted by them, our shared feature, you know! The Tidies practised universal circumcision as a mark of conformity, following the tradition of the House of Klip. And so vigorous were the mothers with regard to trimming their baby boys that they could be described as Kliptomaniacs!! Mothers even had the clarion call, ‘Born to be Shorn!’ and indoctrinated their sons with, ‘Wise Guys Circumcise! Don't Put Foreskins To The Fore!’ Even maidens delighted in their beaux being, ‘Tidy in both body and mind!’ With the Tidies, there was a small minority, The Choose, who regarded the operation as a religious ritual, as indeed was the case with me.

“Challenging the practice of both The Choose and Tidies was a persistent minority who preferred to remain as they were born, the Smegs, or Brotherhood of Skin, with the double emphasis on hood!! They rejoiced in being truly natural as their Maker meant them to be. ‘Why chop off something so beautiful? Why destroy the comfort, protection and a great source of pleasure?’ Being such a tiny minority, they kept their naturalness well concealed. They particularly dreaded the Foyel, who's speciality it was to produce Choose and Tidies with a sharp knife! The very thought of his Office made them wince, man and woman alike, shaking them from cross-legged complacency. What a terrible thing to do to a little baby?

"I couldn't help chuckling when a Foyel confided in me: 'Oi, Oi, there's nothing more satisfying than going to work on a Smeg!' That would hardly have gone down well with the Brotherhood of Skin, who treasured the parts Foyels often reached."

"You're pulling my ..." I interrupted, "but that's not allowed, is it? Onan, and all that! But curiously, that land seems like this country before the Second World War?"

"Perhaps so," said the stranger, "but in Cuttingem, things were to change... when the government introduced a State Health Service for the whole country, unnecessary surgery was not included in its provisions. To become a Tidy meant a tidy sum, which made the natural part more acceptable in time. Eventually, there was a new uncircumcised generation isolated from the House of Klip and less conforming. Now, remaining Tidies were a minority, subject to certain derision. Down came the old maxim, 'Born to be Shorn', and in its place went, 'Keep him natural, you know it makes sense!' Obviously, you know how they felt from your own experience. I recall your surprise, blush, and cupped hands. Ah, my friend, don't feel bad at all, since you lack my conviction."

"What's that?" I asked, feeling movement in the pubic shrubbery.

"Circumcision with religion!"

Restore Again

I have always heard that uncircumcised cocks were/are more sensitive than circumcised ones. Having read that some Jewish men during the Second World War were able to stretch their (cut, obviously) foreskins to escape detection by the Nazi death squads, I decided to see if this really worked.

After more than a few months of stretching and pulling what was left of my foreskin (done as a baby), I am happy to report that it is now nearly as long as my glans. I thought I might as well continue until my glans is completely covered, which should not take more than a few weeks now.

I have to say that I have found the whole exercise very pleasurable, and that my orgasms have increased in intensity as a result. The feeling of skin moving over my glans is wonderful, and even with a full erection is not painful at all. Has anybody else tried this? If you have a yearning to become uncircumcised then I recommend it, although it calls for persistence and determination. I'd be interested to know other members' views, especially those of a doctor.

School Medicals

Looking back through past newsletters and reading about school medical inspections made me remember my own experience. Our class was about 11 or 12 at the time and we were all ordered to the gym changing room to strip off and don only our PT shorts. The doctor and a nurse set up their stall in the gym teacher's office whilst another nurse weighed and measured us in the changing room.

We queued up in alphabetical order and as in turn, our details were entered on a card, we were each asked to drop our shorts momentarily, and a further note was made. I didn't realise it at the time, but the sharp eyed nurse must have been recording whether we were roundheads or cavaliers.

Later in the office, in the presence of parents (though not all attended), the doctor listened in with a stethoscope and gave us a more detailed examination. Later, when we all compared notes, it emerged that those of us without our foreskins were never asked to drop our shorts. Those intact were, and had their skins retracted. Presumably a glance at the nurse's note on the card indicated whether this was necessary, thus avoiding the need to embarrass parents (as it would in those days!), by asking if their son had been circumcised.

Two must have had a problem because they both appeared next term, circumcised, but clearly done by different operators. One had a thorough job done – skinned right back – but the other had a thick roll of skin around the base of his glans, although it was fully exposed. Both said that they hated their new status and found the operation painful and unpleasant.

Clothing Optional Head-to-Head

I recently visited a 'clothing optional' resort in Florida. At a rough estimate, not counting the employees who always had to wear something, on average about 80% of adults, male or female, were nude in any gathering at a given time. However, almost none of the teenagers were nude, and only about 50% of the pre-teens. I think those statistics in themselves are interesting. I guess the adults were the ones who were there by choice.

Of the adult men who were nude, the overwhelming majority were circumcised. Of the boys, I only saw one who wasn't. He was playing volleyball in a game I was umpiring, with a boy and girl pair of twins who were nude, and five children wearing bathing costumes or shorts. From what I had overheard, the twins had not wanted to strip completely, but had been made to do so by their mother who was sitting near to me. At the time I reflected on how cruel parents could be in inflicting their enthusiasms on their children without regard for peer pressure, particularly when quite a big crowd was watching. However, once they were playing, the children seemed to forget any inhibitions they may have had and not even noticed who was clothed and who was not. And, in the event, I was grateful to her as, having her son and the other boy in the nude, very similar in size and appearance except for their penises, afforded an unusual opportunity for comparison. As they jumped around in the volleyball game they each got a partial hard-on from time to time, so they could be compared that way too. I don't know how old they were – they seemed quite big but had no pubic hair and tiny balls. The twin girl was, interestingly, much more developed than her brother.

I remembered a recent item in Acorn by a Briton visiting America, who commented on the butchered appearance of her American nephews' circumcised penises. Although I am personally opposed to the circumcision of minors, I have to say that, comparing these two boys playing volleyball, the circumcised penis looked much neater in all states. Not having seen a boy's penis which was circumcised for many years, nor an uncircumcised one since my son was very small, I would not have been sure what to expect, but I have to say that, in this case at least, the circumcised penis was much more attractive. It appeared to be completely symmetrical with a neat rounded end like a cigar, and there were certainly no ragged bits. The uncircumcised penis looked wrinkled, especially at the tip, and it was not symmetrical. Not that this is any reason to circumcise of course, and a sample of two is hardly representative, but I think a visitor from outer space might have deduced that the circumcised state is the natural one, and cosmetic appearance is not unimportant in our world.

An interesting postscript. Sitting next to me after the game was a woman I knew somewhat, aged about 40, and I casually mentioned to her the boys different circumcision states, saying I was surprised young boys were still subjected to it. I couldn't help noticing how vehemently she defended circumcision, saying she had made sure her son was "done as soon as he was born". Then she said: "And it's so much better for oral sex." I think this is quite a common attitude among American women. At least I have heard it before several times.

[Your findings on young peoples' nudity on naturist beaches is echoed exactly by mine in this country, presumably because of the embarrassment of body changes going through puberty and after. — D.A.]

Think About It

I wonder if you readers will be interested in the thoughts and ramblings of a middle-aged woman on the subject of circumcision?

I have always been aware of the controversy, since it was fairly common for little boys to be circumcised when I was a girl. In general though, our attitudes were formed by a vague consensus that it was a 'good thing' from the point of view of cleanliness, although very few felt strongly enough about it to object to a foreskin, especially since in the balance of likelihood your prospective boyfriend would have one. Most of my girlfriends at the time certainly had no strong opinions on the matter and tended to treat it as slightly indelicate, and therefore good for a giggle. Most accepted the view that circumcision might possibly be cleaner, although not from personal experience to my knowledge – I never heard a complaint and never myself had cause to. Those who had experience of both circumcised and uncircumcised penises tended to appreciate the different options provided by the foreskin, making the point that it was more fun to play with, although once again this was considered a minor asset and of little significance in a boy's desirability.

When I got married I was largely indifferent whether my new husband was circumcised or not, and it would not have affected my decision either way. In fact my new husband had a foreskin and, like me, never gave circumcision a moment's serious thought. Over the years I grew to enjoy our sexual relationship far more than any of my previous short-term flings, and settled down into a haze of sexual contentment, getting to know my husband's intimate anatomy better than he did himself. We both took a delight in oral sex and it became clear to me that any misgivings I might have had over cleanliness were totally unfounded. First off, the horror story of smegma never materialised: I realised that I had a far greater problem than he did, since it not only formed under the foreskin of my clit, but also in all the internal creases. Since we both bathed regularly there was no problem anyway.

The matter of circumcision however, suddenly came to the fore when my husband had to be circumcised a couple of years ago through failing to tuck his tip away before operating his zip when under the influence. He was not too upset about it at the time since the doctor said it was a minor procedure which would have no effect on our love life and went ahead and signed the consent form. Since then of course we have read in the press that it is not considered necessary to circumcise in such cases, and as a result of our experiences we are both very upset about it. Before his circumcision, my favourite sexual treat was to give him oral sex by taking his penis into my mouth with his long foreskin fully forward and sucking it gently before pulling back on the skin to expose the sensitive pee-hole to the tip of my tongue. This always gave him a delightful sexual jolt which set the scene for the rising sensation as I gradually exposed more and more of his tip to my tongue until finally I freed the rim of his knob completely, pulling back hard and rolling my tongue over the surface of his knob and inner foreskin lining. This sent him absolutely frantic and usually ended in an emission in my mouth before he returned the compliment by treating me to a similar luxury.

This oral sex feast became an important aspect of our love life. It never occurred to us that circumcision would make any difference since we had been assured that sensitivity would not be affected. But I'm here to tell you it's not true! The lack of sensitivity gradually manifested itself as his knob got used to permanent exposure and changed in colour and texture. The mind-blowing jolts of pleasure he experienced as I gradually stripped his skin from his tip changed into a much more muted response and, although he still enjoyed it, we both felt the zing had gone out of our love life. He also gets significantly less sensation from normal intercourse and masturbation than he used to. We did talk about suing the doctor who was so insistent that he should be circumcised but we're not too keen on having our names splashed in the Sun or Daily Mirror.

The point to be made though is one of caution. I've learnt to distrust the judgement of young people – they tend to be so susceptible to crazes and fashions. Although they're considered old enough to marry at sixteen, to be killed in action and to vote at eighteen, I'm sure that on the emotional side of sexuality they don't settle into maturity until they're well into their thirties. So many of them are thoroughly mixed up about their sexuality and the attitudes of others, and it takes an awful long time for them to come to terms with sexual reality, and to be able to separate fact from fantasy. Consequently, any young man who feels an overpowering urge to get himself circumcised should put off the final decision for as long as possible and at least into the mid thirties. Only then can he be sure of making a decision which he might otherwise regret for the rest of his life.

Sheila Hodges.

Member To Member Correspondence

No charge is made for forwarding letters from one member to another. The letter to be forwarded should be sealed and stamped (preferably 1st class).

The letter should then be enclosed in an envelope addressed to The Acorn Society at the PO Box number given on the first page. A covering note saying to whom the letter is to be forwarded and quoting your name should be included.

More than one letter for forwarding can be sent at a time provided the intended recipient is marked in pencil on the corner of the envelope.

The forwarding service must not be abused, however, and will be withdrawn from anyone who uses it to send inflammatory or insulting mail.

Childhood Memories

Herewith some childhood memories which might be of interest to other Acorn members.

My interest in foreskins/circumcisions began at an early age and I cannot remember when my foreskin was other than fully retractable. Being born at home in the late 30's, mother would not have been offered the chance of having me circumcised – a dream which has stayed with me to this day. I don't have any brothers – just one sister some 10 years older than myself.

At bath time – standing in a bowl of water in the sink (no bath in those days), mother would always push the skin back for washing, but never bothered to pull it forward again afterwards. Some time later it would roll forward of its own accord, although it was always on the 'short side'. I was never able to participate in ballooning the skin with urine as I've read in other contributions to the magazine and wonder now if I missed out!

A boy of my own age (about 7) showed me, in an old air raid shelter one day, how to manipulate the skin to cause a very pleasant feeling. I remember that he wasn't able to retract his skin, only the tip, as it was too tight.

I believe that things that happen in childhood stay with you for the rest of your life. For example, I have always hated spiders which lurked on the limewashed walls of our outside toilet, and the dislike of water, having been pushed in on my first visit to the baths at infant school. Some time later, my pal and I were playing with a girl, some 3 or 4 years older than us, called Eunice (a name rarely heard of nowadays), and what happened that day, which I can recall quite clearly, has been a source of excitement and stimulation throughout my life, and centres on foreskins and circumcision.

It was summertime and her older brother had put up a tent in their garden, and the three of us were playing inside. Seizing the chance, and being quite forward for her age, and obviously interested in sexual matters, she suddenly suggested that we show her our willies. We weren't quite sure, but after some persuasion and a promise to show us 'hers' afterwards, we agreed to go along with her naughty idea. She started with my pal, and once his willy was stiff, tried to pull his foreskin back, but without success. Instead, using a finger and thumb, she rubbed and stretched his skin to and fro beyond the tip to produce a climax, such as it was at that age. Then it was my turn. My skin had partly retracted of its own accord whilst closely watching her manipulate my pal. With one skilful push with finger and thumb (again), my foreskin went right back behind the rim. She stood at my side and proceeded to work the skin rhythmically up and down without attempting to pull it forward over the rim, leaving the glans exposed throughout. After a short time her administrations caused a lovely feeling all over, at which point she pulled hard back on the skin several times to finish (me) off.

It was now her turn and, true as her word, she allowed us to feel up her legs and the cotton material of her knickers. She then lifted her short skirt at the sides and, using both thumbs, pulled down and discarded this mysterious navy-blue garment. For starters, she leaned forward, flipped up her skirt again and gyrated her arse cheeks under our noses. We couldn't see very much but better was to follow. She knelt down on her knees and elbows, and with her skirt still up around her waist, parted her legs and thrust her arse up in the air to reveal a full rear view. We could then see her puckered bum hole and much more. Tiring of this she then turned over, stretched out on her back on the rug and lifted her skirt up again. She raised her knees, keeping her feet on the ground, and then parted her legs wide to expose her totally hairless cunt for our approval in all its youthful glory (hairless regions on 'big' girls are still preferred to this day). We were invited to have a closer look. She then used a finger of each hand to pull her thin lips apart to show her vaginal opening. She placed a finger inside, then withdrew it, traced the line of her slit upwards, and proceeded to tease on and around her tiny clitoris which came into view as she eased back its protecting skin with her other hand. It didn't take long for her to 'bring herself off', at which point she clamped her legs together, trapping her hand and probing finger in the process. We then watched her pull her skirt down without putting her knickers back on. My pal and I were completely bemused to say the least.

She sat opposite to us on the rug, leaving her legs apart and her 'goodies' on view. She took hold of a finger of our hand in turn and gently ran it up and down the length of her slit, which I recall was moist and warm to the touch. Eunice had no intention of letting the situation rest there, in that she went on to tell us various stories, whether fact or fiction we'll never know. Apparently her brother Sam and his friend often coaxed her to play with their willies (probably the reason she was so proficient), and in return they gave her money for sweets, etc. Whilst her brother's willy was similar to ours, only longer and fatter (she was only just able to close her hand round it), his friend's willy didn't have any skin over the end and behind the rim when stiff, and she had to wet her fingers to slide up and down his willy in order to make him 'spurt'. Being curious, she'd asked about the difference and been told that he'd been circumcised (what?) as a baby, and the remaining shaft skin wasn't able to be drawn forward over the rim, even when soft. She explained to us that the operation consisted of cutting off the skin, but she didn't know why – probably he didn't know either as it had been done in infancy. His willy end was permanently dry whereas her brother's was moist when she'd pulled the skin back, which was quite tight after it had become erect. He had insisted that she pull the skin over the tip each time for maximum effect – and to show his friend what he was missing, no doubt! She said it was easier and quicker to make her brother 'spurt'. His friend kept telling her to pull Sam's skin down and hold it back. Doing this gave her a strange exciting feeling, especially as the boys had insisted she pull down her knickers and show them her cunt whilst masturbating and prior to having their willies manipulated by a young innocent(?) female. After each session she would go into her own bedroom and relieve the excitement that had built up in the manner which she had shamelessly showed to us earlier. It seemed an older friend called Lillian, who was an unmarried mum with a little boy, had shown her how to masturbate, doing it for her the first time, and it had now become a regular habit. Eunice said her friend had a lot of hair around her slit and above it which had been shaved off at hospital prior to the baby being born. The hair had grown back again in a few weeks. At baby's bath time and nappy change time she had watched with great interest as her friend attempted to retract his tiny foreskin, without success. She persisted however, and some weeks later she was able to ease the tiny skin back behind the rim to wash underneath and coat it with vaseline to prevent soreness before pulling it forward again. Her mother had told her to do this. The baby's father was uncircumcised and had a very long foreskin. She told Eunice that she regularly had to pull his skin right back to ensure that he was spotlessly clean before 'making love', and that when the time came, she should always do the same unless the boy was circumcised, when such action would not be necessary. Eunice had also asked her friend whether 'playing with herself' would cause her clitoris to enlarge: "With a little bit of luck, yes", her friend had joked.

If the baby cried a lot, Lillian would remove his nappy and gently squeeze and rub his tiny penis, which worked quite well and had a soothing effect. Lillian showed Eunice how to do this and when Eunice used to baby-sit for Lillian and her boyfriend when they went to the cinema or the pub, used to use this technique herself.

It was soon time to go home, but is it any wonder that, since that sunny day nearly 50 years ago, my particular 'turn on' is about foreskins, circumcision and related topics. All being well, Eunice must now be nearly 60 years old. Soon after this 'day of enlightenment' Eunice and her family moved away and I never saw her again. My pal and his family also moved away, so I never knew whether he was ever able to retract his foreskin. It was some years later that I decided to become a 'skin back' and then I encountered 'big girls' with breasts of all sizes which are a source of fascination to us mere males.

Finally, I hope the 'Attitude to Circumcision' (Issue 7/94) brings a good response from both sexes. As a 'skin back' in adult relationships, comments have varied, which can be detailed in another letter if this contribution is printed either in whole or in part. Women certainly have their particular views on this topic – let's hear from them, ie. Husband's, boyfriend's, brother's status, and their first encounters with the male member.

Editorial

Just a couple of items. I get a few letters complaining that there's a lack of consistency in the timescale of the newsletters. We have a team of three to get the newsletters out, each of whom have very responsible full-time jobs. We also each have active outside interests which require commitment and cannot be done half-heartedly. Add holidays and the odd family commitment, and you can see that to co-ordinate on a rigid timescale is impossible. It would be the same whoever did it. So please bear with us and you can be assured that you will get 8 editions by the end of the year. At least the complaints mean that the newsletters are always very eagerly awaited.

Brian, as well as his task on the newsletter, also does most of the donkey work with regard to the meetings, which seem to be coming now at the rate of two a year. He has asked me to tell you that the next one is on the weekend of October 14th at Watford. All details can be obtained from him by ringing (01726) 882956. If you get his answerphone and you can't give him your number, just say your name to let him know you are interested and then phone again sometime.

The Meeting For Me

Going to hospital to be cut the week before your fifteenth birthday certainly makes you learn about circumcision. Like all boys at that age, I'd noticed the different cock styles. We all had, and some of us kept a check list of who had and hadn't been 'done'. The split seemed to be about 50/50, though in the sixties a lot more circumcised teenagers were around than now.

I'd asked my father about circumcision as early as twelve. A growing cock knob and tightening frenulum meant I had to be cut and have a frenuplasty during one Summer holiday from school. From then on a general curiosity grew to an adult fascination. Why do some circumcised guys have stitching showing on the shaft; others have a wide brown ring, yet others have nothing showing at all? Could you choose to have plenty of inner foreskin left on the shaft or not, and, if you couldn't, why had some guys so little left and others have a cut mark halfway back on the shaft?

A chance meeting with a guy who is cut (and happy to talk about it) put me in touch with Acorn just in time to get a membership and go to the recent meeting at Croydon. Until joining Acorn I'd thought that, apart from noticing the occasional magazine article or advert in the paper wanting information (which I'd never answered), I was the only man in the country fascinated by foreskins, or the lack of them. For me, it wasn't just knowing which guys I knew or had met who were cut or not, but also wondering how the circumcisions some had had done had turned out. Indeed, until joining Acorn and having things explained, I hadn't even realised there are so many methods to use when getting cut.

Opening a door and walking into a room with 50 guys you'd never met before could be off-putting for a newcomer to an Acorn meeting. Having been to Croydon I can say what a pity it is that all the Acorn members unable to get there cannot guess how friendly and easy-going meetings can be. Most of us in small groups of three or four so you could move around from one to the next as you wanted to. Interesting for me was that not all the guys present were cut. Several were uncut but thinking of circumcision, so they needed talking into it, or out of it, depending on preference and personal experience. One guy was uncut and very happy to stay that way.

Women together seem able to exchange ideas about their own and other women's bodies more easily than men together. Yet I've found that men in company, irrespective of their sexuality, are just as interested in one another.

In any gym, pool or changing room, whether the chat is about cars, cricket, or curtain material, as soon as you drop your pants the other guys will check your cock – discreetly, of course.

With Acorn members, I've at last met a group of adult guys, varied in background and age, self-assured enough to talk about all the things of interest to us. It's great! That we all got on so well together was noticed by other hotel guests when, after drinks, we all sat down together at a communal table in the dining room. "What a jolly lot you all sound together, said a couple at the buffet, "where are you all from?" Thinking fast I answered, "The Prince of Wales gents darts team from Margate. We're playing a tournament." If only they'd known!

My Circumcision

I was not circumcised as a baby. When I was born in 1972 circumcision was no longer offered to parents and it was not the custom in my family. My father is uncircumcised and as far as I know so is his older brother. Again, I do not think either of my cousins on my mother's side are circumcised.

Nothing was said about circumcision either at home or at school. I was totally unaware of the meaning of the word until my mid-teens. At secondary school I noticed a few Asian boys in the showers whose penises looked different from mine, but took no real interest in this difference.

I was never taught at home or school anything about the need to retract the foreskin and wash regularly, although in my teens I started to do this when having a bath without any prompting. Similarly, I was not taught to retract the foreskin whilst urinating and so stale urine used to collect inside the foreskin.

A local computer club brought me into contact with V. who became good friends with me and my parents. When I was about 15 I started joining him in marshalling at motor sport events. This involved several overnight stays and we naturally saw one another's penises whilst showering and dressing.

V. noticed that I was uncircumcised and raised the subject with me. As I said, I knew nothing about the subject and so he explained what circumcision was and why some boys are circumcised. He told me that he had been circumcised as a baby. He also told me of the need to wash regularly and to retract the foreskin whilst urinating. I could retract my foreskin to completely expose the glans but if I pulled it back more it hurt as the frenulum stopped the bottom from going back very far.

At first I could not see the benefits of having a circumcision, despite being told about the problems suffered by some men with a long or tight foreskin. When I left school I went into catering and found myself working in a hot and sticky environment all day. Needless to say, I got very sweaty under my foreskin and it was sometimes quite unpleasant, just as V. had predicted it might be, however I still didn't want to consider circumcision.

As I left my teens I got myself a regular girlfriend and at this point discovered that when I had a very hard erection my tight frenulum not only hurt but also pulled on the back of the glans and made the piss slit point down at right angles to my shaft. My girlfriend suggested that this was not right and could interfere with proper sex. I remembered what V. had said and asked her if she thought I ought to be circumcised. She considered this to be a very good idea.

The next time V. and I were together I told him that I had decided that I wanted to be circumcised. It came as a bit of a surprise to him since I had previously been so strongly against the idea. Once he had discussed it with me and determined that I was serious he set about trying to find a doctor who would do the operation as I wanted it, without fuss, and at a reasonable price. Fortunately he belongs to The Acorn Society and was able to ask for other members' recommendations.

It was clear that I was unlikely to get the operation from the NHS, and if I did I was still likely to have to wait a very long time and then have no choice in how it was done. Two suggestions only seemed worth following up. One was the Surgical Advisory Service, with prices at around £750 and the other was a Dr. Sifman who charged £200. All the reports on Dr. Sifman were good and so we decided to go to him. This selection process took nearly a year since we wanted to be absolutely sure we got the right surgeon and V. wanted to be sure that I really was serious about wishing to be circumcised. The more I thought about it though, the more I felt it was the right thing for me to do.

Eventually I went to see Dr. Sifman at his North London surgery at the end of November 1994. I had a long discussion with him and he examined my foreskin and frenulum. He agreed to perform a circumcision under local anaesthetic and we agreed a fee of £200. I didn't want my parents to know about my circumcision and also wanted to have a week off work to allow it to start healing. I therefore asked if it could be done in March, which was provisionally agreed.

In February I wrote to Dr. Sifman confirming my desire for a circumcision and requesting the operation for Sunday 19th March. This was confirmed by Dr. Sifman within a few days and V. and I each booked a week's holiday to start then.

By this time I had changed my girlfriend and the new one knew nothing at all about circumcision. I told her about it and gave her a booklet which V. had given to me a couple of years earlier to explain it all.

We spent Saturday night in a hotel not far from home so that we could get some pictures of my uncircumcised penis. Not surprisingly I was somewhat nervous that night, but determined to go through with the operation the next day. In the morning I had my last uncircumcised wank.

We arrived at the surgery at 2:15 in the afternoon, ready for a 2:30 appointment. The doctor was ready for me and I had soon signed the consent form which he gave me. I told the doctor that I wanted my frenulum removed and a fairly tight circumcision with the scar line placed well back on the shaft so as to remove only outer skin and keep all of the inner skin. I undressed completely and got onto the couch whilst the doctor finished his preparations.

Meanwhile, V. set up a video camera which the doctor had agreed we could use to record the operation so that my girlfriend could later see it. I didn't want to watch the operation directly but when I saw it on the small tv monitor we had connected to the camera I found it very interesting and watched everything except the initial anaesthetic injections.

My genitals were first swabbed with an iodine based antiseptic and then I was given the local anaesthetic (Bupivacaine) which was injected into the base of the shaft. The first two injections were quite painful, but I never have liked having any injections. As the anaesthetic began to work I didn't feel the remaining injections.

The doctor was soon clamping my foreskin and determining exactly where he was going to place the cut. He placed a large pair of forceps across the foreskin where he was going to cut it and clamped them tight. One quick stroke of the scalpel along the side of the forceps removed my foreskin for ever. As the forceps were removed a certain amount of blood spurted out over the plastic sheet which covered me. I don't think it was really very much, but it looked like a lot as it spread over quite a large area.

The places where I was bleeding were found and sealed, either with simple pressure from small forceps or by using an electric cautery device. After most of these bleeding points had been sealed the doctor removed my frenulum. I had expected that this would be done first to make the foreskin more mobile. The frenulum was quite tough and the doctor had to use both scissors and scalpel to remove it.

Despite all his efforts with the cautery device, the doctor could not completely stop me from bleeding where the skin had been removed. He placed a couple of stitches in there and then started to stitch the two cut edges together. He used a lot of small stitches, close together, and it took much longer to stitch me up than it had done to do the initial circumcision. Dissolving stitches were used so that I would not have to return to have them removed.

Once the stitching was completed the wound was covered with gauze and then tightly bound with bandage, from half way down my glans to just short of my scrotum. I was cleaned up and told to dress and sit quietly for a while. The whole operation had taken about an hour and a quarter.

I was given a glass of apple juice to drink and sat quietly whilst the doctor packed everything away (and V. put away the video camera). About 20 minutes later the doctor again checked me to see if the bleeding had stopped. It appeared to have done so, but I was asked to phone later in the evening with a progress report, or immediately if the bleeding started again. I was given some co-proxamol pain killers and some gauze for later dressings and allowed to go.

On arrival at our hotel about an hour later the anaesthetic was starting to wear off, I took a couple of paracetamol tablets and crashed out on the bed for just over an hour before having a hearty dinner. All had seemed well just before dinner and so I called the doctor to report ok as soon as dinner was over. When I got back to my room I found that I had bled somewhat more, however this didn't worry me.

The glans was very bruised looking for about four days, but looked particularly bad that first night. The bandage had been put on very tightly and it compressed my urethra somewhat so that when I had a pee there was considerable resistance to it coming out.

I took a couple of the stronger pain killers before turning in, but I was rather uncomfortable and I didn't get a good night's sleep. I got up twice during the night to have a pee so as to relieve the pressure. In the morning however there was no real pain at all and we set out for our week's holiday. Although I had to take things easy, and for the first few days was walking with my legs apart as if sitting on a horse, I was able to do all I wanted on holiday and I resumed driving on the Thursday.

The initial dressing was to be kept on for 48 hours and so I soaked it off in the bath on Tuesday evening. It took about an hour to soak off, with me gradually unwinding it as each layer came free. Quite a lot of dried blood dissolved out into the water. When the dressing was off, the cut looked like a broad pink ring around the penis, with a wavy line of dried blood and the black stitches in it. The frenulum area however looked very bruised and sore. A new layer of antibiotic gauze was laid over the wound and held on with fresh gauze bandaging. We couldn't get this as tight and smooth as the doctor had done and it was rather bulky.

I had no real pain and, apart from the first night, very little serious discomfort, but I am glad that I took the week off work and would recommend this to anyone whose job is at all active. During the whole of the first two weeks I only took four doses of the stronger pain killer and about the same of paracetamol – mainly at night as a precaution rather than as a necessity.

The dressing was changed again on Thursday and Saturday nights. Each time the cut looked nicer and cleaner. It was, of course, still very tender and was somewhat painful to try to lift up to examine the frenulum area.

I went back to work a week after the circumcision. The first day was a bit of a shock to the system, but the discomfort had practically all gone by the second day. During this week the stitches started to come out and most were out by the end of that second week, when I showed the results to Acorn members at their conference. The frenulum area still had a scab on it and the scar line was still rather rough, but I was already very pleased with the result.

The stitches had all come out by the middle of the third week and I had my first circumcised wank on the Wednesday. I found this highly pleasurable and shot loads all over my chest! The last scab finally came off the frenulum area the following Wednesday – three and a half weeks after the operation.

Dr Sifman has done the operation completely to my satisfaction and I think it is very neat. When I am erect the colour contrast in the skin is very clear. The scar line has been placed 1¾" behind the rim of the glans on a penis which is 6" when erect. My girlfriend also likes my circumcised penis, which no longer bends downwards when fully erect.

I immediately found I was much more comfortable at work, and really experienced the full benefit during the recent summer months when the kitchen got exceptionally hot.

I would recommend circumcision to anyone who has any tightness in their frenulum or foreskin, or who regularly works in a hot and sticky place. I hope that these notes will be helpful to anyone still trying to make up their mind.

Shaving

A really excellent idea, I feel, would be to put the Society on the Internet (or one of those bulletin boards). Doing this should attract very many curious and potential members from around the globe. I think this is worth doing immediately, if not by yourself, then perhaps through one of the members through a PC/Modem set-up. What do you think? [We are already on both the Internet and Bulletin Boards, by the kind offices of a couple of our members, and nearly all our overseas members obtained in the last year have come through this route, mainly via America. — D.A.]

A personal point. J.H., whom I recently wrote to via you, is, by admission, a depilator – a 'smoothie' (terrible title!). I am considering removing some, or part, of my pubic hair, but the scrotum leaves me baffled. A razor, even a safety or an electric – potentially devastating! The only course of action seems to me to use a hair remover, but have you seen the warnings on a tube of this stuff. Do you have any idea if this chemical (like IMMAX) stuff is safe to use on the scrotum, and will not adversely affect the testicles. Any members out there able to offer a little advice here, as well as your good self, or perhaps you already practice this. [I do, intermittently. You shouldn't worry about using a safety razor (unless you've got DT's). A Philishave was a bloody mess, but a double bladed safety gives me no problems. — D.A.]

A request for information and for the interest of the membership. It seems everyone is thoroughly preoccupied with circumcision, its merits/demerits, necessity or non-necessity. Of course, this is a particular interest of the Society and especially for those who are contemplating or have become dissatisfied with circumcision. Let us see a little more on other aspects of the male genitalia: appearance, statistics, anatomy, sexuality etc., particularly masturbation/orgasm. Do any of the members have any special techniques, information they can share.

Aldo G. Rabiotti.

[We often get requests for more on the personal sexual side, and in the last issue of 1994, Ray Hamble asked for personal information on masturbation. As far as I know he didn't get a reply. In 4/95 we had an article called 'Self Indulgence' in which A.D. extolled the virtues of wanking, a pastime Woody Allen once called 'Making love to yourself', one in which everyone indulges. George Bernard Shaw divided people into two classes – the 95% who admit to masturbation, and the 5% who are liars. Having got that bit of by-the-way over, as everyone is agog to know how others do it, I'd like to ask everyone to write and tell their methods in glorious detail. Each issue I'd like to print a cavalier method and a roundhead method as they are generally very different. If you're shy, just call yourself Anon and don't even tell me who you are.

To start the ball rolling I have a recent letter on the subject, which I'll call 'Self Indulgence 2' — David Acorn]

Self Indulgence 2

I am interested in lubrication! Do people use it? If yes, when? Always or intermittently? When did they start using lubricant? What was their first lubricant made from? Do circumcised and uncircumcised masturbate with different kinds of lubricants? Has anyone made a special lubricant because they are circumcised or uncircumcised?

I personally enjoy wanking with all lubricants, e.g. spit, Vaseline, KY jelly, Liquid Silk, Cyberglide, etc. etc., but use them at different times. Cyberglide is easily revitalised with a dab of water from a glass, and is therefore good when you feel incredibly horny, when you know that you're going to spend the whole morning tossing off.

Liquid Silk is great for someone to wank you off and this is what I use it for.

Vaseline was my first lube and is special because of that. If I have problems getting really hard then I wash my cock, dry it, and then smear my helmet with Vaseline and plenty in my right palm. I then slowly lubricate down the helmet and shaft to the very base.

I think the question of shaving of the genitals is therefore closely linked to lubrications and their use. If nicely, neatly trimmed, the pubic hair is not in the way of your handstroke and you don't pinch hairs. Even better though, is the feeling of the shaved ball sac and base of the cock. The lubrication is twice the fun if smeared all the way round the dick and sac.

I keep my whole cock shaft shaved and ball sac too. I also shave a little bit off the top of my inside thighs too. Apart from this I leave most of the pubic hair above my cock. I don't think that I would find complete hairlessness a turn-on, although I'm sure it feels great for sex. It would leave me thinking of my cock as looking like that of a child – and I'm a man, and like looking that way.

What do other members think about lube, and how do they use it? I think that circumcised men wank more than cavaliers with lubricant, just from talking to friends and family.

Another Muslim

Having just read the controversy regarding circumcision and non-circumcision within the Muslim faith, I feel it incumbent upon me to show that there is a great deal of tolerance and understanding in that faith, and not all intolerant fundamentalism.

I have already revealed much about myself in previous essays in Acorn, including my status as an uncircumcised Muslim. My Muslim lover had 'symbolically' circumcised me by cutting my frenulum and shedding my penis blood. Afterwards, the local Imam had examined my penis, and having ensured that my glans was already desensitised, and that my foreskin could be permanently retracted, had pronounced me a "true and genuine Muslim", welcoming me into the faith with, literally, open arms.

Since then, I have, to my utmost ability, practised the faith as much as was practicable, adhered to all regulations concerning bodily hygiene and its functions. My cock and armpits remain shaven, and will be so till the day I die. I've avoided pork and, when in my country, have regularly attended Mosque and fasted diligently the month before Ramadan, the Islamic New Year. Needless to add, I have always tried to live by the tenets of the Koran.

I hope that all my earnest efforts do not count for nothing in the eyes of other Muslims who come from a different part of the Muslim world, just because my little fold of prepuce, hitherto always permanently retracted by being neatly tucked behind my corona, makes everything null and void – nay, even filthy.

I come from a country which, though no less Islamic than any of the others in the Middle East, is, nonetheless, far less fundamental, which is why, maybe, that Malaya has a thriving economy with plenty of foreign investment.

Malay women are allowed to drive vehicles, and the veil is not imposed on them but remains a personal family choice. Neither is female circumcision ever practised.

In my country, male circumcision lies in the hands of private doctors, or, if available, local hospitals – not the barber, the professional circumciser, or whoever else performs it in the Middle East. Thus, in poor remote villages, where complete medical facilities are not always easily available, there remains a proportion, albeit small, of Malay Muslim men who have not been circumcised. The local mosques take personal circumstances into account, and make dispensations for foreskinned men to be Muslims. Even when government medical teams occasionally tour remote parts, they are far more concerned with general health and the nutrition of natives than with circumcision, which is considered a private matter.

Prepuces like mine, which retract permanently, are no problem once confirmed by the Imam to be Muslim, but men with obstinately hooded penises, or long overhangs, have to be re-examined by the Imam once a year to check for glans hygiene. A dirty glans will incur a heavy fine, donated to the mosque's good causes, and the culprit may be requested to present his cock for examination more frequently – perhaps every 6 months.

My lover taught me the steps whereby I could become an uncircumcised Muslim. If, at a later date, the opportunity arose, he told me that I could always have the full circumcision with a ceremony included, if I wished. In the meantime, I should commence to retract my foreskin permanently and gradually desensitise my glans, which was then raw, liver-coloured, and painful when touched.

I may not be the Muslim of some narrow conceptions, but the local Imam, the mosque, and the religious authorities of my country recognise me as one, and that is all I need. Religion, especially an imported foreign one, always adapts itself to the local customs of the country in order to thrive. The Malays are racially, culturally and linguistically entirely different from the Arabs, and even amongst the Malays themselves, customs differ from region to region.

He revealed to me a pagan Aboriginal/Malay custom (it was not a Muslim custom) of his fishing village, which had become integrated into the circumcision ritual. One year before the Event, all the soon-to-be-circumcised pubescent boys received instructions on foreskin retraction and glans desensitisation.

They were then taken out on a nude fishing trip into remote waters where, on one side of the boat they stood in a neat row. Facing each youth, stood his opposite number, an older man in his mid-thirties, also completely naked. These older men, in their prime of life, were specially chosen for their qualities of proven manhood. They had to be married, potent and virile, the father of children and even, to put it bluntly, favourably endowed with good-sized penises and long heavy scrotums. Needless to add, they had to be circumcised too.

After some prayers, incantations and blessings by the village priest, each older man retracts the foreskin of the youth opposite him. Then each older man masturbates himself and massages his semen into the freshly exposed glans of the youth. This signifies the youth's rite of passage into full manhood, even before circumcision is achieved.

Be it said that this was a straightforward ceremony, neither as painful to the youth to have his glans semen-rubbed, nor as titillating to the older man to play with his own cock, as my words may make it seem. This was a nude male-bonding society, and all the youths had grown up seeing the cocks of the older men, as a matter of daily routine,

During the interim year between this semen-rite and circumcision, it was deemed correct for the youth to approach the older man who was his opposite number, on a regular basis, for his bodily fluids with which to massage his glans, now under ceremonial obligation to remain permanently retracted or as often as possible if the foreskin was loose. The older man's bodily fluids could be urine, natural lubrication or, best of all, semen – whichever of these fluids was convenient for him to offer at the time. After circumcision, this custom ceased, but the older man now became a kind of Godfather to the newly circumcised youth, and oversaw his welfare in every department of his life, especially in matters relating to intimate sexual problems.

Resignation

I am resigning from The Acorn Society, not without some tinge of regret, to return to an honest and open relationship with my wife. I have found much of the material in Acorn useful in working out my deeper feelings about my sexuality, and wish to thank you for making it possible for all us contributors and readers to write freely on subjects that are not dealt with anywhere else.

I think I share an obsession with the penis (principally mine) with most of the members of Acorn, and, through often painful discussions with my wife, have managed to find logical explanations for my obsession which might be useful to other members.

During the last few years, some of the occasions of self-mutilation have led to some joint enquiry as to the origin of my penile obsession. Mutilation of my penis and bisexuality were facets of the same obsession, which are shared by some members of The Acorn Society. I have no doubt that my obsession lay in very early conditioning by both my parents, but largely to fulfil the wishes of my father that I escape infant circumcision. I have written about this before to Acorn, but have a new insight to add. My mother told me that up until I was 6 months old, she (or possibly my father) would fondle my penis until it was erect, and then tug at the foreskin to free it from the glans to which it was naturally attached. This would happen at least once a day. In the cause of doing this she occasionally caused bleeding, and may have torn my frenulum apart. Needless to say, only the members of Acorn not circumcised in infancy could have been subjected to this sort of conditioning. More recently, I have been reminded that my short foreskin showed some scarring parallel to the glans, prior to anything that I did to myself. My GP at the time, with whom I raised the query, confirmed that there were no records of any operations other than tonsillectomy at age 5 in my medical notes, and my mother recalls nothing of the sort. I am left with the strong suspicion that my father gave me a dorsal slit to relieve a recurrent phimosis, sometime after the age of two. I have a nude photograph of me at age 26 months with an intact, if rather aged (dark adult looking, rather than pale and bud-like) foreskin. My father's continuing interest in my penis, and his probable attack on it, go a long way to explaining my bisexuality and desire for self-modification.

After a boyhood in which obsession with my own and others' penes got me into trouble on more than one occasion, I managed to control the obsession by submersion (in the psyche) from age 15 to 28, when a rather premature vasectomy under local anaesthetic awakened the mutilation demon. The attraction for others' penes followed about 12 years later when heterosexual activity had lessened greatly.

All this has nearly wrecked a super marriage partnership, and I am a very lucky man to be able to look forward to a return of this partnership in the future, without the spectre of my father's skeleton in my mental cupboard.

As I have experienced a spectrum of uncircumcised and circumcised states during my sexually active (auto-, hetero- and homo-) lifetime, I would like to give my opinion on the 'ideal' state; uncircumcised with normally bared glans whether flaccid or erect. Reasons: Heterosexual activity is easier for your partner – she has a foreskin to play with if she wants, and plenty of loose shaft skin makes full intercourse much easier for a tight and/or poorly lubricated vagina; wanking and being wanked are also easier and can be varied.

Before I finally sign off I would like to reply to ZED, and to raise a new issue.

1. ZED can be assured that if he continues to extend his subincision, that once the jet can fall clear of his glans, the splashing, wandering and dribbling will stop. Once ejaculation can come clear of the glans, the range increases to about 6 feet. On circumcision after subincision, ZED should be aware that he will be fixing about 8 inches (assuming a 6" penis with a 2" knob when erect) of shaft skin to, at most, 4" of split urethra. The surplus goes into a hood over the glans, which is technically more difficult to circumcise than a freely mobile all-round foreskin. It will have to be done by 'cuff resection'.

2. The new issue is Prostate Problems. I am sure that some Acorn members, like me, have noticed the insidious onset of symptoms of prostatic enlargement... slower, smaller calibre stream, stop/start during urination, getting up in the night. The medical literature tells us that there is an epidemic among the over 50s in Western countries, that at least 25% of males over 50 will have at least one operation to relieve kidney threatening blockages before they are dead. The drug companies are racing to try to find a drug that they can put all of us over-50s on for the rest of our lives to 'prevent' prostatic enlargement. Yet the causes are unknown and remain largely unresearched.

Speaking from my own and friends' experiences, the obstruction is worse at night, during stressful periods, after long periods of sitting (eg. driving on a long journey), and is least after exercise. By keeping a diary of activity, stress levels and diet as well as of symptom scores (I use flow – rated 1 good, to 3 poor), sensation (rated 0 normal, to 2 very tingly), number of pumps to clear the residual out at the end (0 to 10), and number of intercurrent stop/starts (0 to 10), I have discovered other factor(s) contributing to my varying condition. Chocolate invariably leads to obstructive symptoms between 6 and 12 hours after consumption (a number of temptations after the diary discovery have confirmed this). I was very fond of chocolate! Bacon, pork and beef have also been associated with symptoms between 12 and 48 hours after consumption. Transfats and items containing them are also suspect but not experimentally proven on me by inadvertent challenges.

The fully detailed composition of transfats and of chocolate are unknown; they may contain hormone-like compounds, or my problem may be allergic. The meats are more likely to contain hormone residues, which may be quite 'natural'. The circumstances under which I ate those meats (away from home) meant that I could not check their origin. What I do know is that nearly-mature cockerels that I have raised and eaten have given me problems, whereas immature birds, hens of the same age as the young cockerels, and old hens do not. Natural testosterone levels in meat may therefore influence prostatic enlargement. Stress is known to raise one's own testosterone levels, so that may explain the coincidence of stress and worsening of prostatic symptoms.

None of this is in the scientific literature, but I am satisfied that, apart from occasional lapses when eating with friends, or out, the elimination of chocolate, transfats, and all male animals from my diet, as well as the control of stress, has maintained my prostate in a more normal state than it has been in the last few years. I would encourage anyone who is worrying about prostatic symptoms, which fluctuate inexplicably, to keep a detailed diary. That may help to pinpoint, as it has done for me, some of the more controllable associates with symptoms, which can then be avoided. If you go to your doctor about this, at best he/she will send you away saying come back when it gets worse, but he/she may offer you drugs for chronic medication or an operation which usually removes your power to ejaculate, and which may make you impotent and incontinent as well.

Sir Michael Tippett

The leading British composer, Sir Michael Tippett, in his autobiographical Those Twentieth Century Blues (London: Pimlico, 1991, £10 paperback originally, but now £3.99 in book clearances), includes (p.1) an account of “the horrors of a second circumcision – a quite dramatic affair, which certainly left an emotional scar. It was my father’s decision that both Peter (his brother, two years older) and I should be circumcised. This had nothing to do with religion. In his own first sexual encounter in adult life, with a woman, he had experienced the common problems associated with a tight foreskin and decided he himself should undergo circumcision. Subsequently, he felt that Peter and I should be spared such problems; in addition it might possibly be worthwhile for reasons of morality or cleanliness (a notion that became prevalent in post-war America).

Unfortunately my operation proved unsatisfactory, and a second was needed. The doctor decided that I, aged 5, should not have an anaesthetic this time, but should be lulled into sleep by other means, while sitting on the basin in anticipation. When the cut occurred I woke immediately and let out a piercing shriek. There was blood everywhere”.

Sir Michael was born on 2 January, 1905, and his father in the last year of the Crimean War, in 1859, marrying late. ‘Post war America’ therefore refers to the 1920’s. The family was comfortably middle class, the father having made his money as a solicitor, and this account illustrates the quite widespread interest in circumcision among this class around the turn of the century.

The book mainly concerns Michael Tippett’s activities as a composer, concentrating on the 1940’s and the 1970’s, and on the literary and other sources which inspired his music. There is recurrent coverage of his homosexuality (mostly at a time when homosexuality was illegal), mainly dealing with the problems of managing his relationships with his partners, with how he influenced them and they him, and with its effects on his other friends. The book includes substantial sections on his dreams, which he analyses according to Jungian principles, and on his pacifism and conscientious objection to the 1939-1945 war.

Pumping

I have recently been introduced to the pleasures of 'pumping'. What is pumping? Well, to put it in the right context, it is submitting your cock to a vacuum, using a proper vacuum pump and a lucitite (a special type of plastic) tube. These tubes vary in diameter but are all the same length. They start at 1.75" diameter by 11" long. Unlike the so-called pumps you can buy from sex shops, these items are properly made in the USA. You choose the right sized tube to suit you, but allow that when you are erect you are always thicker in diameter.

To use the pump you must do some preparation, in that you massage your cock with a suitable lubricating cream, my favourite being Boots A & E cream. This softens and lubricates your skin, allowing it to stretch. Heat is recommended, and to this end a heat pad is wrapped around the tube. The neck of the tube does not use a rubber ring to seal it, you just grease it with vaseline around the edge and just inside the entrance. You then slide your cream-coated cock inside the tube, connect the pump by its instantaneous coupling, and pump, the vacuum drawing you into the tube, making it airtight. Your cock slowly expands to fill the tube breadthways and stretches in length. It is a very pleasant sensation and the size increase stays for a couple of hours. This has an advantage if sex is getting a little boring and you want a change. For those who are gay, the company makes a buddy tube, which is a double ended tube that has the valve in the middle so that you can pump your partner at the same time as yourself. Even have a tug-of-war!

If you do it regularly each day, the stretching increases, and there is an increase in both girth and length, but this occurs to dedicated pumpers who do it for hours at a time, 2 or 3 times a day. I do it for about an hour when in the mood. As a point of interest to those of you who are circumcised and want to get back a foreskin, I know of one pumper who has done exactly that, now has a foreskin, and his cock has stretched to 9.5" in length (genuine size).

Anyone who is interested in this is welcome to write to me and I will endeavour to answer any questions.

Regrets

I have a great deal of sympathy for Mr and Mrs Hodges (Sheila Hodges, Issue 4/95), and Mrs Hodges account of her husband's recent circumcision, after which, both lost much of the excitement and pleasure of lovemaking. Her excellent description of the slow loss of sensitivity exactly parallels my own experience after my re-circumcision a year ago.

Although I was circumcised as a baby I knew very little about circumcision, or even penises, and, as I used to get a great deal of pleasure from my frenulum, and particularly from sliding my foreskin back and forward over the rim of the knob, I assumed this was normal in a circumcised penis. I now realise that I had been only partially circumcised, as I had a foreskin which covered half my knob.

What I have found in my new, totally circumcised, state, is that there is now a large and empty gap between having a sexual idea and orgasm. Reaching orgasm now requires a great deal of tedious, strenuous, and not particularly pleasant, manipulation, and then BANG! an orgasm. Before, this period of 'build up' before orgasm was extremely pleasurable, and is a most important part of any loving relationship. It can even be enjoyed without necessarily ending in an orgasm.

It is, I think, impossible for a man, circumcised at birth, to know how much more pleasure he might have enjoyed if he had a foreskin, just as it is impossible for an uncircumcised man to understand how little sensation (comparatively speaking) a circumcised man has.

I contacted NORM (UK) (mentioned in 3/95) (Phone 01279 429771) and found it very helpful to discuss the feelings of anger, which this situation brings with it, with other men who understand this difficult-to-talk-about problem. I have also found the book The Joy of Uncircumcising (quite a big book actually, Anon 3/95, but, I agree, not the best possible title) extremely helpful. This gives us unhappy circumcisees some hope that all is not lost, as it seems to be possible to regrow a certain amount, at least, of cut foreskin.

On the other hand, it has to be said that the appearance of my new penis has been very much admired. I think that this is because the head has grown bigger, or appears to be bigger, and even when soft my penis has a more sexual appearance. So if you value appearance over sensitivity a circumcision could be an option.

May I also say that I agree with Sheila Hodges' last remarks about how long it takes some people to reach emotional maturity and sexual reality, and some men (myself for example) are well past their thirties before they can separate sexual fact from fantasy. My impression is that women are much better at reaching this maturity than men.

I expected to get a few comments in the postbag after the TV programme It's a Boy, but in fact only got one, from a bitter, angry member who saw himself as the baby strapped to the frame screaming its head off. A friend, who isn't a member, also said that he became very distressed to see it. After being circumcised as a baby, with the operation botched, he had to have another one which left him not growing properly.

The programme was fascinating inasmuch as, dealing only with the religious ritual side of circumcision, it was attacked by people inside the religions. It appeared to me that the defenders, Dr Sifman among them, didn't realise that the final programme would be so anti-ritual-circumcision, as their defence could have been more passionate. There was a follow-up viewers' programme which I failed to see, but hope that someone made a copy and brings it to the meeting this week.

To turn to the meeting. At the last count we have 22 members coming. This and the last meeting shows a vast difference to the first couple, where there were only a handful at each and all very tense and ill-at-

Bolivia Revisited

In Issue 8/92, D.P. – London, submitted an item entitled ‘Bolivia’, which reported a story originally on an electronic bulletin board (BBS) in the USA. The gist of the item was that the Bolivian Constitution included a requirement that its citizens must be uncircumcised.

I was extremely sceptical at the time, but had no means to verify the statement. Recently I gained access to the newsgroups on the Internet and discovered a newsgroup devoted to Bolivian culture. I placed a message in that newsgroup asking if there was any truth in the matter. Three people have replied as follows:-

1. “The information that you got is wrong. The practice is becoming popular among newborn boys for several reasons. First of all because of hygiene, secondly to avoid infections etc. There are other factors also as for convenience for the mother to take care of the baby. When a person becomes an adult the main reason is hygiene. I know that almost 50% of the population gets the circumcision done at birth.” — Wilma S. Siles.

I thanked her and said I didn’t realise circumcision was so popular in South America. I asked if she was a native Bolivian, living in Bolivia. I got the following reply.

“Circumcision is becoming popular because Bolivian native people are not very clean, so that circumcision helps to avoid infections.

I was born in Bolivia and I live in the United States for almost nine years, and work at Michigan State University” — Wilma.

2. “It is not so. In Bolivia live many Jewish people and all the just born boys are circumcised. I am a Jewish mother and my son is circumcised too.” — Luisa Marek de Vasquez.

3. “Respecto a la circuncion en Bolivia, lo que tu insinuas es absolutamente falso. Los bolivianos son amantes de la copsas naturales. No creo que por razones religiosas o higienicas se les imponga al sexo masculino la teoria de la circuncion” – Guillermo Rojas.

So there you have it! Bolivia does not require its citizens to be uncircumcised – indeed, the infant circumcision rate is about 2/3 that of the U.S.A. and about 5 times that of the U.K.

Terminology

Am I the only person to find myself thoroughly fascinated by the terminology with which we boys are encouraged to refer to our private parts? I was born in the late 1950s, to a lower middle-class family in Southern England, and in my earliest years my penis was my 'nothing'. I knew no other word for it – and, although I clearly remember at the age of about 5 saying to my mother that there must be a proper word for it, and that we could perhaps find a library book which would tell us(!) – 'nothing' it remained.

I don't remember any moment of confusion or readjustment, but at junior school it certainly wasn't your 'nothing'; the terms universally used were 'cock' or 'prick'. The school had a fair social mix, in a recently built neighbourhood of a new town, but 'willy' – which was used by some boys – seemed to me then to be a more working-class name; the posher kids referring to their 'cocks' or 'pricks'. However I do recall one lad confiding that he was shortly going into hospital to have his 'ding-dong' circumcised – which was the first and only time I've heard that particular piece of nomenclature.

At secondary school, 'dick' was far and away the commonest term – together with 'balls', which was used to refer both to the testicles and the genitalia in general. As we were all hitting puberty at the time, this meant that for many years I was under the impression that 'dick' was the word used to describe the sexually mature organ, while 'cock' and 'prick' referred to undeveloped equipment; young boys had cocks or pricks, adolescent lads and young men had dicks.

As for circumcision itself: no-one in my family is circumcised, and the junior school friend was the first person I'd ever heard using the term – I had no idea what the term really meant. However, I clearly remember, pre-secondary school, an older boy in the Scouts talking about 'circumcision' and then – when I asked him for an explanation – saying something to the effect that the end of your dick sometimes got bunged up with dirt and became sore, in which case the doctor would chop it off. I've no idea whether this individual was circumcised, but the explanation seemed bizarrely improbable, and puzzled me a great deal.

When I started secondary school, there was a reasonable sprinkling of cut cocks to be seen in the showers after games. Many of these were completely undeveloped, others were on boys who were already reaching puberty. This was really the first time I'd ever seen large numbers of other boys' willies: we didn't undress for games at junior school, and the only other time I'd had a good look at another penis came as the result of some pre-pubescent fumbling with my best (uncircumcised) friend. But the strange thing is that I don't remember being at all puzzled by the circumcised cocks I now saw for the first time. Nor do I remember any dawning of the light over my scouting friend's explanation. Rather – surrounded by both immature and growing cocks, at various stages of puberty and of all shapes and sizes, I think I simply accepted the circumcised sort as just another sort of natural variation on the form I possessed myself.

It wasn't until sex education began – in our second year at secondary school – that I really began to realise what the implications of the difference were: that it wasn't something that occurred naturally, but was the result of human intervention. Obsessed with my genitals as all boys are at that age, my fevered pubescent imagination seized on this idea with enthusiasm: somehow it seemed to me that it was the most self-confident, athletic, popular boys who were the circumcised ones, and I dreamed about becoming like them. They were a group for which I felt awe and admiration – an elite from which I was excluded – and I took any opportunity I could to catch a glimpse of that tantalising difference. But I vividly remember a lad in my house, who'd been shorn of his foreskin during the summer holidays, arriving back for his second year displaying one of these – to me – fabulously altered tools, the healing scars on which were still clearly evident. Unfortunately, however, it couldn't have happened to a worse candidate – he was a quiet, rather shy boy, already well into puberty. His penis was already quite large, so the circumcision was painfully visible to all and sundry and, as a result, he was mercilessly teased about it – to his intense embarrassment.

But, to return to the point with which I began. What are other members' terms for their equipment? Am I the only person in the world who had a 'nothing' when young? What did others call it? And, for those circumcised as boys, what was the term used to describe the operation? 'Bimming' was one referred to (in these pages, I think) recently. Are there others? Perhaps we could have an Acorn glossary to get some of the idea of the range of terminology across geographical, social and chronological categories.

Fundamental Trimmings

Here, in the deep South, in the Bible Belt, there are many so-called Christian Schools, run by denominations who interpret the Bible literally. Although most of the students come from this religious background, a small but increasing number of parents who are not fundamentalists are choosing these schools for their children. They apparently feel the disciplined, drug-free and violence-free environment offered compensates for the distortion of the academic curriculum (rejection of evolution for example), the frequent and compulsory prayer, the physical punishment (for which both boys and girls are liable by written contract up to the age of eighteen) and the relegation of females to a subordinate role.

Canadian neighbours of mine, the LaPierres, who recently moved to the U.S.A. for the first time, decided to send their 15-year-old daughter and 13-year-old son to such a school. The other day, I ran into the family at a social gathering and the subject came up. A group of us were chatting, and Mrs LaPierre was relating rather amusingly some of the rigours of life at the school. She then said that John, her son, had had to be circumcised. An embarrassed silence fell over the group. I could hardly believe my ears, of course wanting to know more but not liking to ask. I noticed the boy, who was in the group, turned a bright red, and his sister looked at him with a smile on her face. Sibling schadenfreude. The mother was obviously not the type to notice this.

Fortunately, another neighbour, a newly married girl whom I do not believe can be more than 22, broke the silence and asked what Mrs LaPierre meant. Unfortunately the reply was not very explicit. It seems that at a routine physical on entering the school, the doctor had recommended circumcision “to be like the other boys” (very common here). One speculates it could also have been to combat evil temptation.

Incidentally, if I had been making up this story I would have had chapter and verse on what the doctor said, and, of course, the doctor would have been a sexy young woman. But sorry, folks, this is real life.

By a curious coincidence, a week or two later Mr LaPierre asked me to help him complete some medical insurance claims, as he was unfamiliar with U.S. procedures. The circumcision charges were among them. From memory (I could hardly make notes), they were approximately:-

Physician's Fee	$540	$400
Hospital Fee (Outpatient)	$680	$540
Lab. Fee	$150	$120

This total of $1,370 (I remember the exact figure) does not include any fee for an anaesthetist, which presumably means a local anaesthetic was used. From experience with other surgery, I know a general anaesthetic would have added another $400 or more, but if you're paying $1,370 anyway, what, I suppose, is another $400?

A Matter of Weight

One consequence of weight-watching not directly associated with seeking a healthier shape, happened to be Acorn oriented.

Weighing naked made me more conscious of my circumcision, by having to look down at the liquid crystal display. Beside the wonder of electronics, a scar such as used for thousands of years as an identification mark of tribe or creed! I conjured up thoughts of how much extra weight I'd be carrying had my foreskin not been excised in infancy!! Could it be perhaps 2 ounces, 3 when particularly fleshy, or even 4 or more when thick and long? I bet there are no figures readily available, even from hospitals.

Presumably, neonates must have about  $\frac{1}{3}$ oz of prepuce, which would make the maximum 'cull' of 2,000,000 per year 18.5 tons. That represents the sacrifice of a full hundredweight of infant foreskins each day in the U.S.A. when circumcision was at its peak – almost four skins being excised every minute.

Though originally used for the production of interferon, severed infant foreskins are currently used in the treatment of extensive burns in the United States.

Redundant Foreskin

Being blessed with a long and tight prepuce which, much to my annoyance, would not retract until the age of 13, I later had severe discomfort when working in hot, dusty conditions due to the accumulation beneath the prepuce (I think it found its way in by capillary action due to the moist condition). By experiment, I found that, because of its tightness, the prepuce would, if dry, remain permanently in the fully retracted position. And so it has been for the last 50 years, wrinkled up and completely redundant, leaving the glans bare. I push it forward about every two months just to check that it is still healthy. The bare glans has given no discomfort; liberated from the constraint of the prepuce, the glans has expanded. My late wife and I had a wonderful sexual relationship.

For primitive man, a foreskin probably afforded good protection for his penis during hunting activities. But I have long been of the opinion that for modern man a foreskin is, at best, useless, and quite often a liability. In principle I am very much in favour of circumcision, for which I would have opted had I been near a centre. In U.S.A., circumcision appears to be accepted as the norm by most people, and procedures such as Plastibell have led to more uniformly satisfactory results.

Circumcision and Masturbation

The elephant hasn't forgotten! Several months ago, in 8/94, I sought the views of readers on the difference between the quality and techniques of masturbation, and sexual activities generally, between the circumcised and uncircumcised. I promised to keep readers informed of the outcome, and David Acorn reminded me, subtly, on page 8, Issue 5/95, that I had not done so. [Sorry, Ray, I didn't mean it that way. I'd just not seen much response for you and was hoping that my initiative might help you. — D.A.]

At the same time as I asked the question in this magazine, I posed a similar query to the readers of Zipper, in which I write a regular column. The response was very disappointing in both instances. I got a few comments on masturbation in general, but the key issue of its interaction with circumcision in particular didn't produce sufficient information to be worthy of analysis.

What did emerge was that masturbation, even into considerable old age, is a most important sexual outlet for most men. It is seen by them as being very much a behaviour pattern in its own right, not merely as a second-rate substitute for partnered sex. Several correspondents made it quite clear that they preferred solo masturbation to any form of sexual intercourse with either men or women. They could develop their powers of fantasy to incorporate any whim or kink that appealed to them without having to take into account the views of any partner. Neither was their enjoyment impaired by any performance shortcomings on the latter's part. Furthermore, they had no problems of shyness or nervousness with strangers to overcome, nor had they any fears of infection.

Arising from the correspondence, the concept of a national 'Group' to bring together dedicated wankers for fellowship, fun and mutual support in the event of any psychological anxieties was mooted. It is still in the formative stages and I shall be happy to pass on any letters which members may care to send, to the convenor in Yorkshire. Just send them to me in a sealed, stamped, but unaddressed envelope, via The Acorn Society at the W-s-M Box number.

[Running on with this subject I have so far only had two replies to my request. Both are cavaliers, but the second one doesn't do it in a cavalier fashion. Please let us have a lot more of your closet pleasures. — D.A.]

Self Indulgence 3

In response to your request, with the safeguard of anonymity which I know I can trust, I hereby bare my soul.

I am now just over 70, married, with about a 7" cock having a thick foreskin which just covers my glans when soft and nearly disappears when hard.

I was first introduced to wanking by a friend when I was about 8 or 9. He told me that if I kept rubbing my jimmy up and down I would get a sudden nice feeling that would make me shudder. How right he was. After that I used to have a 'rub-up', as it was called, with many boys as I grew up. The excitement of each boy as he first obtained a bead of come approaching puberty was great. All the knowledge was passed down from the older boys at school, including sucking yourself off, a pastime I loved and managed to carry on until I was about 18, when my body thickened out. I remember at the start how disappointed I was that my come didn't have a really positive taste. I felt sorry for the tubby boys who couldn't bend down enough. Another thing that we used to do in our teens was to see how many wanks on the trot it took to come dry. Four was about the average and it made our foreskins puff up to twice their thickness, which took a couple of days to go down.

When I got married I still carried on wanking, unbeknown to my wife. I never regarded it as a substitute for sex, but as a part of sex itself. So when my wife, having had her children, showed less and less inclination for sex, and finished completely when I was about 45 (this being not uncommon, I'm told), it didn't upset me at all, I still had my wanking.

Up until the age of 60, my method was almost always the same, a full fist clutch, drawing back my foreskin completely until my frenulum was tugged, then pushing fully forward until the root of my cock was tugged, pulling my balls as well. This was started very slowly so that the slight moisture under my foreskin caused an exquisite friction over my knob and corona. When it became completely dry after about 20 strokes I would go faster and faster. Not that coming was the be-all and end-all. I enjoyed it so much that I would go on for an hour or more without coming, and even then leave it till later, when the orgasm would be more intense.

So that was up to about 10 years ago, when I found that my knob began to lose its sensitiveness. Whether this was due to age or the fact that my 3 or 4 wanks a week had taken its toll, I don't know. So from then on I had to look for stimuli of one sort or another. I tried many things and always found that novelty helped (thank goodness), and one step invariably led to another. For instance, I started one way by strangulation of my cock and balls with a tied handkerchief. From there it went onto cock rings (3 or 4 at a time), and then, if I pulled my skin right back down the shaft and wedged it under the rings, I found I was pseudo-circumcised, and thence with KY jelly or cream I could have a circumcised wank, still using my fist. I tried rubbing my thumb across my knob, dry, like I'd seen the young American boys on video do, but it didn't do anything for me at all. Probably the most never-fail way is to put a rod (a biro pen is OK) up my bum and waggle it around until I touch my prostate gland. The only drawback to this method is that the orgasm tends to feel very sharp, so I take it out at the very beginning of feeling myself coming.

Then I read in a book that masturbation can be enhanced by tension. It said to lie on your back, tense the muscles at the base of the cock as if you were finishing a pee, but keeping them tense. Do the same with the anus muscle. Then, keeping your heels still, press outwards with your knees. Press your eyes shut, keep catching your breath for as long as you can, and if you've been wanking during this, your stroke will shorten to about half an inch involuntarily. If you give yourself up to this you will find (hopefully) that you have a constant feeling of coming until at last you do come. It works for me most times, but there are a few times when I fail to get the feeling. There was a sex doctor, named Robert Chartham, who advocated something similar. He said to put a thickish book between your legs right up under your scrotum and squeeze hard. I managed to come only once. The book must have been Moby Dick.

As time has caught up on me my amount of ejaculation has dwindled, and where before I could shoot it out, it now is just an ooze. My constant worry is that I should either get to a state where I never reach orgasm, or that I lose the urge anyway. What's the quickest form of suicide?

That's all I reckon. I am not a one-off human being, so that I should imagine that everyone can relate to one bit or another of my wanking career.

Self Indulgence 4

Although a cavalier, I very rarely make use of my foreskin when wanking (although, funnily enough, I shoot further this way), but prefer the direct contact with the bare knob. By now my knob is sufficiently tough that I can't really feel any difference whether the skin is forward or retracted.

I prefer the use of some form of lubrication, although I can dry wank without the knob becoming too sore. Preferred lubrication is saliva or KY jelly – they produce very different sensations.

Also, different results are produced depending on whether I use my right or left hand – I find the normal clenched fist method the best. The inner foreskin for a couple of inches behind the knob is quite sensitive, especially in the area around the join of the skin (the raphe I think it's called).

I have found a good method is to position myself over a washbasin, so that my balls are resting over the rim and pressure is applied to the perineum, which tends to heighten the orgasmic sensation.

Although holding the foreskin tightly back so there is no movement at all is quite pleasurable initially, I prefer to have some loose skin moving as I come, otherwise I lose quite a lot of sensation (this is one of the factors making me hesitant in going for circumcision).

I apply pressure up and down the shaft and knob until I come, when I find it impossible to touch the upper side of my knob, and intense sensation comes from the frenulum area just under the glans and towards the tip. There's an initial spurt or two, then it becomes mostly a dribble!

I need to have some sort of sexual outlet preferably every other day, and my pattern at the moment seems to be normal intercourse once a week and wanking two or three times a week. Not ideal, as I far prefer the former, and there is no comparison in the quality of orgasm.

The main thing of course, is that I enjoy my cock so much and make as much use of it as I can.

Shaving

I was interested in Aldo Rabaiotti's request for advice on genital shaving in 5/95.

I am now 62 and, apart from occasional lapses of no more than a few months, have kept my pubic area close shaved since puberty. I didn't go through those dramatic changes until rather late, around 16, although I had already been homosexually active for seven years since I was nine. I had grown to enjoy the smooth feel, and my increasing resentment at the first appearance of hair was fuelled by ridicule from already hirsute schoolmates who scorned its late arrival in my case. Shaving off the few preliminary wisps adequately allowed me to explain the absence of a more luxurious growth. My reputation for sexual promiscuity gave me licence to do such strange things.

I have both experienced, and seen in others, considerable painful skin burning of the scrotum from the use of various depilatory creams and, though some recent arrivals on the market claim to be harmless in 'even the most tender areas', I am reluctant to experiment. My experience with electric razors has always been painfully disastrous. Very many years ago, as a young hospital doctor, I was sometimes expected to shave potential patients for surgery and achieved a beautifully close result with an old-fashioned 'cut-throat' razor. I don't recommend any D.I.Y. enthusiast to attempt such an approach today, however.

Nowadays, I use a Gillette twin-bladed 'Contour 11' razor (I think that's what it's called, I've been using it for yonks), together with Somerset's Shaving Oil, rather than foam or gel. This comes in easily packable tiny 10ml bottles, and I get mine from the larger branches of Boots, but I must admit it isn't widely available. It's quite expensive at £2.99, but you only need three drops, and it lasts for several months. I am able to grip the neck of my scrotum and stretch the skin over my testicles so that I have a smooth surface to shave. It literally takes only a couple of minutes every morning after my shower – much quicker than my chin – and I can't remember when I last 'nicked' myself.

Radical Circumcision

I was showering at my local swimming baths after my weekly swim, when two other men joined me, and I couldn't help noticing that both were well-circumcised like me. What was remarkable however, was that one of the men had a huge knob and the area immediately behind the corona had been cut down to give a deep inlay of about  $\frac{1}{4}$ " depth and running  $\frac{3}{4}$ " - 1" up the shaft.

This gave a quite incredible look to the organ and made me most envious. How this cut had been achieved I find rather puzzling, and wonder whether any of our members have such a cut or knows how it was possible to remove so much skin safely.

This sighting reminds me of my schooldays in the late 40s and 50s, when it was the custom to cut boys at birth. I was one of the unlucky ones to have missed the chop (my father told me my foreskin would naturally retract, as his had, when I got older. Sadly, it was much too long and loose).

I used to be fascinated at shower time or in the changing rooms to observe all the different types of cut, from very radical to just the tip missing. I should have thought the latter would have never given its owner a moment's peace, it would have been so sensitive.

Being at the school for many years, I eventually got to know (and make a note of) who had been circumcised and who was uncut, and it was interesting to note that just over 50% were cut, and I at the time was in a minority. I got the impression that the cut majority preferred their state and certainly didn't envy me. I remember one boy being interested in my foreskin, and I asked him if he regretted its loss on his radical cut. He said he didn't, but preferred his as it was, "it is much more practical like this". So I never got any impression that circumcision was anything but a bonus to a boy. Since being cut at 24, I've also never regretted it: it's a bonus to a man as well.

The Future for Circumcision

Having just returned from holidays abroad, I've had an opportunity to make an informal comparison of the status of our favourite subject in Europe and here. A large, crowded naturist beach in Southern France provided, however, only a tiny number of examples: I saw just three circumcised dicks in two days. One belonged to a man in – I would say – his early fifties. The other two were on much older men, both of whom appeared to be in their early seventies. Nationalities at the beach were a mixture of (mainly) French, with British, German, Dutch and a few Spanish. I wasn't able to determine the nationalities of the three circumcised individuals I saw – but I was perturbed to see that they formed such a tiny minority, and were maturer rather than younger men. There was a very broad range of ages at the beach, with many families, and although the older adolescent boys and young men kept themselves covered, two younger boys – about 7 or 8 years old – who were bathing without swimming trunks were quite definitely uncircumcised. Funnily enough, one of them appeared to have a penis that – to an amateur eye – showed all the signs of latent phimosis: the foreskin was long and bunched well beyond the end of the penis, with the outline of the glans, very tightly enclosed, clearly visible inside.

An interesting comparison came on my return to England, when, in the midst of the August heatwave, I spent a couple of days sunbathing at a naturist beach on the south coast. Here, the contrast couldn't have been more different. I would say that between 30 and 40% of cocks were cut, and over a very wide age-range, from elderly gentlemen to young men who appeared to be in their late teens and early twenties. The other noticeable difference was in the variety of circumcisions on view. One or two examples of the classic all-American 'clipcock' with very little inner foreskin visible (though it has to be said that these were very much in the minority), through some quite loose 'acorn' examples (the vast majority), to (my own particular preference) cocks which had been quite tightly cut, but with the scar clearly visible an inch or so down the shaft from the glans. There were one or two really beautiful circumcisions of this sort.

Now these weren't in any sense representative – let alone scientific – samples, but it's further anecdotal evidence to bear out what the research suggests: that on the continent at least, circumcision seems to be dying the death.

What conclusions can we draw from this? It does begin to look as if, in the rest of Europe, routine circumcision is firmly on its way out. As we know, the incidence of the operation in Britain and the US is, likewise, very much on the decline. Quite apart from its use for religious reasons, there are always going to be those who wish to elect for the operation out of sexual and/or aesthetic considerations. As a gay man myself, I know there's a particularly strong interest in circumcision in the gay community.

But in the light of current medical opinion – which seems to be turning against circumcision as a medical treatment – I wonder whether we're going to be in the situation, in 30 or 40 years time, where the routinely circumcised cock will be a thing of the past. Instead of being a relatively common operation, undergone by a large number of men and boys (whether willingly or not), will circumcision have become marginalised into a specialist procedure, undertaken only by those with a particular interest in the subject – rather in the way that piercings and other body alterations are at present?

If this becomes the case, one implication occurs to me. At the moment, anyone sporting a circumcised dick may have been cut for a number of widely accepted reasons (as part of their religious faith or for medical reasons) as well as for the sake of appearance, or simply because it turns them on. But eliminate the purely medical category and circumcision becomes a different thing altogether: a personal statement about aspects of an individual's own sexual interest, just in the way that nipple and genital piercings are now.

The difference of course, is that the latter are easily disguised when the occasion demands it and discretion is needed. Circumcision isn't, of course, and I wonder whether, in a future where the operation for purely medical reasons has died out, boys and young men who would like to have themselves cut, may feel unable to do so because of the way it may be felt publicly to advertise what could be interpreted by others as 'abnormal' sexual interests and preferences. After all, in the shower with the rest of the team, if you remove, "I was cut at birth/as a boy because of a tight foreskin" as a possible explanation, there isn't much you can do with "I'm actually Jewish/Islamic/American" as a defence if all the other evidence is to the contrary! And the thought of having to explain a circumcised dick to an unsympathetic audience, in the way you might have to explain a visible genital piercing, could be enough to deter many men from having the operation.

Are we witnessing the end of the cut dick as an innocent, unremarkable, reasonably widespread form of the penis, to be seen on boys and men of all ages? Will circumcision change (religious reasons apart) into a minority operation: a specialist procedure practised only by those interested in body alterations and improvements – and, indeed, only by those who don't need to disguise a cut dick from unsympathetic eyes?

Anon – London

Tags

The mention by G.D. of skin tags in 4/95 reminded me of the penis of my best friend when we were around 9 or 10 years old. We often used to play with and examine each other's willy, and I noticed that when my friend's foreskin was fully retracted, two tags of skin appeared to connect the rim of his glans to the inner foreskin which was spread back over his shaft. Both tags were on the top part of the glans, but I don't think there was any hole underneath them (I'm sure I would have noticed if there had been). Instead, they extended down into the bottom of the sulcus. Apart from these tags, my friend's penis was quite normal, larger than average I thought, with a foreskin which fully covered the glans with just a slight overhang, and was easily retractible.

A possible explanation for the presence of these tags could be that they result from an adhesion between the inner foreskin and the rim of the glans. It could be that the separation which normally occurs between the glans and the foreskin during the development of the penis had failed to spread over the entire surface of the glans.

I would also like to repeat G.D.'s request for more survey information from our members. Questions I would like to include would be, for those not cut in infancy, at what age was their foreskin first pulled back? And if cut later than infancy, the reason for the operation?

J.A. – Yorks

[I am beginning to compile another survey, much deeper than previously. G.D. has given me a good basis, but I would like to hear from members what items they would like to see in the survey. So let's hear what you want to know. — D.A.]

Famous Status

Here are three more well-known names for the Cut/Uncut list, all seen in Turkish baths or saunas over the years.

The actor, Christopher Ellison, who used to play D.I. Burnside in Thames TV's The Bill, is uncircumcised with a long pendulous foreskin.

The well-known actor and gay activist, Sir Ian McKellan, is fully circumcised.

The comedian, Stanley Baxter, was uncircumcised, but with a withdrawn foreskin.

R.L.

Non Restoration

I am intrigued by the recent items and details of Jim Bigelow's uncircumcising method. As a contented roundhead, it's not that I wish to undergo such a procedure to reform my missing foreskin, but the fact that, from assessing my circumcision, I couldn't if I wanted to!

It's not that I belong to the 'drum tight' brigade either. My operator left a 3 or 4mm remnant of foreskin behind the sulcus. There is not enough to bunch up and form a collar shielding the corona. Rather, because I was cut before full penile development, the unrestricted glans expanded to give a very deep pronounced rim and step down behind it. The upper section of the frenulum was split just below the meatus and destroyed. It remains attached at the base of the glans groove, but exerts no forward pull as it once did before it was cut. As described earlier, there remains an encircling stump of skin which is the leading healed edge of the original foreskin. This will incurve or outcurve in the sulcus as I choose – something of a fashion accessory, what?

However, although this will pull down the shaft and disappear into it when forced, it simply will not push forward onto the glans at all. The rim is far too deep and wide, and the not very elastic skin just won't expand enough laterally to go forward over the glans one millimetre. I even tried to do this many times as a child and soon after the op, thinking I could obtain some glans cover to show my friends. But for me it proved impossible. From this seemingly permanent state, I wonder how then does one even start the restoration procedure? Perhaps my operator anticipated Bigelow and did a thorough job to prevent it! I read in 6/94 that D.S. of Staffs is similarly afflicted. I suppose with sheer persistence, pain and effort, one could eventually pull some shaft skin forward on top of itself onto the glans, but the true edge would still be in its circumcised resting place, and who wants that!

I much appreciated the letter 'Restoration' from Anon in 3/95. The personal details were really interesting; eg, adolescent experience with milkmaid, and also wife's route to Acorn and expressed disappointment with his denuded dick. (How about a contribution from you, Mrs Anon?) Though I didn't agree with all his sentiments, I could understand them. Anon here seems to have been a Bigelow success story, and he is honest enough to admit that the 'end result' falls short of his physical ambitions. I suspect the main triumph for him, and others likewise, is the feeling of mental satisfaction in having thwarted the aim of those who cut them without their permission. Now they are no longer condemned to endure a lifelong exposure of their glans at the whim of someone else. How they must long to go and flaunt it in front of their operators!

It seems that what divides us all is our ability to enter the minds of those who circumcise. Many of us carry their irreversible (yes! despite Bigelow, we can never be the same again) mark on the most precious part of our anatomy.

In the late 40s, quite outside my consent or control, a pair of scissors closed on my foreskin. In a second it was gone for good, their snip determining that for ever, my penis would look different, and my sexual sensations would be altered, and not as nature intended for me or my partners. I often reflect on this, and reckoned that they considered the improved appearance, easier hygiene and trade-offs in sexual stimulation (ie, less sensitive = longer satisfaction), were worth a small amount of risk and temporary discomfort. I think they were right and wish more of their kind around to prevail today. How far-reaching that moment was! You don't think so? Well, one consequence is that I'm writing this and you're reading it – forty years on!

Editorial

First, I would like to apologise to any member who has had letters returned to them. Due to a mix-up with me moving house and the Post Office not getting their act together, the P.O. box was discontinued for a short while, and letters were returned to senders, the number of which I know not. I was lucky enough to have a chat with the man whose job it is to return, and found out that he has so many to do that he hasn't time to read anything but the address, thank goodness. I don't think it will happen again after the letter I sent.

Letters for publication now seem to be getting fewer and fewer. Don't say that we've exhausted the subject! If you have any opinions of any sort, questions requiring others' opinions, or matters brought up on any other subject, please let me know and we'll do our best. Again, in the old questionnaires, everyone ticked an interest in masturbation techniques, so everyone would therefore be interested in reading others' styles. So come on, let your innermost secrets hang out anonymously, and send your items for Self Indulgence.

Letters for forwarding should be marked in pencil with the recipient's identifier. They should be stamped 1st class and be enclosed in an envelope addressed as above.

Brian has agreed to become the Society Librarian so that we can build up a stock of literature that can be photocopied and be available for any member who would like to purchase at production cost only. Plus a list of books relevant to our interests and where they can be obtained. So if you have any literature which would be of interest to us please lend it so that we can make a master copy and return to you. Also any information on published books. Many thanks in advance.

Sensitivity

It is curious that many believe or 'feel to believe' that there is some, or significant, loss of sensitivity following circumcision. Would this loss be instantaneous I wonder?

Masters' and Johnson's revolutionary study into sex and human sexuality considered this very same point, at a time when 95% of all hospital newborns were circumcised in the U.S. They concluded (admittedly from a small sample population of 231 circumcised and 16 uncircumcised) that the circumcised glans has no greater sensitivity than that protected by a foreskin. This is interesting because Masters and Johnson talked about increased sensitivity (rather than loss of...) following circumcision. Acorn members ask questions regarding poorer sensitivity following circumcision, which is an interesting turnaround, based possibly on trends and fancies! It had also been assumed that the circumcised male would also suffer from poorer ejaculatory control because of the continually exposed glans nerve endings during intercourse/masturbation. To test this premise, 35 circumcised males were matched, at random, with 35 uncircumcised, and, following sessions of intercourse and masturbation, concluded that, quote:- "from a physiological point of view, a retained foreskin probably contributes little, if anything..."

I am concerned that Sheila Hodges has invested a great deal in the erotic value of the foreskin. If a particular part of the body has been so imbued with sexual significance and is then taken away, it is obvious that, to a greater or lesser degree, sexual enjoyment has to be interfered with. Clearly, the Hodges' used the foreskin as a focal point for sexual arousal and orgasm. Physiologically (albeit psychologically), it is the glans as a whole, the 'tag' area and the corona in particular, that is the seat of the male orgasm. Very much subjective, it would be near impossible to quantify or evaluate greater or lesser sensitivity. Texture of the glans, its colour and appearance, vary considerably (as do the female genitalia) both when flaccid and erect and, of course, on health, state of mind and sexual arousal. I must, however, re-state and place great emphasis on not choosing circumcision as a 'fashion option'. Additionally, I cannot accept parents having their child circumcised (except for medical necessity). This is a decision that should be left to the man!

In The Encyclopedia of Sex Practice, it does state that circumcision deprives the penis of its protective covering with the result that the highly sensitive terminal nerves in the glans gradually lose some of their sensitivity. How much? Well, who can say. Unless there is a build up of scar tissue, for whatever reason, then it would seem these nerve endings should remain as such. How long have your fingertips been exposed to all sorts of abuse? Have you experienced any loss of sensitivity? Realistically speaking, the entire surface of the body receives much more exposure than the circumcised penis. It has to be said, however, that the foreskin is richly supplied with nerve endings, and is particularly sensitive where the skin 'joins' the shaft. Personally, I found my foreskin, and particularly its tip, almost without sensation. Herein lies the difficulty. To some, the foreskin and its loss will come as a pleasant surprise, and especially where it is wanted. Whereas, circumcision, often out of necessity or tradition, may turn out a bitter experience, and where the desire for a foreskin becomes as much a sexual focal point as someone looking to be circumcised.

I am, however, a little perturbed by this preoccupation with foreskins, bared glans' and circumcision. There are other parts of the male genitalia, and many aspects to consider. It is a pleasure to see more female opinion and experience in the Society's newsletter. It should be a pleasant departure from the usual circumcision 'debate' to hear more on the sexuality of both males and females. Anne and Sheila Hodges' letters were most illuminating. Let's see much more of this.

Happy Now

As a comparatively new member of the group, may I say how very much I enjoy the newsletters. It is particularly enjoyable to me to read the opinions of the female sex as to their feelings about foreskins in general, and some foreskins in particular. It would be excellent if that foreskin aficionado, Tuppy Owens, could be persuaded to write a piece on how her interest in foreskins began, and how it has progressed.

It has always amazed me that women writing in Forum, and other magazines, scarcely ever mention whether their partners are circumcised or not. Perhaps that is because the great majority of young men these days are mercifully spared this indignity. Having recently watched the frightening programme on TV about child circumcision, and seen the agonies of the parents and the children themselves, I am hoping that there will be many less circumcisions performed in the future.

As you may have guessed, I was circumcised in infancy. I have never discovered why, as my brother and all my cousins were left with their foreskins, of which I became envious at a very early age. This envy remained with me throughout my school years. Although about 50% of the boys were circumcised I still felt somehow deprived.

Nevertheless, I have been happily married for many a year, and my wife has never complained about my state. We began visiting naturist beaches about twenty years ago and, like some of your other correspondents, I was decidedly unhappy as to my uncovered state. As a 'naturist', I felt that I should be as nature intended, so, belatedly, I began stretching the remains of my foreskin. The process took several years, but now I am neatly covered (would J.J. of Derby tell us how he did it in a 'few months'?). Anyhow, I can now hold my head up on any naturist beach, and I defy any of your expert spotters to detect whether I was anything other than a true cavalier.

This improvement however, has not only been aesthetic. I now get a great deal more enjoyment from sex with the extra movement of skin. I only wish I had begun stretching as a schoolboy. By now I would perhaps have achieved that extra inch overhang which some of your contributors enjoy, though what they actually do with all that extra length I would very much like to know.

It was suggested in 1/95 that 'the foreskin is intended by nature to prevent too promiscuous mutual intercourse in youth, due to the pain of pressure on the contracting parties...' I would suggest that the opposite is true, and that the main purpose of the foreskin is to facilitate penetration for the young and inexperienced. Your comments would be welcome.

Smooth Talk — Shaving

“You look great, I wish I could have a lovely smooth body like you!” That was the opening remark from a guy whom I had never met before (also called John, I was to discover later) as I climbed into a jacuzzi in which he was wallowing at a Naturist Health Club I visited in Kent recently. It made all my time shaving worthwhile – and made me feel really good too! John became more and more interested in my smooth state and indicated that he would like to try to become smooth himself. I explained that he had to have some degree of dedication, and that I have belonged to The Smoothie Club from its inception some six years ago – and what about joining it after he'd shaved his pubes off? As readers of Acorn will probably know from my past correspondence and articles, I am completely committed to being a 'Smoothie' for life. I started well over ten years ago by shaving off all my pubic hair – like many folk, I had previously tried it from time to time just for a week or two, but now I intended that it should be 'permanent'. Then some five or six years ago I was introduced by way of an ad in H&E to The Smoothie Club, a club specifically for Naturists and others who depilate. I decided to join. During the course of corresponding with other TSC members I noticed that some of the male members shaved even more than I did! Spurred on by this, one day

I decided to go 'the whole hog' and shave all my unnecessary body hair off. Being very fair haired (originally light ginger) and not very hirsute anyway, I felt ideally suited to my new hairless state. Initially it felt a little strange, but I quickly became used to it and very much enjoyed the lovely smooth feeling of my fair skin and the complete openness (concealing absolutely nothing at all – especially as I am also fully circumcised with a particularly large knob) that I had when in the presence of other Naturists and nude friends. Together with letting you present a cleaner, open appearance, there are other practical advantages to being smooth too such as not leaving hairs all over the place, letting the sunshine get to the skin without any restriction and various others, especially at intimate times with a partner, which I'll leave to the reader's imagination! Actually shaving is nothing new: Men have shaved their facial hair for centuries according to the prevailing fashion and women in most western countries shave off most of their body hair, the exceptions being pubic hair and, in some countries, underarm hair. According to Katherine Viner of Guardian Newspapers:

"Both sexes are programmed by Nature to grow hair on their bodies, yet traditionally it is seen as a male attribute while hair on women's bodies is 'unfeminine'. Anything hinting at aggressive sexuality – such as the perceived 'animality' of body hair – is the prerogative of the male only. How strange, then, is the recent trend for hairlessness in men. Gone are the hirsute, rug-chested male models of the seventies: from the Chippendales to aftershave ads, today's male pin-up is a hair-free zone. A study recently presented to the British Psychological Society suggested that men are becoming very close to women in their obsession with 'perfect' bodies: V-shaped, muscular and hairless."

There are many ways of achieving a smart, smooth hairless state from creams, waxing, wet-shaving and electrolysis to the humble electric Lady Shave that I use. You just have to choose the most suitable for your skin and abundance of hair. Regarding shaving the scrotum which 'leaves A.R. baffled' (Acorn No 5, 1995, page 7), there are a number of options – you must choose the best one by trial and error. As mentioned I use an electric shaver that has a reciprocating (not circular) action daily pubically and twice a week on the rest of the body. Some of my Smoothie friends wet shave or use depilation cream. As long as your skin is not allergic to the cream (test it first on a small area!), it may be applied by hand or applicator to the scrotum with no detrimental effects, despite the rather alarming warnings on the instruction sheet. And don't worry, your balls won't be eaten away or drop off!! Once done, you will benefit as I do from having a new awareness of the smooth, totally exposed, sex organs hanging there for all to admire! What I do predict is that we shall be seeing over the next few years a steady increase in the number of men and women who, having tried shaving off their body hair, will decide to become, like me, permanent 'Smoothies'. So why don't you give it a try yourself and present to the world the new 'hairless you'? I think you'll find that you will prefer to be smooth ... and of course you, like Jacuzzi John, will then be able to join The Smoothie Club and correspond with, and possibly meet, other members. The Smoothie Club organisers may be contacted for more information at: T-S-C, PO Box 1409, Worthing, West Sussex, BN14 8PE.

It would be helpful to mention this Acorn article, its author and his code "H.11." when enquiring or applying for membership. The author would also like to hear from other Acorn members who are smooth and circumcised via the Acorn Box Number. Finally, if A.R. can think of a better name than the 'terrible title' Smoothie, I should like to hear from him. There seems to be no proper antonym for 'hirsute', that could be used, so I'm happy to be:

Smoothie John H.

I was born in November 1939 and circumcised very soon thereafter. I was never given a reason by my parents (in fact we never discussed sex at all – I found out about it by experimentation and through stories in the playground, like so many other children). My father was circumcised, so it may have been a family tradition, although we were not particularly religious, and not Jews. I have been very happy with my cut state, although the exposed glans has always been deliciously sensitive, and could be part of the cause of climax and ejaculation at a stage too early in many cases. At school I noticed that the uncircumcised penis was a relative rarity, whereas today, from observations in changing rooms, saunas etc, they are very much in a majority now. In America though, I understand that the vast majority of boys are circumcised in infancy. I have equivocal views about the wisdom of circumcising a boy before he is old enough to think for himself, but, on balance, I do not think I would have had a son of mine circumcised at birth (my wife and I have two lovely daughters).

I have had a deep interest in the penis, and my own in particular of course, since I first started remembering things as a small child. I well remember sessions in my parents' greenhouse with a girl when I was 4 years old, examining the differences between us between our legs, and fondling each other with enthusiasm. Several years later, it was 'doctors and nurses' with another girl, either in my bedroom or, more enjoyably, in a hayloft, and awareness of the tendency of my penis to become very stiff when being played with, either by me or my girlfriend. We had no idea of course of the reason for this phenomenon. I don't think we even thought that my penis would fit nicely into the hole between her legs, we were so naive in those days.

At the age of about 8, when at a single-sex prep. boarding school, I discovered that many of my friends had a similar interest to my own, and I discovered the sheer ecstasy of rubbing the loose skin around the shaft of the penis up and down until what I came to know as an orgasm occurred. There was no ejaculation at that age of course, but it was not long before some of my slightly older friends managed to eject a jet of creamy fluid from the tip of their penises on reaching orgasm. Encouraged by their success, I renewed my own masturbation sessions with vigour until I, too, joined the ranks of those who could achieve ejaculation. Needless to say, I was proud to show off my new maturity to my friends.

As is the case with so many boys' schools, there was a great deal of nudity, especially when bathing, and we all took a great deal of interest in the difference between the roundheads and the cavaliers. One boy reckoned he could tell whether another was circumcised or not by looking at his fingernails, and we had to pull out our little members to prove whether or not he was correct. I can't remember whether his diagnosis was better than the simple theory of probability! In the swimming baths, I was always very interested to see the occasional erection, and wonder why it had been brought about.

In my teens, I would masturbate many times a week, sometimes keeping the ejaculate in a test tube to see how many ejaculations it took to fill the tube; how long it took to achieve ejaculation from the flaccid state; how quickly I could achieve a second ejaculation after the first; if I could achieve ejaculation and keep the semen inside my body by using the right muscles; if I could achieve ejaculation while my penis was still flaccid (by the use of cream or other lubrication). All these 'tests' were faithfully recorded, together with detailed statistics of length and circumference, both when flaccid and erect.

You ask for details of appearance and statistics, so here goes:- when flaccid, my penis is 4.6" long (3.1" of shaft and 1.5" of glans), with a 4.5" circumference, rising(!) to 6.9" long when erect (5" shaft, 1.9" glans), and a 5.8" circumference. I find the ratios between circumference and length, and glans to shaft, very interesting. When flaccid, the circumference is 97.8% of the length, but reduces to only 84% when erect. In effect, the penis becomes relatively thinner as it expands. In the ratio of glans to shaft, the glans is nearly half the overall length of the penis when flaccid, but reduces to only 38% when erect. I would not be surprised if prolonged use of a vacuum tube over the past 25 years has not had an effect on these figures, although the overall length of my penis, both when flaccid and erect, has not altered significantly since I was a late teenager at school. After several sessions in the tube over a short period of time, my penis will eventually expand to the full 8" of the tube, but will not hold that length for more than 10 or 15 minutes after being taken out.

Both my wife and I shave our pubic hair for greater satisfaction when making love (there's no hair to get in the way!). My wife shaves hers completely (not just the 'bikini line'), and I shave all the hair off the shaft and scrotum, and a narrow margin around the base of the shaft. I also trim the hair on my lower stomach with my electric razor. In the early days of shaving I used a wet technique with foam when in the shower, but this was prone to causing small cuts. I then discovered that it could be done perfectly safely and cleanly with a safety razor when completely dry, without causing any damage whatsoever.

A shaving session invariably brings on an erection and a yearning for an orgasm, which has to be satisfied by one of many methods. If I have shaved before a shower, then it is a simple matter to maintain a strong erection with soap or shower gell, and induce a climax with a soapy massage. Alternatively, I take the shower head and direct the spray on my shaft and balls, paying particular attention to the frenulum. This produces a wonderfully tingling sensation, although only the most powerful shower jet will stimulate my penis to orgasm. It is a most wonderful prelude, however.

Like Dan H., I use Liquid Silk as lubrication, both for solo masturbation (it is delightfully non-oily) and mutual masturbation with my wife, and lubrication is also virtually essential when using the vacuum tube. The sensation when my glans is massaged through a thin film of lubrication is simply exquisite!

I have used mirrors a great deal when masturbating, both to watch myself when doing it, by whatever method, and also for taking close-up photographs of my penis while it is being manipulated.

Many years ago, I manufactured a masturbation machine out of my meccano kit. It comprised a padded ring which fitted round the shaft of my penis, and was pumped up and down by a reciprocating arm powered by an electric motor. It was extremely effective, and satisfied my desire to find a method of achieving an orgasm without touching my penis. Interestingly enough, I saw an almost identical machine in a blue movie, only this time it had a dildo on the end of the reciprocating arm which was pumping the star's vagina!

One of the most exhilarating methods I use, is a giant vibrator in the form of my Black and Decker orbital sander – without the sandpaper! The vibrating pad is placed against the penis and/or balls, either through clothing if circumstances don't permit nudity at the time, or, of course, when naked. It works so quickly that it is quite easy to achieve a very powerful orgasm when the penis is still quite flaccid. I can thoroughly recommend this method.

A favourite occasion for masturbating is while watching blue movies. I have quite a selection of my own, and like nothing better than to turn all the lights out, set the video going, pull my penis out of my trousers and settle down to a long period of stroking my very stiff member for up to an hour and a half, at the end of which I 'finish it off' with a few quick strokes near the tip. It has been aroused for so long that it takes very little to 'take it over the top' in a thrilling explosion.

One method which intrigues me, but which I haven't tried yet, is the gouged-out water melon. There's plenty of lubrication of course, and I look forward very much to having the right circumstances in which to try this out. Meanwhile, I will finish by mentioning pumping – another of my favourite preludes to masturbation. I say 'prelude' because it is not possible, of course, to stimulate the penis while it is in the tube, but it is in fine shape for a very powerful climax as soon as it is released in its expanded state.

Unlike B.H. of Leeds, I use a tube which I bought in a sex shop, and serves my purpose admirably. It is 8" long, so there is no danger of overstretching the penis, particularly if you work up to the full length in stages. Not only is the sensation in the penis quite exquisite, but it is also a very fascinating visual experience to see it gradually enlarging and filling the tube. I started using the tube some 25 years ago, starting with the smallest of its type then available, and working through the intermediate size up to the 8 inch I now use. As I said earlier, I do not think that the length of my penis has been affected by use of the tube, but its ability to expand in the tube and the circumference, when erect, have, I believe, improved.

Book Review

Circumcision — A Definitive Overview by Dr Michael Barrie G.P.

(57pp of illustrated text wired into card cover. All monochrome. Published by Beechgrove Press, London 1995, ISBN No 34686778. Available with cheque for £4, payable to EDTA Productions, from Dr Michael Barrie, 7 Wentworth Court, Waterside Close, Surbiton, Surrey KT6 7TT.)

My interest was aroused by reference to this book in a Radio 5 Live magazine programme, where the author presented his views to the lady doctor/presenter of the health issues section. Like cheating when picking up a 'whodunnit' by turning straight away to the last page, many may wish to save time and start at Dr Barrie's concluding sentence on page 52. After an extensive study of both sides of the argument, he writes; "I believe that circumcision is not justifiable unless medically indicated".

Depending on your prejudices, you'll either nod sagely as you read the rest, or counter his arguments with your own convictions. He emerges as a fair-minded man who does support the operation when certain medical indications are present. All other ritual, custom and preference arguments are deflected with frequent quotes from an extensive bibliography. No less than 81 instances are listed at the back.

For what is obviously an economy production for an anticipated small circulation publication, it is well illustrated. Some pictures are not for the squeamish. Holister Incorporated, manufacturers of the Plastibell, have kindly provided photographs and diagrams, and permission to show the required technique for it. Perhaps when they've discovered the overall anti-circumcision message they accompany, they may think it wasn't such good PR after all. I can't imagine them expanding their UK sales as a result, although I can see many parents choosing this method if they are among the few faced with the inevitable for their little boy.

The introduction covers all the history quickly and adequately, from its Middle Eastern emergence to the world-wide situation today, then quickly moves on to methods. One adult method, called 'classical circumcision' is given rather a brief coverage; 2pp text and illustration, against 9pp for neonatal Plastibell, the implied preference for the author, if needs must, for an infant. A page and a half goes on to discuss anaesthesia, which is well up-to-date if a little technical.

By now we're halfway through the book, and the arguments begin under a section titled 'Circumcision – the pros and cons'. In support of his opinion, Dr Barrie sets up the well-known aspects, one by one, under a series of sub-heads. 'Ritual' receives interpretation as family rather than religious tradition which, not unreasonably, he skates over contesting. He invalidates parents irrational whims, yet does fairly state: "Parents do have a right to choose, but today have to pay for the procedure privately unless there is convincing medical indication". Maybe, but some even-handed information would be useful for those who wish it. Elsewhere, he reports that "The cost of a private Plastibell operation is about £80 for a twenty minute out-patient procedure", and reiterates that: "Parents have every right to choose, but must be prepared to pay". He advises that "some parents will demand to have the operation performed, and refusal to do so merely results in transferring the onus elsewhere". Fine, but how many practitioners are prepared to help by performing, or referring when they've lost the argument?

Acorn Society members, because of their consuming interest, may have been reading all that comes their way on the subject for many years and, like me, have come across most of Dr Barrie's material already. However, we continue to read in the hope of finding a morsel or two that is new. This book doesn't disappoint. News to me, was a 1992 study among adolescents who were questioned about their circumcision status, in which the majority of 'circumcisees' scored higher in the satisfaction stakes (whatever they are). I also learned for the first time that it used to be a requirement of the US Navy that their personnel be circumcised.

The author provides a good resume of conditions indicating circumcision, complications arising from it, and diseases debated as related to it – not all in layman's language. It is bang up-to-date with encouraging reports of Bigelow's restoration method. Rather wastefully, the work accommodates the printing logistics of 4pp or 8pp multiples by leaving 7pp blank at the end. I would have liked to have seen these filled with case studies of parents and sons explaining their different experiences and reasons for being cut (or not?), and how some of them felt about it before, during and after. Overall, a well ordered work, carefully argued against an ancient tradition by a modern medical practitioner. As one who respects his efforts, but remains pro-circumcision, I just wish a practitioner of equal standing would write a counterbalancing tract to promote the procedure.

The Truth From Women

I believe that I have found the way to question women about circumcision. I started to get interested in circumcision when I was young because I had noticed that many women were fascinated by it. But as soon as I tried to speak seriously to them about it they seemed to panic. When they are clearly asked, they are always ill at ease and answer that it makes hardly any difference, that they don't mind etc. This I feel is because they don't want to hurt anybody's feelings.

Recently, I have read the book, Circumcision. An ethnomedical study by A. Thomas, and seem to have met women just like 'The Well-travelled Girl' on page 167, taken from Forum 1985.

So, ladies, when you say that the personality of a man is much more important than if he is circumcised or not, I believe that you are telling the truth. Many men get circumcised of their own free will. So let us imagine that you have a man that you love very much and who feels like getting circumcised. Just as you are very fussy about the colour of a pair of shoes or a dress, I cannot believe that the penis of your man is of so little importance to you that, if he wants to get himself circumcised and asks for your opinion on the type of circumcision, you will not have a preference. Do you prefer a short or medium sized circumcision? Do you prefer it close to the glans or down the shaft? Do you prefer the frenulum removed or not? Or anything else?

Regarding the frenulum, I have a bit of information. Two women asked me about the accidental tearing of the frenulum. They happened to be making love when it happened and said that it bled incredibly. But they thought that afterwards making love was much better. It was a kind of male defloration, and a real man has to be deflorated in the same way as a woman. Another woman hadn't had that experience, but she said that a woman feels the frenulum and it is unpleasant.

I can imagine that, just like 'The Well-travelled Girl', you do not want to hurt anyone's feelings. If you say that you prefer a circumcised penis you may hurt the man you love if he hasn't one and regret it all your life, and vice versa. If you say that you prefer uncircumcised you may lose your Prince Charles.

But if circumcision is going to be, then why not have the best? And how could we have the best if you do not give your opinions? You are the best placed for knowing what is the preference. And as David says, you can do it anonymously.

John Smith – London

Mystery

My girlfriend has never seen an uncircumcised cock and is rather intrigued. Besides mine, she has only seen about half a dozen anyway, all circumcised apparently, like me. Could you perhaps mention it in the magazine so that maybe some of your readers would be able to lend us photographs. She'd obviously be interested in all the varieties there may be (I'm not sure, but articles in the magazine seem to indicate that foreskins can vary in length), and how they can be pulled back, or how they are affected by the state of erection. I haven't myself seen a foreskin since I was quite a small boy, so I can't remember much about them. I must admit that her interest has got me interested too.

So could you perhaps put people in touch with me (not her, initially, as I think she'd be too embarrassed at first).

Why Wash?

Cleanliness is next to godliness is fine up to a point, and it's better to be clean than dirty. Unfortunately, a lot of people seem to feel so guilty about the subject that they go over the top and claim to wash under their foreskins twice a day, to quote but one reference. If the truth were known, they probably only wash when necessary, which is hardly ever!

I've reached this conclusion after two particular experiences which should be of interest to those members who hang onto their foreskins, whilst being of passing interest to roundheads. I've always been extremely sensitive beneath my foreskin, both tip and foreskin lining. To give you some idea how sensitive, I find it very difficult to bear oral sex, whilst at the same time finding normal sex wildly enjoyable and satisfying, provided my foreskin stays forward until the last inch or so of thrust. This is easily achieved, since my foreskin is both very long and very tight, although I have no difficulty pulling it right back if I need to. The fact is that I don't need to, and therefore my knob stays covered almost permanently, which suits me fine.

As a kid, my mother was rather paranoid about cleanliness, and right up to the age of ten used to pull my foreskin back in the bath for hygiene purposes. I used to find this treatment excruciating and yelped with pain every time the rough flannel came in touch with my sensitive glans. At the same time I used to get stimulated by having the tight ring forced back over the knob, and this used to give me an erection, causing her feelings of guilt, so she eventually left it for me to do, asking me after my bath if I'd "washed my willy with the skin back?" I said I had but I lied – the closest I got was to pull my skin back and forward under the water until I got a hard-on.

A few years later when I started courting, I was self-conscious about my organ, and like most lads, took pains not to give offence. I used to soap my hand and then rub my skin gently backwards and forwards, letting the soap reach under the skin with minimum friction. The only trouble was that, afterwards, my foreskin and penis head dried out, and I found the constant chafing of the two dried surfaces against each other, without the usual lubrication, very uncomfortable. Adding a bit of spit helped, but I never got really comfortable until the natural lubricant was restored. What I did find though, was that the moisture left on my penis head after normal sex with my girlfriend did the trick marvellously and, like my own lubricant, was almost odourless.

I consequently gave up routinely cleansing under my foreskin completely, with no ill effects and no adverse comments from my girlfriend. It is my experience that the only bad smells experienced with a foreskin are caused by dried urine or semen around and under the tip of the foreskin. This is easily eliminated by rubbing it with spit after peeing, or rinsing it with a drop of water if available.

So much for the extravagant demands for constant preputial scrubbing which so many readers seem to accept as gospel. But this is not the end of the story by any means, because it would appear that what is good for the gander is good for the goose as well! When I first started going with my girlfriend, she was sexually inexperienced, and got a severe and persistent dose of cystitis. If any of our lady readers have had cystitis they will know how unpleasant and uncomfortable it can be. The doctor gave her creams, which helped for a week or two, but it always seemed to come back.

Eventually she confided her troubles to an older woman at work who was able to sort the problem out for her, to her very great relief. The woman said, in strict confidence of course, that in her youth she had been rather wild, and after getting kicked out of her home, she went on the game for a year or two before finally pulling herself together and becoming a respectable married woman. She said that cystitis was a common complaint for girls just starting in the profession, and the advice she gave, based on her experience, was that my girlfriend should first throw her knickers away, stop using bleached or coloured toilet paper (ie. any toilet paper) after peeing, strictly avoid contact with soap or bath foam, and to rub the area with natural live yoghurt several times a day. To her amazement she asked my girlfriend if I was circumcised, expressing approval that I wasn't: the extra friction of a shaft without the mobile cushioning action of the foreskin and its extra lubrication tended to irritate sore membranes. She then asked if I washed often, suggesting that soap retained under the foreskin, even in minute quantities, could cause trouble.

My girlfriend was naturally a bit worried about going around knickerless – although nowadays, if you believe the papers, it is the fashionable thing to do, whatever the social background. It is also beneficial to female hygiene because, as her friend pointed out, air circulating around the moist folds of the vulva keeps everything sweet and clean, thus avoiding the need for the constant washing which most girls wearing knickers find necessary to stop their outer folds smelling of stale urine. Removing all the pubic hair on the underside of the vulva, which can get a bit swampy with urine, also helps. The woman told my girlfriend that most street girls give up wearing knickers (in summer at least), finding it more hygienic, more arousing for the punters, and more convenient in every respect, particularly having a crafty pee. One of the things which upset householders in red light districts is the sight of two or three girls standing in a doorway with their skirts up, peeing on the pavement (why is it girls like to pee in company?). From the girls' point of view, standing on a corner for hours, with no public toilet around, creates a real problem, and the nature of their profession desensitises them to what other people find unacceptable.

My girlfriend, who is addicted to soap and water, balked at the idea of not washing her private parts, and asked how she should 'blot' her inner and outer lips if she could not use toilet paper after peeing? Her colleague told her that, if it was a problem, the best way to remove surplus drops was to waggle her hips when she'd finished. Washing, where necessary, was best achieved by sitting in a bath of hot water – provided no soap was used.

The lady's advice was taken and worked a treat. My girlfriend has had no recurrence of cystitis, and now says she thoroughly enjoys the slightly risque feeling of not wearing knickers, as well as the sense of freedom and comfort of having air circulating around the fanny. For the information of more mature lady readers, the woman said that the same procedure solves the distressing problem of pruritis vulvae (twat-itch), which affects so many older women, particularly widows. To complete the treatment though, she smilingly suggested that they should get themselves a well-endowed toy boy, preferably uncircumcised.

Circumcision and HIV

(From the Internet Newsgroups)

The following is an unedited excerpt from an article which appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press on Sunday, July 23, 1995

Title: AIDS Clues Turn Tide — Scientists Discover Circumcision Key Reporter: Catherine Mitchell

Widespread male circumcision would go a long way to protecting the world from AIDS, two Manitoba experts say.

“Male circumcision, if it could be universally implemented would be a very effective prevention” says Dr. Frank Plummer, an international pioneer in AIDS research.

Plummer and his colleague, University of Manitoba microbiologist head Dr. Allan Ronald, know that what they say may be unpopular. For some time now the tide has turned against circumcising infant boys as more parents believe it to be unnecessary and painful.

The two researchers base their conclusions on the work they have done in Africa, where a collaborative research program with Kenyals University of Nairobi has begun to unlock the AIDS mystery.

Research teams led by Plummer and Belgian Dr. Peter Piot (who discovered the deadly Ebola virus in 1976 and now leads the United Nations’ AIDS program) dug out many pieces to the puzzle of how the immunodeficiency virus is transmitted, how it locks into the male and female genitalia and how it grows.

For men, research indicates that an intact foreskin plays a big role in contracting AIDS.

“It is now recognized as an important risk factor in HIV infections among men” Plummer says.

The whys of this are unclear. It used to be thought that HIV would enter through the urethra, but now that isn’t so Ronald says. It is believed to enter through the mucus membrane or skin of the penis.

Ronald theorizes that the uncircumcised penis, with its warm moist conditions, incubates the virus, protecting it until it can find a way in. Universal circumcision, he stresses, would give wider health benefits to boys, noting that those not circumcised get about fifteen times as many bladder and kidney infections.

Ronald notes the American Pediatric Association has begun to cautiously endorse circumcision again, after actively discouraging it.

“I think from the health perspective, we need to encourage parents to consider male circumcision.”

The article continues to discuss transmission to women and unborn children and other aspects of the infection.

Battling with broken bones in my foot and a stiff bout of the current flu epidemic, I've been determined to keep my promise of eight issues this year, so this is why this one is hard on the heels of the last, and should reach everyone long before Xmas.

Looking back over the year, we have to congratulate ourselves on the achievements – two great meetings, resulting in about a quarter of the membership now knowing and being friends with each other (and always looking for more to join them – there's always a warm welcome for everyone), and increased membership again. It always delights me to get letters beginning, "I've been lent a copy of your magazine and enjoyed it so much I want to join and read a lot more." Or, "I thought I was alone with what I thought was a peculiar interest, until I heard of you and found I wasn't."

I feel very guilty sometimes over not being able to answer all the letters with questions in them, I just haven't got the time. Priority has to be given to all those who are enquiring about joining, even though the success rate is only

My earliest recollection of that pleasurable activity is at about the age of 8. I was at a boarding 'prep' school, and we slept in dormitories of about a dozen. We had the usual curiosity about our own and each other's equipment. Nonetheless, I, at any rate, didn't want a rhythmic rustling of the bedclothes to betray what I was up to. Self-consciousness? Not wanting any distraction as I concentrated on the pleasure? Who knows! Anyway, as no doubt lots of other small (and large) boys must have done in similar situations, I used to lie on my back with my knees raised and the bedclothes stretched over them to allow space for movement underneath.

It must have been because of being in this position that the technique I used to use was to push my little boy's prick between my thighs, then release the pressure so that it would spring back, rubbing against the inside of my thighs on both strokes. This must have been how I discovered the joys of wanking, because I remember some time later having a conversation with a friend of similar age and describing to him how to do this to get a nice feeling. He said he knew, and described his more normal method of holding his cock and rubbing it up and down. I think I used to do something like this when I came, to prolong the orgasm, so I knew what he was talking about, although it hadn't occurred to me to start that way. I think I experimented with his suggestion, naturally, but didn't find it as satisfactory to start with. In the end I must have adopted it because I haven't been using my thighs for as long as I remember, and whenever I have a go out of interest nowadays it isn't very satisfactory.

By the way, I was circumcised as an infant, very cleanly, with only a broad but faint scar on my shaft to show what had been, except for a slight wrinkle at one point, about one-eighth of an inch circumferentially where there is about a millimetre or two of additional skin. Would the above technique have worked for a cavalier? We were about equal in numbers at the school – there were plenty I could have asked. Somehow, our primness-brainwashing prevented us, my circle at least, from being very open about sex at that age. Later on we overcame the inhibitions to some extent, and there was some groping and mutual wanking – very enjoyable. But I must have forgotten about my early technique by then – I don't remember demonstrating or talking about it.

I spent many years in boys' dormitories and used to see bedclothes raised over knees frequently. I thought it looked too obvious and generally in later years used a one-handed technique lying on my side, with the other hand holding the bedclothes slightly away to allow free movement underneath. When we were older there was a lot of jocularly about wanking, and some boys (exhibitionists?) didn't mind being heard. But I think modesty prevailed with most, while they were actually doing it. People who did it together would also do it in private and keep quiet about it, otherwise they were teased unbearably.

Of course, after puberty we adolescents were spouting sperm all the time, whether we wanked or not. Clean pyjamas and sheets would be stained the first night and stiff by the time they were changed. Presumably, the ladies who handled them took it as a matter of course. I never remember my mother mentioning it, though I was certainly conscious of the evidence. However, I don't think I had many wet dreams as I was often wanking several times a day. The toilet was convenient, where the technique was, when coming, to lean forward and push my cock down between my legs, perhaps a bit painfully, so that I would squirt straight into the pan. It saved trouble with paper and wiping, and the risk of getting it on my clothes. It was also possible, when randy, to do it in class with a hand moving very subtly in my pocket, though I then had soggy underpants to put up with. It was of course necessary to be sitting at the back of the classroom, to the side. Whenever I was in the bath, with a bit of privacy (unusual at school), I would of course automatically extend soaping my cock to include an orgasm.

I was surprised by my mother once when I was about 10. It was summer, and I had been sleeping in the garden. I think she had come out to check that I'd gone to sleep, but I'd got up to have a piss against the hedge, and holding my cock had somehow turned into a wank. Suddenly I heard her say, "Are you alright?", about 10 yards away, looking at me and smiling. Oh, the embarrassment! I forget what I said, crimson-faced, but I remember dreading breakfast the next morning – I was sure she'd have told my father and he'd know what I'd been doing, even if she didn't, and... I didn't know what he'd do. I could hardly believe it when nothing was said by anyone.

There was another occasion when my younger brother, sleeping in my room at the time, said at the meal table, "I woke up last night and you were shaking in the bed". I nearly died – I think there was a momentary silence then a cover-up conspiracy – all spoke at once.

The other embarrassing thing was the way it would suddenly go hard, in the most awkward places. Like if you were wearing thin games shorts, and certainly whenever you got out of bed. I always had a towel ready to hold in front of me. And how, during puberty, it would feel as though it was bursting, when it seemed to treble in size in about a year. It was quite painful at times, it used to be so hard. Those were the days! I tell my girlfriend about it to get her excited.

On the subject of lubrication, I tend to stick to saliva as being suitably slippery, always to hand (!) and not leaving a mess like oil. For me, dry wanking and wet wanking are almost two separate activities. Nowadays I can hardly come while using the first, but it gives a great sensation, while with the second it gets difficult to hold out, but it is essential when actually coming in order to maximise the sensation. So it depends whether I am feeling urgent to come or not. If I'm doing it by myself I will probably do it wet anyway, as I fancy an orgasm. However, my girlfriend gives me wonderful wanks by stroking it dry, using various strokes, sometimes hard, sometimes soft, in various places up and down the shaft and around the knob. She's got amazing technique. She gets me in a state of paroxysm, desperate to come, but holds me on the edge for what seems like ages. Then when she feels the moment of no return finally approaching, she quickly sucks it or wets her hand, and the most wonderful orgasm goes on and on and on.

She says she's never had an uncircumcised cock and doesn't fancy one. I have always said that I thought having something extra to play with would make sex more fun. But, thinking about the pleasure I get from being wanked (better than fucking I have to say, in terms of sheer sensation, though fucking does have its own pleasure. Also since fucking by definition is wet, assuming the woman is aroused, I have trouble controlling coming), I wonder if a cavalier would be able to have the same exquisite dry-wanking sensation.

One item of vital importance to a good wank, in my opinion, is that it needs two hands – one to impart the main stimulation round the top of the shaft and knob, and the other, equally important to getting full satisfaction, giving background stimulation round the base of the shaft and balls. The latter is particularly important as orgasm approaches and during it. The joke about 'one-handed readers' of porno magazines is unfortunately true – if I am wanking myself I enjoy visual stimulation, but magazines are a problem – turning the pages, or even keeping them open, interferes with the main object of the exercise. Videos are better, but then perhaps you want to control them, rewind, or pause over a good scene.

Of course, the best wanks are those done by someone else. But unless they understand the importance of using two hands they tend to be disappointing. Some women are just downright lazy! And you'd think they would understand because they have even more bits that they like being stimulated. I've heard it said that a woman has more nerve endings in her clitoris than a man has in all his genital area, and that therefore they must be having more intense orgasms. What a thought!

Revelations From Egypt

I was 16 when my mother took up a senior medical appointment in Cairo. During the summer I was left in the care of Tagrid, our Egyptian maid, whilst my mother went to work in the hospital. Tagrid was only a year or two older than me but, whereas I was still very much an adolescent, she had the physique of a mature woman, small with heavy breasts and flashing black eyes.

Summer holidays were bad news in Egypt – too hot to go out, and nowhere to go anyway. I used to moon about whilst Tagrid got on with her job. One day she decided that I needed livening up and started teasing and tickling me, with the result that I ended up with a massive hard-on. I was desperately embarrassed, but my frantic efforts to hide it only drew her attention to it. She gave a dirty laugh and, smiling saucily at me, asked if I'd like to see her 'Kuss'. Without waiting for a reply, she turned her back on me and, watching me over her shoulder, slowly raised the hem of her long frock up her thighs to her waist, leaving her whole lower body exposed. It was then that I discovered that Egyptian girls don't necessarily wear knickers, because Tagrid's shapely bottom was totally exposed. When she saw she had my shocked attention, she turned to face me and separated her knees – and a second exciting discovery dawned on me – 'kuss' did not mean bottom after all. Furthermore, Egyptian girls do not believe in pubic hair, and I was absolutely riveted to see a plump bulge of smooth bare flesh between her legs, neatly separated by the long split of her vulva. I could hardly believe my eyes, let alone my good fortune, and never having seen such a thing before, gawped disbelieving at Tagrid's bald little kuss. Whereupon, she had a belated attack of modesty and covered herself up again, laughing like a drain.

She then demanded that I show her my 'zibb' and, putting her arms around my hips, pulled my shorts down, revealing my youthful erection. She was intensely curious about my voluminous foreskin, which totally shrouded my erection, and asked where my knob was, breaking into delighted laughter when I drew my foreskin back to show it to her. Apparently, all Egyptian males, including the Coptic Christians, are circumcised, and Egyptian girls never get to see an adult foreskin. Tagrid, who was Coptic, explained that the Muslims not only insisted on male circumcision, but most Muslim girls, other than those from educated families, were circumcised too, whilst the Copts in general tended to leave their girls intact. I had not the faintest idea what she meant by female circumcision and she used this as an excuse for a bit more exhibitionism, baring her kuss for me again and separating the lips to show me the fat little clitoris which Muslim girls had cut away in a procedure she called 'tabzir'.

This childish game of "I'll show you mine if you show me yours" continued for some time, but then things got more serious. Poor little Tagrid was married to a man thirty years her senior. He treated her badly, she said, because she had not yet given him an heir.

Our mutual revelations soon developed into mutual explorations. She took an obsessive delight in playing with my foreskin, saying how much she preferred it to her husband's huge 'cut' zibb which, she claimed, hurt her. As a joke she threatened to circumcise me with her teeth, nipping the bud of my foreskin hard, and stretching it out whilst I shivered with fear and delight. She said she loved me, and asked if I would come back and marry her when I grew up.

We soon progressed to the next stage. She showed me how to caress her pretty little kuss with my fingertips, while she rubbed my foreskin to and fro over my penis head until, to her delight, I swooned in my first productive orgasm.

Inevitably we reached the final milestone. One day she got it out for me, pulled it erect and laid me on the floor with a cushion under my backside. She then raised her skirt to bare her kuss, and crouched over me, giving me a worm's-eye view as my rigid little plonk was slowly engulfed in her sexual slot, imparting jolts of undreamed of pleasure when she moved her body up and down on it. As we both shuddered towards a climax, she reached down with both hands, pulling the skin of my shaft down hard towards my balls. This had the effect of drawing my foreskin back from my knob, exposing it and the sensitive inner lining of my foreskin to the mind-blowing friction of wet, velvety kuss, and I lost consciousness in the explosion of feeling which followed.

To my deep sorrow – and hers too – she left us shortly afterwards when she moved to Ma'adi on the other side of Cairo, and I never saw her again. The message behind this story is that, to me, the foreskin is central to sexual enjoyment, and Tagrid certainly didn't look on it as a drawback – except in the physical sense of course!

Letter From Norway

The article about circumcision of boys, which follows, was in the Oslo paper Aftenposten on 30 October 1995. It is not a 'lively paper' – 'dry' would be a better description, and it rarely covers a topic such as circumcision. I waited to see whether there would be any comments in response to the article, but didn't find any. In Norway it is virtually taboo to talk about circumcision. If one raises the subject, one is looked upon as odd. Norwegians are very uptight about it, with only a very few exceptions.

I hope we'll get many more issues of Acorn, which is always interesting and enjoyable to read. Whenever it comes in the post nothing else gets done until I have read it. Best wishes to Tony, David and everyone in Acorn for Christmas and a really good 1996.

Doctors Invited to Circumcise Boys

By Per Anders Johansen

The Norwegian State Health Authority has asked the Norwegian hospitals to carry out ritual circumcision of boys if their parents wish. A new circular from the State Health Authority proposes that every Norwegian hospital can be asked to arrange circumcision of newborn boys. At several hospitals doctors have refused to circumcise, often because they say it takes too much time, money and resources. For both Jews and Muslims ritual circumcision has very great religious importance.

‘Norwegian hospitals should arrange that circumcision of new-born boys can be done’, says the circular on Ritual Circumcision of Boys. The Health Authority fears that ritual circumcision would otherwise be done by travelling circumcisers without medical training. Some new-born Muslim boys are circumcised by barbers without anaesthetic because hospitals will not do the operation.

Ritual Performance

‘The Norwegian health service should show understanding for rituals of this type, so long as it does not involve sexual mutilation. The health service should make it possible for such an operation to be done by a doctor. This avoids operations being done by non-medical personnel’, says the circular.

‘We cannot close our eyes to it, which would only push people into the hands of quacks’, says Jorgen Holboe, the head of section of the Health Authority.

Behind the new rules from the Health Authority lies the initiative of the county medical officer in Buskerud. At present, Muslims in Hordaland have to travel to Oslo for a hospital circumcision. The circular is now with Minister of Health, Werner Christie, who will evaluate it before it is sent out to the country’s hospitals.

The State Health Authority proposes that circumcision of boys is done before the new-born is discharged from the maternity ward. In addition, the Authority wants the practice restricted, partly because circumcision requires anaesthesia if the operation is done long after birth, which increases the risks and cost of the operation. Although Norwegian hospitals are now being invited to make available resources for ritual circumcision, the new circular ensures that no-one can demand to have it done.

‘Ritual circumcision of boys is an operation on healthy children. In principle, no-one has a legal right to have such an operation done by the public health service, since it does not involve a treatment for illness’, according to the Health Authority. At the same time, the Health Authority is allowing for parents to have to pay their share if they want their child to be circumcised.

Religious Ritual

In the Muslim tradition the whole foreskin of the boy’s penis is removed so that the boy is not thought of as ‘unclean’. In Jewish belief, circumcision is a ritual which has been done for 4,000 years, ever since Abraham circumcised himself at the age of 99, at God’s command. To the Jews, circumcision symbolises the covenant between God and man, and must be done within eight days after birth. In the USA and Australia, most new-born boys are automatically circumcised after birth. The reason there is that it is thought to be more hygienic and give less danger of infection.

Ban on Female Circumcision

(from Norway Now, N° 22, Nov. 1995, p7)

The Standing Committee on Social Affairs in Norway’s national assembly, the Storting, has voted unanimously to introduce special legislation forbidding female circumcision in Norway. This practice will be punished along the same lines as grievous bodily harm, which carries a prison sentence of up to 8 years.

“This is a stiff penalty, and a clear signal that female circumcision will be regarded as a serious crime”, says Havard Wennevold Osflaten in the Standing Committee. The ban will also affect parents or guardians who take girls abroad to have them circumcised there. The new law will apply to all persons resident in Norway, not only those who have Norwegian citizenship. Through this new legislation, Norway comes into line with Great Britain and Sweden.

[Female circumcision is customarily practised in Somalia, Egypt, Muslim Sudan and in other parts of Saharan Africa. Norway has 3,485 female residents of all ages with citizenship of any African country.]

Storm in a Teacup?

There is frequently in Acorn a call for women to give their views on circumcision, so although I find writing about it slightly embarrassing (I should hate my Mum or Dad to read this), I thought I might put pen to paper. Incidentally, I get lent Acorn by a friend, and we both agree that it's far more interesting – and instructive – for a woman than the trivial stuff churned out in most of the women's magazines. In my view, Acorn should be on view in every doctor's waiting room so that women could read it, especially those with young children, so they know how to answer awkward questions about the subject, since most are ignorant about it.

I come from an army family and was brought up in a number of army stations, mostly in Germany. When my brother was born in the local BMH (British Military Hospital) I remember my mum telling my dad, with some amusement, how the adjutant's wife had also produced a son on the same day and had demanded that the boy be circumcised immediately. She was known to be a bossy woman who tried to wear her husband's rank, but in this case she met her match. The matron, who was an even more bossy woman, told her very firmly that circumcisions were not carried out in BMH's except for medical reasons. Whereupon the woman threw a terrible tantrum, but without success, as to my certain knowledge, the boy remained intact!

I asked my mum afterwards what circumcision meant, and she explained that it meant cutting the piece of loose skin off the end of a boy's willy, demonstrating what she meant on my new brother's tiny sprig of flesh. This raised a lot of questions in my mind because I had no idea that the foreskin housed something underneath it, and thought that the operation would merely make the boy's willy shorter. However, I discovered the real facts not long after. Both my parents were very relaxed about nudity in the home and I often saw them undressed. As a small girl I was deathly proud of my dad's monster willy, in such contrast to the tiny little winkles of the boys in my class. One evening, while we were on holiday in the camper van, I woke up to hear my mum laughing and, peeping out from the bunk over the cab, I watched with curiosity as she undid my dad's zip, fished his huge willy out and pulled his thick, heavily veined foreskin right back to reveal the dark-coloured bulb underneath, which she then tickled with the tip of her finger before pulling the skin back over it again, giggling like a schoolgirl as she did so. I found this discovery very exciting, but then, as I watched, I was even more surprised to see his penis double in size and thickness as it rose in a majestic erection. At this point the light went out, leaving me wiser about the male anatomy, but raising more questions than it answered.

A year or two later, the camper was the scene of another exciting tour of discovery when we took the son of mum's friend with us on holiday, and I had to share the cubby hole above the cab with him. We were both zipped into individual sleeping bags, but zips were meant to be opened and I couldn't wait to put my new-found knowledge to the test. He responded with enthusiasm to my invitation to feel me between the legs whilst I explored the wrinkle of loose skin on the tip of his willy before it reared up in a miniature imitation of my dad's erection. Holding a big hard willy is much more exciting than holding a small soft one and I tried capping and uncapping his knob as I imitated my mum's actions and found out why she seemed to enjoy it so much. But if I'm honest, on balance I think I would have preferred a tube of smarties!

Later on in mid-teens, as sexuality took on a new importance for me, I was to extend my basic knowledge a lot farther, as I shall describe. I used to have my friends round to play tapes on the hi-fi when my parents went off to a social meeting in the mess. The atmosphere soon got you in the mood, and we quickly paired off and discovered the joys of what we used to call 'heavy petting'. Fear of pregnancy prevented us going any further in those days. I noticed my best friend sitting on a boy's lap on the sofa as he slid his hand up her dress whilst she rubbed her hand against the bulge in his jeans. Soon we were all at it and, although furtive at first, we soon shed our inhibitions and became more open in our sexual activity. I and my boyfriend watched while a girl put her boyfriend's hand down the front of her knickers so he could touch her vulva whilst pulling his penis out and openly masturbating him, ignoring the curious stares of the rest of us, before we too got fired up by the spectacle and followed suit. I quickly learned that pulling a boy's willy would eventually end up with spurts of white gunk all over the carpet – and experienced for the first time the swoony delight of the female orgasm as my boyfriend's fingering took me over the top.

Up to now, circumcision had not been an issue, since none of my boyfriends had been done. We all knew something about it from R.I. of course, and I remember the snigger when one of the teachers, reading from the Bible, faltered slightly at having to mention 'the uncircumcised Philistines'. But we all laughed like a drain when one of the girls called out from the back of the class, "Please Miss, Steve's a Philistine", and several of the boys shouted, "So am I". I used to pull my boyfriend's leg by asking him, "How's your little Philistine today?" whereupon he'd indignantly reply, "Not so much of the little, if you don't mind".

Anyway, one day a girl brought along a new boy to our 'hi-fi' session and he joined in the petting with enthusiasm. Suddenly the girl said in a loud whisper, "What's happened to your skin?" whereupon the boy said that he'd been circumcised. We were all dead curious of course and crowded round to look at his unfamiliar looking organ with its big bare knob totally uncovered. The boy seemed unconcerned and slightly flattered by all this attention. He was happy to explain that he had been born on an American air base where boys were automatically circumcised within hours of birth. Although basically laid-back about the whole thing, he did admit when I asked him about it that he often wondered what it was like to have a foreskin, and asked me anxiously if I found his penis funny in any way. I told him, no, but both he and I knew that it was less satisfying to handle, since what was left of his skin was tightly stretched, and permitted very little movement compared with the other boys. I was never aware of any difference in cleanliness, although it was not a matter I concerned myself about, and certainly none of the penises I've handled since have been noticeably unpleasant in any way, circumcised or uncircumcised.

In later life I had a couple of circumcised partners, although the vast majority were not, and I formed my own opinions on the subject. Frankly, as far as making love is concerned, it is a big yawn to most women, since it makes absolutely no difference, at least as far as her pleasure is concerned. I am not so sure about the man though, and have a suspicion that his enjoyment may be lessened, but not a lot. But the benefits claimed for circumcision are to my mind an illusion, and exist mainly in the imagination of people like those very pro-roundhead readers of yours with a personal axe to grind. Consequently, I really don't think there is anything to be gained by it, and even if only one boy grows up with problems caused by circumcision, that is one too many. I have to say that for this reason I felt slightly uneasy about your series, 'The Clinic'. The punchline was often a baby being circumcised, which is frankly a bit tacky, and it worries me rather that there are people who take pleasure in the thought of a little baby undergoing such a painful ordeal for no good reason.

How Beautiful They Stand

Never mind 'The stately homes of England, amidst their tall ancestral trees', let's just concentrate on human dicks for a while. They're definitely good enough for me. They, too, 'stand beautiful' from time to time. Not always, mind you, because some dicks are definitely prettier than others. Mine, for example, is a very ordinary circumcised cock which certainly will never be in the running for any 'Bollocks Beautiful' award. It's getting to look a bit gnarled and old now, at the age of 62, possibly from frequent use. It still works a treat, and I love it to shreds for every thrill it gives me, but I've got to acknowledge that when the chips (and the trousers) are down, it has certainly had its day.

I met a guy in Scotland recently, on Guy Fawkes night to be exact. I can assure you it was in private and he was well of age to give consent. From the close proximity of 69s I was struck by the very beauty of what stood before me. It would embarrass the young man concerned if I were to go into too much detail but, after 53 years of actively assessing thousands upon thousands of dicks, both professionally and sexually, I have to say that, to my eye, he had one of the 'prettiest packages' (whether soft or hard) that I have ever encountered. I'm not commenting on its performance – just its appearance. Everything about it – neither too large to be intimidating, nor too small to be a giggle; perfection of circumcision; ratio between length and thickness; 'balance' between balls and cock; thrusting well forward in front of the pubic bone, rather than dangling weakly between the legs; delicacy of skin texture, etc. etc., – was all in total harmony. I could just sit and look at it for hours – like looking at the Taj Mahal by moonlight, or the Grand Canyon, or the River Nile at sunset. The whole ensemble was an object of singular beauty.

Do other readers also have this sense of appreciation of aesthetic magnificence, in a completely detached sort of way, with regard to some sets of male genitalia? It is like recognising beauty in a pretty face, and isn't necessarily associated with any particular sexual desire. Answers, NOT on a postcard please, to our worthy editor for future comment and appraisal.

The Spoken Foreskin

If you tune in to Channel 4 these days, sooner or later you're going to hear someone, invariably a woman, mention the word 'foreskin', (...Bill? Yes, if he had as much intelligence as he's got foreskin, he'd be a genius...) as though it's the most natural thing. A few years ago, you would never hear a well brought-up young lady mention the word – she was much more likely to say 'fuck' – or even 'cunt', and besides being taboo in a way that sexual swear words were not, foreskins were unknown territory to a lot of them.

Things seem to have changed with the consignment of routine circumcision to history and the consequential near-universality of foreskin among the younger generation. The taboo seems to have disappeared and the word 'foreskin' is becoming ever more common currency, even in polite circles, although I must say, hearing it from a sweet, demure young girl still gives me a jolt. The first time I heard a young lady say it on TV, she accompanied it with an embarrassed giggle as though aware of how daring it was. But nowadays it seems to be on everyone's lips and has become commonplace in everyday conversation. For some reason though, men still seem to be a bit coy about it.

One part of society which seems highly foreskin-orientated is the pop scene. I was astounded to hear (Channel 4 again) the young lady host introduce a group known as 'The Virgin and the Foreskin', without blinking an eyelid! Questions spring to mind at a provocative handle like that, such as, who is the virgin and whose is the foreskin? – and what is the association between the two? Not a very close one I should imagine, or half the description would no longer apply! There again, there was a group a few years back who called themselves 'The 4 Skins', and I remember with amazement the mother of one of them claiming the credit for dreaming up the name.

Then there is another group which rejoices in the horrible name of 'The Smegs'. I do wonder if the young ladies who bandy such names about understand the significance. If the mother of one of the group dreamt that name up too, she should be ashamed of herself for neglecting her offspring's genital hygiene.

What is it with pop groups, then? It was our very own Acorn which astounded us with the news that a British pop 'star', on a visit to S. America, wowed his audience by stuffing a lemon under his foreskin! Elvis Presley, despite his American birth, rejoiced in a foreskin, as did Jimi Hendrix. Since foreskins seem so important to the pop scene, could it be that potential stars are vetted to ensure they are fully equipped?

But it's not just foreskins and not just the pop scene which shock the sensitivities these days. I heard Theresa Gorman the other day on the BBC, accusing a stuffy Tory colleague of considering all women as either grannies, nannies or fannies. Even that repository of right-wing respectability, The Spectator, has its moments: a lady philologist, Dot Wordsworth, who does a short column on the correct use of words, has been gleefully titillating the readership recently by going on for week after week about Jessica Mitford's aunt's fascinating – and mischievous – report that the local people use the word 'cunts' to mean garden moles. Just to ensure that less worldly readers got the message, she then went on to contrast this with the poet Carlyle's use of the word 'twat' to mean a nun's habit. In the same magazine, the well-known Greek tycoon columnist, Taki, has twice described people he disliked as looking like a 'circumcised penis'. But then, the Greeks have always been, and still are, famous for their preference for the foreskin as a mark of bodily perfection, and their distaste for circumcision.

Self Indulgence 7

I might as well admit it to you all! I am a dedicated wanker!

Most people think it is a derogatory term to be called a wanker, but if I am referred to in that way I actually enjoy it because I enjoy being one so much! It is so much a part of my life and has been since I reached puberty at the rather early age of eleven.

But let's go back a bit. To when I was born in 1943. It was the fashion for baby boys to be circumcised routinely (well, about 50% of them anyway) and

I was no exception. I have marvelled at the skill of the surgeon ever since, giving me invisible scarring and unrestricted growth to my extra large knob, clean and available for all to see, uncluttered by any foreskin.

During my childhood I was aware that some other boys were different to me. We had the usual mutual inspections – I was amazed at how many variations there were in length and girth, as well as whether or not I could see the other boys' knobs as they could mine.

Then at my early puberty I became aware that my balls and cock were getting much larger, and the latter gave a nice sensation when rubbed when it was stiff. My nearly eight-inch cock was only to be a little longer than average, but its girth and the size of my knob especially were of special interest to the other boys. My friends, most of whom hadn't reached puberty yet, would become jealous if they saw me in the changing rooms at school and frequently would try to kick or punch my balls for revenge. They called it 'knackering me', I remember. They would also devise other methods of 'torturing' my sex organs too, such as tying my balls up tightly and squeezing them or hitting them. Looking back on all this, although they were cruel to this shy lad, I actually enjoyed the attention it brought to me. Sometimes they would strip me, hold me down with my legs apart, and wank me until I came, which I quickly realised I enjoyed even more.

As time at secondary school went on, we teenage boys would indulge in some extra curricular activities, such as three or four of us going to a remote shed, stripping off, and having contests where we would wank ourselves or each other to try to see who could shoot the furthest! A prize for the winner!

At about the age of 18, I can remember frequently seeing how many climaxes I could achieve in one day (I think 10 or so was my limit – oh, for those days again!) and comparing with my friends. My fair-skinned prick was so sore at the end that I would vow to abstain for a week – but I'd never achieve this, and be at it again a day or two later. I realised that I was a compulsive wanker!

I would use two basic techniques. My favourite was to lie on my front on my bed with my balls and cock wrapped in a piece of cloth, and pump away, using rapid buttock movements as with conventional sex. My piece of cloth (often my pyjamas) and my bed would become anyone I wished to fantasise about. Often I would draw my left leg up to increase the friction on my knob to achieve a good climax.

As time went on I used the 'full fist clutch' method. With this method I was able to have about an inch of movement of my fist over the length of the shaft between the underside of the knob and the base of the cock. But with very tight skin there when erect (due to the full circumcision) I quickly moved on to the basic method I still use, that of forming a circle of the thumb and forefinger of the right hand which, when opened up about half an inch, would slip lightly over the widest part of the knob. My left hand would push my balls up from underneath. Then the other three fingers of my right hand would hit the top of my balls on each downward thrust – a sensation which I enjoy – and, preferably with a little lubrication, a full and controlled workup to ejaculation could be achieved, easing off the frequency of rubbing to prolong the pleasure. This then became my main method of masturbating four or five times a week (less if conventional sex was available) for about 20 years.

In my mid-forties I noticed, over a period of perhaps 3 or 4 years, a definite lessening in the sensitivity of my knob. My GP assured me that it was all in the mind and not physical at all. But I seriously wondered if it was to do with the nerve endings becoming less sensitive due to the frequent rubbing of my unprotected knob by the method described.

Other things happened. Whereas up to now I had always preferred to have my thighs as wide as possible apart while wanking, I now had greater pleasure by pressing my knees and thighs tightly together. Indeed, to this day, if I have help from a partner, I request that they immobilise my legs by tying my knees tightly together with a leather strap for maximum sensation, taking care that my balls are above my thighs and not trapped between them.

As an added stimulus to increase the sensations, I have also enjoyed using metal rings and leather straps or cord around my balls; having my sex organs tortured (gently!) – perhaps a throwback to my schoolday experiences; totally shaving my body hair (especially keeping the pubic hair shaved), and using lubrication such as baby oil or KY jelly. A friend has also made me use a wanking machine he constructed. Basically, it consists of a soft chamois leather pouch lined with a polythene bag which is well-lubricated with oil. By inserting my erect cock and then placing the device between the mattress and sprung lower portion of the bed to give pressure, a very efficient and enjoyable wank can be performed by kneeling by the bed and thrusting.

In 1984, when I was 41, and having fathered three sons, I had a vasectomy. Contrary to my anxieties, I discovered that, far from diminishing my sexual keenness, I became more randy than ever! Furthermore, my outpourings at climax were effectively unchanged.

I have always had an active Couper's Gland, which produces a clear fluid that lubricates the knob, especially visible when the previously stiff cock becomes flaccid – especially nice for oral sex for which my large circumcised knob is particularly well suited. This I enjoy, but from time to time I have to ask my partner to stop, as my nerves in the lower part of the knob 'jangle' in a way that makes it oversensitive. A moment's pause is all that is needed before resumption. This is akin to stopping wanking for a while to enjoy it more when it is restarted.

Now in my early 50s, my climaxes are sadly less frequent. But the good news is that they are far, far higher than before. Whereas they used to be 'controllable', I cannot resist crying out and almost passing out with the extreme pleasure they bring. And that's not all: the amount of spunk that I produce must be an all-time record for my age! It gushes out with some dozen or more spurts of excellent strength – just as when I was in the school contests! Afterwards I am totally exhausted both mentally and physically, and must have about 10 minutes to recover, after which I can erect again. Another orgasm can sometimes be experienced after some 6 hours, though I usually leave it a day or two.

I enjoy the fun of experiencing sexual fantasies when wanking in the presence of, or being wanked by, others – either males or females. Generally my experience has been that females really do not know how to wank a cock very well by hand (though they can be excellent by oral means). Well, why should they? They, poor creatures, haven't got one, and therefore don't know from personal experience how to maximise the pleasure! To be masturbated by another male is very pleasurable indeed, as he knows the amount of friction to use etc. I find the technique used is usually much better on my circumcised prick if he too is a roundhead – and presumably the same goes for uncut males. Perhaps members could comment, as I obviously can only speculate on the latter. Finally, self masturbation. To be honest I must admit that, for me, this is the best. Only you can know the way you feel as you approach climax, and so can adjust your rubbing speed and technique accordingly. The best for me therefore, is to be naked in the presence of another male who may or may not be dressed (both have a turn-on for me), and who enjoys oiling my sex organs up liberally (perhaps I may have a metal ring forced over my balls to pull them forward and increase the rigidity of my cock further), but who, having worked me up, lets me take over for the final stretch to full climax.

Who was it who said that a long 'journey time' is the most enjoyable part of having sex and, if you then arrive at the terminus at the end too, there can surely be nothing to complain about?

I am sure that readers of my completely frank and honest account on a subject that is very dear to Acorn members' hearts, will find at least some similarity to their own experiences – especially those circumcised members. It would be most interesting to compare and contrast your own experiences with mine in future issues of the magazine, so please don't be shy in coming forward.

Finally, may I refer to the article in 6/95, 'Radical Circumcision'. B.W. – Surrey might like to know that the shape of the penis in the sketch is very familiar to me – my own! If I stimulate my knob only (not the shaft) from the flaccid state, it becomes engorged with blood and gives the effect described – large knob supported by a slender top of the shaft, just as in the illustration.

Editorial

First of all, let me make some apologies on behalf of the team. Although I'd finished 7/95 before the end of November and 8/95 before the second week in December, the commitments of the other two in the run-up to Xmas were such that the two editions became united, and ended up being sent too late to be delivered before Xmas. The two being sent out together made the weight just tip the postal scale, so Brian decided to leave out the annual renewal form and send it with 1/96 instead. So I must say sorry to those who wrote asking where it had got to.

Self Indulgence 8

When I was a boy, with a foreskin, in England, I learnt to masturbate with my school friends. They mostly masturbated by pulling the skin up and down, so that was what I did. The circumcision rate was about 50/50, and even the roundheads did it that way, just moving the skin on the shaft. After puberty, I generally did it myself, with the skin retracted, since my foreskin was quite short. In my later teens, still at school, I started experimenting with rubbing my knob, using a lubricant – I remember using sun-tan oil the first time I tried it. This was initially an attempt at simulating intercourse – which I hadn't experienced at that stage. (Before long, of course, I did experience coitus, and found it wasn't quite the same...) However, rubbing with a lubricant gradually became my preferred way of wanking – it just seemed far more sensual.

As a boy I spent a little time in the U.S.A., so I knew that circumcision was more common there, and odd comments in books and stories gave me the impression that so was my favourite way of masturbating. Once I came over to Australia (more than 20 years ago) I found that most men and boys were circumcised, and any comments about masturbation seemed to involve lubricants ('he keeps a stack of Playboys and a jar of vaseline under his bed'...you know the kind of comment, I'm sure). So I found myself part of the majority! However, to really enjoy this style of masturbation, I had to use one hand at the base of my penis to hold my skin fully back out of the way, so that the other lubricated hand could slide freely over the shaft and knob. This was a bit limiting if I wanted to look at some erotic literature while I did it...

Eventually, 8 years ago, I got circumcised – not just to go with the majority, but something I'd wanted for a long while. This made all sorts of things better – I'm 100% positive about the benefits, at least in my case – but for the present purpose the relevant one is that I only needed one hand for my favourite sort of wank! I had better say, at this point, that I don't actually masturbate very often – once or twice a month. However, my wife masturbates me rather more frequently – either because it's the wrong time of the month, or because I'm feeling randy and she isn't (though we have sex much more frequently than any sort of hand job.)

There are clear differences between what works best when I do it myself and when my wife does it for me. Baby oil and water-based lubricants are both excellent for solo use, but much less effective in my wife's hands. Hand lotion and similar things are fantastic when she does it, but not nearly so good when I do it myself. Incidentally, the same was true with my previous girlfriend, many years ago, before I was either circumcised or married, so it's not just a question of individual style.

Lubricant is nice but not essential. Masturbating without it always takes much longer, but in the right circumstances can be a positive factor. My wife says she enjoys it – both because she likes the silky-smooth feel of my bare cock, and because she enjoys having me in a highly aroused state for so long before the final relief. She strokes downward with a firm, slow action, paying particular attention to the knob and frenulum. When I do it myself, I slide my hand over the shaft and knob very lightly and much faster.

One final point. The first few times I ever experienced orgasm, as a young boy, the sensation started at the base of my cock and spread right through my body, all the way to the tips of my fingers and toes. An incredible feeling!

Once I started to masturbate regularly, the sensation was still highly enjoyable, but didn't have the extent and intensity. I guess it was partly because I did it so often, and partly because, with increasing experience, I'd learned how to use my foreskin to bring myself off with maximum speed and minimum effort. In the eight years since I've been a roundhead, that old sensation has gradually come back, and now I quite often experience a whole-body orgasm again when I masturbate. I suspect that not masturbating very often is as much a factor as losing my foreskin, but I wouldn't entirely discount the latter aspect. Either way, I enjoy it (but I still enjoy coitus more).

In 6/95, under the title 'Radical Circumcision', B.W. of Surrey enquires about a man who had an apparently 'incut' area below the glans. This is almost certainly the result of excessive cutting during circumcision, leaving the upper part of the shaft denuded. See the book Circumcision: a Pictorial Atlas by E.A. Grossman (Todd & Honeywell, Great Neck, New York, 1982), where there is a description and picture of this and other problems with botched circumcisions.

In 2/95, you had an article from 'William', whose 'recircumcision' (though why he had, or wanted, to be recircumcised was never explained) had caused him constant pain for many months. No wound takes so long to heal, so one has to assume that something had gone wrong – adhesions forming under the skin, perhaps. In such cases one really must see the doctor concerned and get to the bottom of the problem. Pain is not a normal consequence of a simple circumcision. I was circumcised as an adult (by the sleeve technique) and had no dressing, or pain, after the op. I took no painkillers of any sort at any time. The only discomfort was the stitches catching on my clothes – a tissue around my cock fixed that. The older of my two sons was circumcised at age 9. His cut was done differently, and he had a dressing around it for a week. Again though, he didn't find any need for painkillers, and the only pain was from accidental knocks (all too frequent at that age). Again, the stitches were a bit annoying until they all came out. So, as the adverts say, 'If pain persists – see a doctor'.

Observations

Like most men, I have always had an obsession with cock size. I know that we all have a good look at the other guys in the changing room and make comparisons, and, while nothing is said, I'm sure there are many mental comments as a result.

I have more reason for this obsession because I'm sure that I have the smallest cock around and, judging by the last Acorn survey, the smallest within the Society. It nudges 5" when hard and is slim (circumference at the base about 4.4"). My question is whether there are other guys out there with comparable measurements? Certainly, in all the magazines, one generally only sees well-hung men. Where are the other 5-inchers? Or are they the non-randy types who are unconcerned about sex? I rarely ever see anyone in a changing room with a cock as small as mine and would be interested in others' views on this.

It appears that the average British man is fairly cock-shy. When I change I find it logical to take all my clothes off and then put my sports clothes on. Not so the average Brit, who does it in two stages to ensure that the lower part of the body is not exposed to view! Likewise, when showering, most appear to turn towards the wall, and the number of cavaliers who retract their foreskins to wash in the view of others is very small. Most turn away furtively as if this is an embarrassing operation. A very few will retract their skins and leave them retracted, not appearing to be shy (I am among these), and I notice that one of my friends has his skin already retracted as he gets into the shower, but pulls it forward again as he comes out! I wonder what the basis is for this general shyness?

I have noticed recently a couple of really tight foreskins – with the knob standing out behind the skin and a long tassel on the end. It would be interesting to know if these fellows have trouble with tightness, but certainly, if my cock looked like these I would go straight for a circumcision, if only for a better looking cock.

Also, I see very few cleanly cut roundheads. Most seem to have a ring or two of skin nestling behind the knob, in contrast to the U.S. look, with its totally exposed knob and scar well behind it. Is this a peculiarly British way of circumcision?

It seems that we cavaliers are in a minority within Acorn, but I am still interested in hearing from any cavalier considering a circumcision, or someone who has had it done as an adult. I had fairly limited response to my last request, and it may be interesting to hear from men who had to be circumcised, rather than those who wanted it, as the latter category is always positive about the outcome!

Nurse's Comments

In 7/95, you ask for comments on 'Circumcision and HIV', sent in by a reader from Canada. As a State Registered Nurse, I have in the past had a number of HIV and AIDS cases to look after, and have a few points to make on the claim that circumcision protects from AIDS. Firstly, the claim is based on experience from Africa, and it is now quite clear that the disease takes an entirely different course there from Europe and America. Despite all the predictions, sexually acquired HIV is still associated almost exclusively with a gay lifestyle in Europe and America, whereas in Africa it is the heterosexual community that suffers. Secondly, if circumcision protects, why is it that the USA, where 95% plus of the sexually active male population is circumcised, suffers from a much higher incidence of HIV/AIDS than Europe, where circumcision is next to unknown? The point I am making is that the African experience is so different from the rest of the world that you cannot apply its data to other countries, especially when it flies in the face of the recorded facts.

Another reason often quoted for retaining circumcision is that it protects against urinary tract infections. This makes me cross, because no-one bothers to mention the fact that females suffer far more from urinary tract infections than males, whether circumcised or not. And yet no-one expresses concern about our much greater problem – not that I would be happy about it if they prescribed circumcision to prevent it!

Finally, a short comment on M.S.'s letter, 'Why Wash?' in the same issue. I agree wholeheartedly with the points he makes about it not being strictly necessary, and that girls with cystitis benefit from not wearing knickers and avoiding using toilet paper after they pee. But I would remind him of an interesting French phrase: 'ça pue comme une petite fille qui se néglige' – 'it pongs like a little girl who neglects herself'!

All girls have a much greater problem keeping their external parts unobjectionable than any male, whether circumcised or not, and I should imagine that his girlfriend needed to take the hot bath (or shower) treatment every day, unless he was incredibly un-fussy!

I am so glad to have been lent your magazine, which fills a definite void in informing people about a subject which is still considered too 'delicate' to be aired to any great extent elsewhere. Please keep up the good work.

Circumcision — A Japanese View

Culled From The Internet Newsgroups by V.Q. – London

Hi, this debate on circumcision is interesting because I used to feel ashamed of being uncircumcised. Now I'm not ashamed but I think a lot of other people here are. Here in Japan, no one's circumcised at birth, but it seems everyone is by the time they are adults. They may not be necessarily cut, but it seems they have their glans completely exposed permanently. Does this happen naturally to most people? I used to be told that it happens when you grow up. Maybe the penis is supposed to outgrow the foreskin? I also frequently see ads in magazines (not dirty) about rings you put around the penis for a few months to make it look better by permanently keeping the foreskin retracted. It seems that in Japan most people do something to keep the glans exposed for looks even though they are covered in their elementary years.

Also, many of you say that sex feels better with a foreskin because of the nerves and because the skin moves back and forth. I'm a beginner with sex :-)) and want to ask about using condoms on a uncircumcised penis because I am having some trouble. If the foreskin is retracted, it hurts when putting on the condom because it gets stuck behind the head and I have to force it down which pulls some sensitive skin doing so. It also hurts when having sex because of the friction on the sensitive glans. If I put it on with the foreskin retracted, it feels good but many times, the condom falls off in the action because it moves back and forth with the foreskin. What do you think.

Proud Father With Circumcised Boy

(Article in Afterposten, Norway)

By Arild M. Jonassen

Amir Nabi proudly showed off his day-old son. Afterposten met the two, just a few hours after the son was circumcised.

The operation took 10 minutes at Aker Hospital. "It is important that circumcision is done safely, so I'm glad the hospital did the job. I remember my own circumcision as a four or five-year old in Lahore in Pakistan as a painful experience", says Amir Nabi.

Afterposten met him at the maternity ward together with departmental consultant Knut Urdal, who told us that they had circumcised seven newborn boys that day. He would prefer to give priority to other cases, but also thought that it was good that the operation was done in hospital and not with a pair of scissors and other strange instruments he had heard about. Almost all those who wanted it had their newborn sons circumcised at Aker Hospital. Last year there were 184 boys, and so far this year 170, or about 25% of all the newborn boys with parents of foreign origin.

An Old Request

But Urdal is not pleased that the State should require them to take on the job unless the State also funds it. But, to him, such a demand is not new. Urdal has a letter dated 1976 from the then Director of the Health Authority, Torbjorn Mork, asking hospitals to do the operation.

"Circumcision is done at the cost of sterilisations and other more highly prioritised procedures", says Urdal. The Maternity Department has 400 on its waiting list for sterilisation, but in practice has not done this operation for several years. "There are people who have had two children while they have been on the sterilisation waiting list. Other waiting lists too are affected by circumcisions, which in my view are less important tasks. Medically, it is not proven that circumcision gives any health benefit", says Urdal.

Circumcision at the hospital is done by gynaecologists, rather than by the surgeons specialising in urology, who should do it. They refuse on medical grounds, and point to the risk of complications such as bleeding and infection. If malformations are discovered later, the foreskin can be used for 'patching'. Urdal thinks that the present practice at Aker is far from satisfactory.

The operation is not done in an organised way, but just whenever the doctors have time. If the public hospital is to do the job, he thinks it should be done in the day patient department of a polyclinic. But if any work should be done by the private health sector, then perhaps circumcision is the best example, Urdal concludes.

Amir Nabi is pleased that the possibility is available at Aker Hospital, but says that otherwise he would have gone to a private clinic, since circumcision is part of his religion. He also has an older child, a girl who is not circumcised. "Only boys are mentioned in the Koran", he says.

Smoothie J.H.

I did enjoy the feature by Smoothie J.H. on Page 4 of 7/95. As you know, I also wrote on the subject of genital shaving in the previous issue, and there have been one or two other contributions on the subject.

I've written personally to J.H., but maybe other readers would like to share some of the paragraphs I sent to him.

I once burnt my scrotum terribly using a depilatory cream, even though I'd tried it first, without problem, on an area of my thigh. I've heard of several similar experiences, including one needing hospitalisation, but I must say that the result in my case was a fabulously smooth finish which outlasted the burn healing process. I never could get on with electric shavers of any kind.

I confess to being a very sexually active gay man, even at 62. I'm very overweight and not remotely in the 'body beautiful' category, but my shaved genital area has proved – ever since puberty – to be a very strong sexual asset. I think that being circumcised (since birth) also helps. Partners, even those who are a bit suspicious at first, love it, and it has led to many a fabulous blowjob which I know would not have taken place otherwise.

I've often met guys who have said to me that they would like to shave, and indeed have done so on occasions, but have found it too embarrassing in changing rooms and showers. This has never worried me in the least. Rarely does anyone comment, but if they do it is invariably complimentary.

I have always restricted my shaving to my genital area. I don't have a particularly hairy body anyway, but, especially since I have a long residual chest scar following open heart surgery eleven years ago, I prefer to allow my chest hair to grow to disguise the scar.

Many years ago, when in my late teens, I recall my father mentioning to me that he kept his pubic hair shaved, and I told him that, purely by coincidence, I did the same. We never spoke of the matter again and I never saw him naked until I identified his body when he died in 1974. He was then 72. I recall the macabre experience of being more intrigued by the fact that he still shaved than of being distressed at his death. The mourning came later because we had always been very close.

You probably know that I write an agony column in Zipper magazine. I recall once receiving a letter from a reader who claimed to have a collection of tufts of pubic hair from all manner of celebrities. I believe him to have been genuine, and he mentioned the names of an incredible number of well-known politicians, media-famous personalities, etc., who had willingly responded to his discreet letters requesting a contribution. I was quite honoured to be invited to take part, but had to keep him waiting for about three months while I specifically grew a tuft to send him.

And now another subject. Upon reading what follows, somebody out there is going to say, "Speak for yourself - not all Acorn members are tarred with the same brush". Maybe not, but I suspect that many will identify with my 'Confession', albeit with some reluctance, and only after a degree of soul-searching.

I'm totally obsessed with sex. Almost every time I put finger to keyboard I relate the events which started it all on a May day in 1942, my ninth birthday to be exact. That was when I was magnificently and gloriously raped in a haybarn by two late teenagers exempt from military call-up because they worked on the farm to which I had been evacuated during the war. I experienced my first electric, but inevitably dry, orgasm, and discovered the form of physical gratification which has dominated my daily life, usually more than once, for all my fifty-three years since then. Compartmentalised into discretely separate passages – and I mean ‘discrete’, not ‘discreet’, for one side of me sometimes throws discretion to the winds – I have embraced a double life, isolating ‘penile perversion’ on the one hand, from ‘professional propriety’ on the other. Being a pillar of local community leads me one way, but the pillar of my manhood – my good friend Richard (nothing so common as my ‘Dick’!) – has led me another. I have followed willingly, into a lifetime of the most amazing and abundant sexual adventures which would defy credibility if committed to public scrutiny, but which relate entirely to fact, not fantasy.

Flicking through the pages of Acorn, with all its talk of wanking cocks and more, and recognising that I delight in contributing to its baseness, I sometimes pause and ponder. Somewhere up above I used the phrase ‘penile perversion’... Is that what it’s all about? Am I, and are my fellow readers, just lusty, dirty-minded perverts, spilling out our oversexed musings to excite ourselves and titillate others? I revel in all this idle chitter-chatter of cocks and balls and spunk – the nectar of the gods. But am I, are we, missing out on something in our lives? Would I have gained more financially and spiritually if I had turned such journalistic abilities as I have to more prosaic offerings? Would life have been more meaningful if I had spent more time with music than masturbation; with culture rather than cocks; and with books rather than bollocks? The Oxford Dictionary talks of ‘perversion’ as turning something to wrong use, interpreting it wrongly (especially on purpose), or leading astray from the right opinion or conduct.

In the relatively few years that I have enjoyed receiving Acorn, I have the feeling that its contents are broadening from early concentration on the pros and cons of circumcision, into a wider wallowing in the glories of all things sexual...wanking fodder for the masses! It certainly works for me, and I suspect I’m not alone.

We are a small, fairly select, group of individuals, collectively probably of somewhat higher intelligence than the rest. Are we proud of ourselves? Indeed, is there even any need to be proud of ourselves? In our hedonistic lives, is there anything amiss? I don’t know. As the feeling wells up in my loins and I retire to the privacy of my bedroom, I leave you with just one thought...I only asked!

And Now!!! Musical Masturbation – A Competition for the New Year.

Some years ago, when my column appeared regularly in the now defunct magazine HIM, I published an exchange of correspondence on readers’ choice of music to wank to. Think of it – reclining on the bed or in a comfortable easy chair, with one’s trousers around one’s ankles and one’s prick protruding from one’s clenched fist whilst listening to the right mood music. What a delightful way to spend the odd few minutes of stimulated reflection – and subsequent ejaculation.

But what is 'the right mood music'? Sleazy sentimental slush? Passionate and thumping frenzied pop – 'Hit me with your Rhythm Stick'? 'The Rhythm of Life'? Powerful Wagnerian opera?... My personal choice is the famous Ravel's Bolero. How quietly the distant drums announce the beginning of its passage. How relentlessly it gradually develops its insistent enduring passion. How magnificently loud comes its wildly discordant orgasmic crescendo some 15 minutes later. For me, no piece is more perfectly timed, erotically provocative, and capable of generating such lewd, irresistible fantasies. Even as I type, that beat is trapped firmly in my mind and for ever betwixt my legs.

But what say you, dear reader? What music turns you on? What Siren's strains will tempt your ears and lure the tumescence in your dick?

Here's a chance to tell us all. I'm sure our worthy Editor will delight in publishing as many of your replies as space allows and, as a further source of stimulation, this time for your pen, I am offering a CD of 'Bolero' (and other pieces by the same composer) played by the Radio Symphony Orchestra Ljubljana, conducted by Anton Nanut, with Mee Chou Lee on the piano. I shall leave David Acorn to be the judge of the best entry... and sit back to enjoy my own little revel in Ravel.

Self Indulgence 9

It is interesting to reflect how one's wanking techniques change over the years. As a teenage youngster the urge is to obtain a climax as quickly as possible with vigorous rhythmic rubbing of the shaft and foreskin. As one gets older there is more emphasis on foreplay and delaying the climax so as to get the maximum enjoyment. This, I found, could be done with the foreskin forward and gently massaging the glans and frenulum. The glans was very sensitive and it was often not possible to delay the climax for very long.

At the age of 34 I was advised that I needed to be circumcised as I kept getting recurring balanitis, which was being aggravated by a long foreskin. Again my wanking technique changed, and I found it much easier to delay the climax. The size of my glans has increased, with a prominent rim and sulcus, and if I gently massage this area with a lubricant it is very stimulating and sensitive, as is my circumcision scar. And if I pull this area to meet the rim, the resulting sensations are delightful.

A Bone In Your Bonker

Endnotes to Chapter 9

A theory about why humans have lost the penis bone

An erect human penis can be so hard and stiff that people jokingly express scepticism that there is no bone inside. As a matter of fact, lots of mammals do have a stiffening bone, the baculum or os penis, to help the erection along. What's more, it is common among our relatives, the primates; even our closest cousin the chimpanzee has one, although admittedly, a very tiny one which may be on its evolutionary way out. There seems to have been a tendency to reduce the os penis in the primates; our species, along with a couple of monkey species, has lost it completely. So, we have got rid of the bone that in our ancestors presumably made it easy to have a nice stiff penis. Instead, we rely entirely on a hydraulic pumping system, which one cannot but feel is a costly and roundabout way of doing things. And, notoriously, erection can fail – unfortunate, to say the least, for the genetic success of a male in the wild. What is the obvious remedy? A bone in the penis, of course. So why don't we evolve one? For once, biologists of the 'genetic constraints' brigade cannot cop out with, "Oh, the necessary variation just couldn't arise." Until recently our ancestors had precisely such a bone, and we have actually gone out of our way to lose it! Why?

Erections in humans is accomplished purely by pressure of blood. It is, unfortunately, not plausible to suggest that erection hardness is the equivalent of a doctor's blood pressure meter, used by females to gauge male health. But we are not tied to the metaphor of the blood pressure meter. If, for whatever reason, erection failure is a sensitive early warning of certain kinds of ill-health, physical or mental, a version of the theory can work. All that females need is a dependable tool for diagnosis. Doctors don't use an erection test in routine health check-ups – they prefer to ask you to stick out your tongue. But erection failure is a known early warning sign of diabetes and certain neurological diseases. Far more commonly, it results from psychological factors – depression, anxiety, stress, overwork, loss of confidence and all that. (In nature, one might imagine males low in the pecking order being afflicted in this way. Some monkeys use the erect penis as a threat signal.) It is not implausible that, with natural selection refining their diagnostic skills, females could glean all sorts of clues about a male's health, and the robustness of his ability to cope with stress, from the tone and bearing of his penis. But a bone would get in the way! Anybody can grow a bone in his penis; you don't have to be particularly healthy or tough. So selection pressure from females forced males to lose the os penis, because, then, only genuinely healthy or strong males could present a really stiff erection, and the females could make an unobstructed diagnosis.

There is a possible zone of contention here. How, it might be said, were the females who imposed the selection supposed to know whether the stiffness that they felt was bone or hydraulic pressure? After all, we began with the observation that a human erection can feel like bone. But I doubt if the females were really that easily fooled. They too were under selection, in their case not to lose a bone but to gain judgement. And don't forget, the female is exposed to the very same penis when it is not erect. Bones cannot detumescere (though admittedly they can be retracted). Perhaps it is the impressive double life of the penis that guarantees the authenticity of the hydraulic advertisement.

Intact Men Against Circumcision

Intact Men Against Circumcision (I.M.A.C.) is an assembly of intact men networking to save infants and children from destructive genital surgery. We are joined together to help end the intense pain, trauma, terror and suffering which is a perversion called circumcision. As owners of this extraordinary structure, the prepuce (foreskin), we must speak out. As males who appreciate and understand the importance of wholeness, we must speak out. As males who are experiencing a phenomena which guarantees a lifetime of complete, sensuous, fulfilling, and normal sexuality, we must speak out. We have been mute too long, our voices must be heard, we must share the truth that ownership of a complete primary sex organ is healthy and the subtraction from that organ is destructive. The promoters of this primitive and barbaric infringement on the sanctity of the human body have had silence as their consort, including our silence, but we shall remain silent no longer. If we can break this silence, the broken minds can be silenced.

We must educate. We are fighting against all genital mutilations, male and female. Our primary objective is male mutilation due to the fact that the 'rape' of male infants is a crime so common and irrationally accepted in the United States and, to a lesser extent, Canada, Australia, and New Zealand. Other than England, Europe never practised this dementia, nor did the rest of the world. Enlightenment came to England and they stopped this sexual attack on infants 45 years ago. Today, the only countries who openly practice and perpetuate the mutilation of a majority of their infant boys are Israel and the U.S. We realize that Female Genital Mutilation (FGM) is not confined to African and Middle Eastern cultures. There are many instances of FGM in North America and elsewhere. We must speak out on this terror and suffering and eliminate sexual bias by terminating the atrocities against both sexes.

We include men circumcised without their consent who are going through years of dedicated work of 'uncircumcising.' We know it is criminal to have to spend years trying to create a facsimile of a body part that took only 10 minutes of terror to totally destroy. We include women with intact significant others and women fighting to protect the Basic Human Right of all people to all body parts. The time has arrived for those of us who are whole to empower ourselves and each other, to share our feelings, thoughts, and experiences. We can empower other men, circumcised and intact, to leave their sons natural.

Some of us who felt bad due to a peculiar view of being 'different' from most of our peers, have a new awareness and gratitude for physical, sexual, emotional, and mental wholeness. We are aware of our gift, and not only feel good about having whole bodies, but feel delightfully and naturally 'different.' We know that we possess a penis which is vastly superior to one which is irreversibly damaged through destructive surgery. We have deep compassion for our brothers who were forced to endure the abomination and its affects without their consent. All of our voices must be heard to stop this tragedy from continuously repeating itself. We understand that circumcision has never been, and is not, a medical issue. There is no valid medical justification to substantiate any benefit. Almost all penile problems are iatrogenic (doctor caused), acquired after this destructive surgery is performed. We extend a sincere welcome to I.M.A.C.! The wholeness movement will be successful because compassion and truth will prevail. We definitely need each other, as do the infants who try to speak to us through their screams, unable to protect themselves.

Who? What? Where?

I.M.A.C. is a network of intact men. We are joined by restored and restoring men, women with intact partners, sons, grandsons and women fighting to end genital/sexual mutilations. We are a cross-section of mankind from all walks of life and most professions; from the medical, business, and educational world to engineers, housewives, and retirees. We live across the U.S. and Canada, and in Australia, and New Zealand. We are young (and not quite so young) men and women spanning three generations. We are committed to a gentle infancy without the pain, trauma, and terror of sexual surgery, nor the long-term spoilage of the penis.

Did You Know...?

5% of the world's males are circumcised as infants and over half of all infant circumcisions are performed in the U.S.? That 70% of all circumcised men in the world are Muslim, circumcised between the ages of 2 and 17, and it is not a religious requirement? That there is a female victim of genital mutilation for every five male genital mutilation victims in the world? That of US males older than 15, roughly 90% of them were forced to undergo, when they were babies, the male genital/sexual mutilation known as 'infant circumcision'?

Did You Realize...?

The prepuce, shaft, and scrotum share common tissue? The underside of the penis from the commencement of the foreskin to the end of the frenulum. Chopping off this tissue affects more than the removal of the sensitive and protective prepuce and frenulum. It causes an increased unnatural tension of the shaft and disposition of the scrotum.

Circumcision is a hoax that only we can expose! Intact men of America, unite to save your brethren from penile dismemberment! Down with circumcision! Down with circumcision profiteers! Down with infant sexual torture!

Incidence And The Individual

Like many Acorn members, I have been inexplicably interested in circumcision since I was a young child. This nurtured a curiosity to note who had been 'cut', which continues to this day. I never go out of my way or draw attention to myself by overtly practising my quest, but the information often comes up by natural word or a legitimate 'sighting'. Sometimes men or their wives and partners will make a joke or pass a remark, dropping the clear clue. On other occasions, sporting or working activities have led to communal showering when everyone's status was on show. As soon as I know "who's what", the fact is locked in my mind on the database covering their height, hair colouring, voice, etc. I don't have to make any effort with this – it happens automatically. I only wish memory would serve me just as easily with lots of other details in life!

It all started in primary school fifty years ago, and even today I could tell you the status of most of my classmates. Observations were easy, because we were always comparing willies and playing pissing games in the toilets.

The cavaliers indulged in 'ballooning', we roundheads in 'highest up the wall'. The circumcised minority of 20% probably reflected the lower socio-economic status of the school's locality. Doctors presumably charged for the operation pre-1947 and the advent of the NHS. (Does any member know how much it cost pre-war, or could anyone do a bit of interesting research? How does the figure stand against the average wage of the day?)

At grammar school we had compulsory showers after PT twice a week, and a communal bath once a week after games. No hiding place for the shy in that situation! I clearly recall the first time we were all subjected to this levelling experience. As we were all drawn from different schools, and hardly knew each other, there must have been some, like me, totting up the scores to see if they were in a minority/majority. It turned out to be exactly 50%, which ensured that no-one was teased about what they considered to be their penile asset or misfortune. An interesting point is that, despite transfers in and out, leavers and newcomers, this proportion was maintained for the five years I remained a member of that particular class. The higher incidence of circumcision than primary school suggests it was linked to the intake at grammar school being largely from a higher socio-economic class. The great majority of these circumcisions must have been for fashion only. There were no Jews or Muslims in our class, and medical problems would only account for one or two.

I speculate that the high incidence of circumcision in my generation occurred for several reasons:

1. The aspiring middle classes copied the trend-setting upper classes.
2. It was a nice little earner for doctors.
3. Childcare was much more a "woman's province". Daughters being influenced by their mothers always near at hand to advise and assist.
4. Many wives, having circumcised husbands, automatically maintained the practice on junior in an era when it was easily available on request if you could pay.

Underlying all four was a strongly held belief that circumcision was cleaner, and therefore healthier. In a more prudish age, it avoided the embarrassment of teaching boys penile hygiene. From what I've gleaned, many women thought it was neater and sexier. The climate of acceptable conversation did not allow them to say so, but they could achieve this desirable 'look' for their sons by emphasising the health/hygiene aspects.

It is interesting to note that 'fashionable' circumcision declined immediately on the inception of the NHS. Was there a perception that this class identifying mark was too good to bestow on the lower orders for free? Did doctors fence it off into private practice to preserve a nice little earner? Certainly there has been evidence of a total contrast in attitude within, to that without, the NHS. The same doctors wearing a NHS hat have placed every obstacle and discouragement in the way of parents, only to don a bow tie and put down the welcome mat at their consulting rooms when a wallet was produced. Later, the NHS 'anti' may have been bolstered gradually by an intake of doctors who had themselves been circumcised in childhood and resented it. Action brings reaction. Recent times may have seen the operation chamfered out by financial stringency.

The decline in incidence has brought new problems for those few who are now growing up without their foreskins whilst the great majority of their peers are left entire. This was highlighted in a book I recently browsed, called Living with a Willy. This slim and lighthearted presentation has obviously been written to bring information and comfort to today's teenagers, and includes a section on circumcision. The author must have been (or is) something of an 'agony uncle', and quotes from correspondence. He begins with an extract from one boy who feels bad about his penis because he is the only one in a family of five brothers who hasn't been circumcised. He hates his own appearance and envies his brothers. No explanation has been given him regarding his clear isolation, and he is too shy to ask his parents. This sort of letter has more recently given way to another, in which a schoolboy is fretting about his circumcision because it is causing him changing room ridicule. As they are not Jewish, he is at a loss to know why his parents did this to him, and is also too embarrassed to ask them. Another similarly has suffered since his girlfriend finished with him, and feels she blighted his future relationships by telling all her friends that he'd been circumcised. His penile status is now public knowledge and apparently good for a giggle. Even more sad is the case of a young man with a girlfriend who is trying to initiate intercourse. He has to keep making excuses because he fears she will be turned off and end the relationship when she finds he has no foreskin.

Although those cut for religious reasons mainly mix, and are educated, with their own group, a few find themselves in a minority in schools where they suffer taunts from the uncircumcised. Although 'fashionable' circumcision has declined to almost zero, a few unfortunate individuals do have a medical condition which can only be cured by circumcising them. They then have to bear the further misfortune of teasing when their short-sleeve willies are spotted by their pals or discovered by their girlfriends. If those in authority thought deeply about this, and cared, they would make circumcision an option offered to all parents. I am certain there would be sufficient take-up to restore a 50% incidence. This would surely please everybody, and avoid the miserable stigma that it has now become for a not insignificant few.

Our next meeting is imminent and I hope to see many, by now, old friends there, plus some new ones. If any new members feel that they might feel intimidated by the meeting, please don't be. I can assure you that you won't be. And if you can only manage the Saturday afternoon, again, don't hesitate. Just give Brian a tinkle to let him know you're coming for whatever time and he'll sort everything out.

I saw a programme on TV the other night called 'In Search of the Holy Foreskin'. Apparently until a few years ago there were 14 of Jesus' foreskins roaming around churches in Europe, but the authentic one was in a church in Italy, but was stolen by a priest, so the story goes. Nothing much is known about His childhood so it can be presumed that only the three wise men knew He was holy, so why was the foreskin saved? Anyway, the programme seemed to treat foreskins in a very lighthearted way, ignorant of what powerful icons they are to some.

A thing that spurs a lot of members into action to write in are in answer to direct questions. So I thought we

Questions

Doctors exhort mothers not to try to pull back the foreskins of their babies until they are at least four years old, due to the possible ripping of the adhesion between the inner foreskin and the glans, causing hard scar tissue to form on one of the surfaces, with resultant problems in later life. Yet in infant circumcisions the first thing the doctor does is to insert a probe between the foreskin and the glans to tear away the adhesions. Although I must admit to not having looked for scars of this sort on the glans of circumcised penises, do they occur? Who is right and who is wrong?

David Acorn

I would like to know about ejaculation. What is an average amount of come? Are there times when there is more than the normal amount? Or less? How far is a normal squirt? What percentage of men have no squirt, but just ooze out? Has anyone had a really long squirt?

Not Too Radical

I identify as bisexual and have been married, but this experience concerns a long relationship I had with a very sexy Scottish guy I'll call Mike. We met at a gym. He would usually get hard in the shower and one evening I did as well. We had sex back at my place, and shortly afterwards he moved in with me.

From the start I noticed that he had a very long foreskin. It turned out to be unretractable. In the early days I would try to push it back, but he would yell out and that would be the end of that. For about 5 years I never saw the head of his cock. I didn't think too much about it because I was fairly tight myself, and when erect could not get my skin back behind my knob. I thought this was normal.

Mike then began getting unpleasant irritations under his foreskin. At the hospital he was told this was because of his tight foreskin and that he should be circumcised. He was scared of the pain and said no. But over the next few months his irritation continued and for the first time we began to talk to friends about circumcision. We found that others had had the op and no-one regretted it.

At the age of 32 Mike put his name down to be cut, which could be done on the NHS because of his severe condition. We thought it was possible to be partially circumcised, and that's what he wanted as he enjoyed wanking or being wanked by having his foreskin rubbed over his knob. But he was told that in his case this wouldn't be possible and that he had to be fully circumcised. On the morning of the op, however, he told the doctor that he wanted as much skin left as possible.

I'm sure Mike's post-op experience was that of most men who have been circumcised late in life. When he came back from the hospital he spent a very pleasant evening under the effects of the anaesthetic. He was awoken next morning by his erection tearing the sutures apart and there was a lot of blood.

This was to continue for 6 weeks, during which his knob was so sensitive that he couldn't bear anything to touch it. He walked around bandy-legged in pyjama bottoms and later gave me all his boxer shorts and switched to jock-straps, because if his cock rubbed against anything when he walked he got an erection. This was a novelty at first but soon became annoying.

Mike wouldn't let me see his cock until it had completely healed, because he said it looked like it had been caught in machinery. When he finally showed it to me I was surprised because it didn't look as though he'd been circumcised at all, merely that he'd finally pulled back his foreskin, now bunched up behind his knob.

While I was holding his cock in my hand he got hard, and I was again surprised to see the light band of skin around the top of his cock, much lighter than the skin on the rest of his body. This gave him a two-coloured penis which I didn't at first find very attractive.

Despite the loose skin he had been left, Mike was still very tight when hard, and he didn't like it at all. He said he couldn't get any friction going for a good wank. When I tried to do it for him he went completely soft. He'd developed a psychological block and worried that the, by now completely healed, scar would break.

While playing football, Mike pulled a muscle in his leg. At the gym, a Moroccan guy, I'll call him Mohammed, said he could give Mike a massage, and came round to our flat. As I was just starting a massage course myself, I asked if I could watch.

Mohammed stripped down to his shorts and asked Mike to undress completely and lie on the bed face down. When Mohammed began working on Mike's thigh I knew what was going to happen. Sure enough, when Mohammed asked Mike to turn over, Mike warned him he'd got an erection. Mohammed said he was used to it.

Mike's cock did look quite formidable. He was more than 8" in length and thicker than usual, and now, maybe a year after his operation, the rim of his knob seemed to have flared out, giving the already big head a very erotic appearance, like a giant mushroom. But Mohammed just carried on with the massage.

When he'd finished, he asked Mike if he could put weight on his leg. Mike stood up. As his cock was also standing straight up, it couldn't be ignored any more. Mike mentioned he still got hard very easily because he'd been circumcised not long ago. Mohammed, who was likewise, asked Mike if he'd got used to it, and Mike replied that masturbation was still a problem. Mohammed said he could show Mike how to do it if he'd be interested. What developed was a very interesting evening of sex education!

Mohammed began by very gently rubbing his massage oil into Mike's cock, which of course was all that was required. Difficult as it may be to believe, we'd never considered the possibility of lubrication before because it had never been necessary when Mike had a foreskin. Mohammed used different kinds of strokes, focusing on the rim and the underside of the knob and, probably within 3 minutes, Mike shot the biggest load I think I've ever seen, straight up into the air.

Afterwards, Mike got further practice on Mohammed's cock, didn't succeed in making him come, but this was rectified during our subsequent threesomes. For the next few months, my sex life with Mike was probably better than ever. He wanted action constantly, and it was a major turn-on to me to have a big, and what I now regarded as a very beautiful cock thrust into my hand or mouth at all hours of the day and night.

Mike was now egging me on to get cut myself, but having seen the blood first-hand I was probably more scared than he'd been. I eventually relented, because at the age of 38 I thought why not try something different! I booked in at the same hospital.

Then, completely out of the blue, Mike and I broke up (he subsequently got married). By the time my operation was due nearly a year later, I was living with a woman who enjoyed playing with my foreskin. Circumcision no longer seemed important and I cancelled the date with the surgeon.

Today I'm very unsure what to do. On two occasions, partners have pulled down my pants and said, with obvious disappointment, "I was hoping that you'd been circumcised". This is why I'm a new member of the Acorn Society and interested in advice.

Gary – London

The following is an article published in The Guardian of 19th Feb. 1996 by a lady doctor named Dr Luisa Dillner, called:-

In Favour of the Foreskin

The young man pulled down his trousers and showed me his newly circumcised penis. "I'm not very happy," he said. "Is it supposed to look like this?" It was my first circumcision, and sadly, his penis bore no resemblance to the cosmetically perfect diagram in my operation notes. Somehow, I had left the skin of his penis twisted to one side. "I'm so sorry," I remember saying with complete sincerity. "Perhaps my consultant can do something about it." I never heard what he did, but at the next circumcision my consultant never left my side.

About 30,000 foreskins are removed in Britain each year, and in common with other surgical wounds, the circumcised penis can bleed, get infected, and be cosmetically unacceptable. Most circumcisions are carried out on children – around 7% of boys under 15 have had their foreskins removed. Religious rituals aside, only about one in six circumcisions is medically necessary. This week's British Medical Journal has a letter from 20 adult men [members of NORM(UK)], circumcised as children, arguing they have been harmed by the procedure. Circumcisions, they say, are rarely necessary, and it is unethical to amputate normal tissue from a normal child.

In America, the foreskin has become a political issue. Pressure groups campaign against its routine use (more than half of newborn boys are circumcised) and provide advice on reclaiming the foreskin for those men who feel sexually and emotionally incomplete without it.

Circumcision probably decreases the likelihood of cancer of the penis, but this is a rare disease and the risk is probably still negligible in uncircumcised men who wash behind their foreskins. Some studies suggest that circumcision protects against AIDS, but most research comes from Africa where the incidence of the disease is high, and the findings may not be applicable elsewhere.

In Britain, most medical circumcisions are carried out because the foreskin cannot be pulled back over the head of the penis. Occasionally this is a real problem caused by recurrent infections that have left the foreskin scarred and relatively immobile. More commonly, however, it is a self limiting condition. In Denmark, a doctor examined the penises of 2,000 Six to 17 year olds for up to nine years. At 6, nearly 1 in 10 boys couldn't retract their foreskins – by 17 this had fallen to 1%. Only 3 needed circumcision (1 in 700).

Most of my male friends who admit to being circumcised can't understand what all the fuss is about. But the doctors among them admit that the foreskin is discarded on shakier grounds than any other appendage. If our finger was infected, for example, amputation would seem a drastic solution.

The argument that the foreskin makes sex more pleasurable is vaguely supported by a recent study in the British Journal of Urology, which found the structure was special in its thinness, nerve supply, and sensitivity to light touch. This was something that surgeon Sir James Spence suspected in the 1960's when he wrote to a doctor explaining his reluctance to circumcise a 7 month old boy. "Whatever mistakes nature makes about the structure of less essential organs such as the brain or stomach, in which she is not much interested, you can be sure she knows best about the genital organs."

It's Never Too Late

While my story may not be of interest to all the members, it will have served its purpose if it saves a few doubting souls unnecessary hesitation.

On reaching puberty, I soon became aware of three facts, and these were to plague me for nearly forty years. First of all, I realised that I was very highly sexed; secondly, I had a painfully tight foreskin, and thirdly, as a result of this, I suffered from premature ejaculation, unable to 'last' more than thirty seconds while practising 'self-abuse' as it was called in those days.

On reflection, I was always at the doctor, even as a boy, with balanitis and phimosis, but neither he nor my father ever suggested circumcision. In fact, until the day my father died in 1961, I never received a word of advice on sexual matters. Don't forget, when I was a boy in the thirties, we were taught that masturbation impaired one's eyesight.

When the sexual revolution arrived in the sixties, intimate matters were more openly discussed, and I read an article about a male who had been circumcised in adulthood. However, I could never bring myself to discuss the possibility of such an operation with my doctor. Even if I had, I could never have summoned up the courage to face surgery.

In the autumn of 1979, I met a pleasant young man who had an extremely well-trained foreskin. He was completely empathetic to my problem and, after endless counselling over the next 6 months, I faced the dreaded operation at last. Not wanting my family, friends or colleagues to know I was having such an operation, I decided to have it done privately during a week's holiday, and wrote to the advice column of a magazine for the names and addresses of surgeons specialising in this field.

On Sunday afternoon, 11th May 1980, I supposedly left home for a week in Blackpool, but actually headed first of all for County Durham. I arrived at the Surgeon's home in early evening, and he asked me whether I wished a full circumcision with or without the removal of the frenulum, or a partial circumcision which would leave only the tip of the glans uncovered. When I settled for the full-cut and removal of the frenulum, he then explained the procedure for the operation to be performed under local anaesthetic.

Eleven injections were administered in and around my penis which were no worse than the jabs one gets at the dentist's, but when I got the final one on the underside in the area of the frenulum, I nearly hit the roof. However, the pain was only momentary. The operation itself, using the plastibell technique, took one hour, completely devoid of pain, and it did not seem long until he was stitching and bandaging the wound. Because of the long journey from County Durham to Blackpool, it was pre-arranged that I would stay overnight at the Surgeon's home. After the operation was over, we watched TV for an hour or so, then I retired for the night. Once I was in bed, he came into my room and left some painkillers on the bedside table in case I needed them through the night. However, the next thing I remembered was being awakened for breakfast in the morning; the painkillers untouched.

At about 11.30 am., I set off for Blackpool, penis swathed in bandages, and crotch so fully padded that it turned heads as I walked along the promenade.

Apart from the injection into the frenulum, I did not suffer any pain at all; a slight discomfort, yes, and the stitches did strain a bit in the mornings when I awoke with my normal firm erection. But all I kept thinking was why I didn't have the operation years ago.

As instructed, the bandages and padding were kept on until I arrived home the following Sunday evening, when I had a hot bath and swabbed the wound with Milton. The stitches soon dissolved and my reconditioned member was ready for action in three weeks time.

I should state that the operation cost me £20 (Twenty Pounds), and I should like to have been able to recommend the Surgeon to any interested readers but, sadly, he is now deceased.

I could go on and on about how the operation changed my life at the age of 52, but that is enough for now. Suffice to say, adult circumcision has worked wonders for me; there is no comparison. Although I am now a senior citizen, I am still very active sexually and, for the past eight and a half years, have been in a wonderful and fulfilling relationship.

In conclusion, I would implore anyone with similar problems, or in any doubt, not to waste time and, at least, go for counselling. It wasn't too late for me but, remember, it's never too early either!

Self Indulgence 10

I really don't recall a time when I did not fondle myself. I suppose that I really became aware of the pleasures of both self and mutual masturbation when I was shipped off to a preparatory boarding school. My independent spirit dates from the same time. Memories of what actually happened in those days are hazy, but after moving up to the senior school things took on a regular pattern. Being wartime, two boys at a time had to bath together, which added to the excitement.

Clandestine liaisons took place at any time of the day, frequently at the back of the class during boring periods, but it was after lights-out in the dormitory that most of the action occurred. The junior dormitories were the most active, containing about sixteen young teenage, developing boys, eager to flaunt their bodily attributes to their peers. All the boys in the dormitories took part in the activities at some time or other, but some were more active than others, and no one was ever forced to join in anything against his will. Most boys had a crafty wank most nights, either alone or slipping into bed with a mate. The actions were sensed rather than heard, as trouble would result if noise disturbed the Housemaster. One was naïve at the time and had not learnt the pleasures to which the body could be subjected, so our releases were confined to masturbation. Most boys were circumcised, those who weren't had easily retractable foreskins thanks to strict annual medical examinations. The art of masturbation was unsophisticated, usually resulting in a race to see who would ejaculate first. The method was generally the same in all cases, with the shaft being vigorously rubbed with the skin being kept back behind the rim of the glans. The glans would also often be massaged using saliva to provide lubricant. As one progressed upwards through the school, one's overt sexual activity declined, being confined to one or two special friends or solo.

Over the years I have enjoyed, unashamedly, solo masturbation as a relief from stress, or just for its own pleasure.

I employ a variety of techniques, or perhaps more correctly, variations on a theme, depending on how much time I have to indulge myself, and the ambient conditions. When time and ambience permit, I prefer to lie naked on my bed. I start off by gently fondling my balls, which has the effect of making my member stiffen quite rapidly. Then I progress to massaging the glans gently with the palm of one hand or the other, the effect being slightly different with each hand. Then I rub the shaft skin all the way up and down, keeping it back from the glans. The hand that is not doing this is used to stroke my sides or nipples. Being gentle in these actions I can make them last for a long while without getting too excited or losing my erection. Variations include changing hands to give a different feeling, gripping the shaft firmly fully in my closed hand with the palm below, then the other way with the palm above, using first one hand then the other. To give greater stimulation, with either two fingers and thumb or full fist, I rub back and forth over the glans, particularly the rim, whilst holding the free skin well back down the shaft. Too much of this action though, without lubrication, tends to induce soreness. I can keep up these various actions for some considerable time, providing I don't do them too forcefully. Occasionally I force the skin to come just over the rim, which gives a cosy feeling. When I am ready to climax I lubricate the glans and hand, usually with baby oil, and rapidly massage the glans and area immediately behind it with my closed hand. The oil greatly increases the sensitivity and a highly pleasurable orgasm quickly results.

If I don't have much time, or feel like only a quick wank, I will remain standing, and holding the free skin well back so that it can't move, vigorously rub the rim and area just behind the glans with my closed hand, or with an O made of forefinger and thumb. This method brings about a very quick orgasm.

Learning

I was quite convinced at the age of eleven that all girls were soppy, and this was reinforced by a particular couple of girls of my age who would whisper to each other and giggle whenever they saw me. I was at a holiday camp with my parents at the time and dead bored being left to my own devices. Anyway, one day as the girls approached me, instead of giggling, they both suddenly raised their frocks up to their chins – to reveal shamelessly the fact that they were both devoid of knickers, and treated me to an unobstructed view of their bare bald fannies, before they ran off. I was shocked, excited and humiliated at the same time with this unladylike behaviour – I'd probably be a candidate for counselling in this day and age – but I was lost in wonderment at the stark simplicity and neatness of the female anatomy, since I had no sisters of my own and was a bit hazy about such things.

A couple of days later I met up with the pair again sitting on a gate, waiting for me to come by. Wondering if they still had no knickers on, and hoping for another chance to find out, I stopped and talked to them. As we chatted I saw them watching me slyly as first one then the other hitched her knees up, letting their frocks ride up, and I realised with yet more excitement, as they let their knees separate, that both girls were still bare under their skirts, and were deliberately letting me see their private parts again. "What are you staring at?" asked one of them, taunting me. I asked her why they didn't wear any knickers. "Mind your own business", she said, and then accused me of rudeness for looking at her fanny – can you imagine the cheek of her! The saucy pair then made it clear that it wasn't just a matter of feminine exhibitionism, but they had an ulterior motive. I was invited, once I'd had a good look, to repay the privilege in the same way and show them my cock. Being a naturally modest sort of bloke, with no experience of this sort of thing, I refused.

"Oh, come on!", said one of the girls, "don't be an old spoilsport". When I still refused, one of them had a quick whispering session with the other and told me, if I did so, they would show me how they could pee backwards. The mere thought of such a thing had me trembling with shock – girls were not supposed to let blokes see them peeing. But my curiosity got the better of me and I agreed. Both girls then got down on all fours, presenting the interesting aspect of their rear view, split top and bottom by bum cheeks and fanny, before loosing off two powerful untidy jets straight out behind them. I only just managed to jump clear to avoid being soaked!

By now I was beginning to enter into the spirit of the thing, and anxious to show that I wasn't totally hopeless, I let them undo my zip and extract my penis. They then insisted that I do a pee for them, and since I thought that it was the mark of a gentleman to always pull his foreskin back for a pee, I started to do so. I was immediately told to pull it forward again, and at this point the girls revealed their true intentions. Apparently, one of them had a circumcised brother, and when she heard the other talk about how she had seen a boy play balloons with his foreskin, she was dead curious. And so I was instructed to close off the tip of my skin and produce the biggest balloon possible, which I did to the delight of the young innocent who had never seen such a thing before.

The point of all this is that it raised the matter of circumcision, about which I had very little notion, never having seen a circumcised willy. A short time later I won a scholarship to the local grammar school and it was then that I discovered more about the alternative cock configuration, since half a dozen boys in my form were circumcised. The boys themselves made no big deal of this fact, but we did have discussion with the sports master who said it was a good thing – it promoted cleanliness, and “all the best people had it done”. This made me feel terrible. If it was such a good thing, why had my parents deprived me of it? It was at this point that I began to develop a real distaste for my own foreskin and wished I could have a bare acorn like the others.

In the early days of telly, people were still used to making their own entertainment and my parents, who were both keen musicians, used to hold musical evenings every so often. A handsome lady of about thirty-something used to sing soprano. I found her easy to talk to and she was always ready to lend a sympathetic ear, even to a nervous sixteen-year-old. Of course, there was no question of telling her about my phobia about my foreskin – I'd rather have died than talk about it.

What I did raise, though, was sunbathing. We lived in an old Georgian house with a double roof which made an ideal suntrap. During the school holidays I used to go up there and sunbathe, secure in the knowledge that it was totally secluded from view. As a consequence, I managed always to sport a tan and the woman asked me how I managed it. I told her about my secret sunbath up on the roof and she said how envious she was – she'd love to get a nice tan. So I took courage and asked her up. She looked a bit doubtful at first, but finally agreed.

So on the day, I set the place up with a couple of towels and tube of suntan cream, and led her up. We both stripped off to our underwear, and with a sigh of contentment she laid back in the sun. After a couple of minutes I suggested the suntan oil and she immediately agreed, asking me to rub it in her back. I started at the top, rubbing it in evenly down past her bra fastening to the edge of her skimpy panties, and then down the backs of her thighs. The softness of a woman's skin, and the perfume of her body, excited me, and I allowed my fingers to brush the inside of her thighs, causing an intake of breath from her. As I moved down I realised with consternation that I had developed an intractable and unconcealable erection, and when I finally finished, she looked at it with a little flush on her face and smiled.

The next week we had another sunbathing session – at her suggestion – and I had a feeling that something exciting was going to happen. This time, after half an hour, she asked me if I would mind if she slipped her bra off – she would really like to get her top brown. She then urged me to take my pants off: we were both adults and nothing I had would shock her. I wasn't so sure, since I was very conscious of my foreskin, and was quite convinced that such a well-brought-up woman would prefer a circumcised penis. I needn't have worried – after a quick glance at it she paid no more attention and I began to relax, although the sight of her heavy and shapely breasts made me tremble with yearnings I only half understood. Once again I was enlisted to spread the cream over her back, only when I had finished, she turned over, shut her eyes and told me to do her front!

By now I was riding on the crest of a sexual emotion stronger than any previously felt and was very conscious of my rock-hard penis bobbing about, with the tip just showing through the stretched foreskin opening as I gently rubbed the oil into her breasts. She was now breathing quite heavily and, with her eyes still shut, she said, "Oh well...", and hooking her thumbs into her panties, slid them off. The invitation was obvious, and with trembling fingers I rubbed oil into her smooth rounded belly, over the tops of her thighs and then, taking courage at her obvious state of expectation, allowed my fingers to run the length of her pretty vulva as her thighs moved apart to make my job easier. She gasped as they slipped inside, and at that point my excitement went over the top and to my horror I found myself spurting all over her. She instantly realised what had happened and burst out laughing which really broke me up, and I started crying with humiliation. She was instantly all sympathy, said it was all her fault and pressed my face into her breasts as she tried to comfort me.

I soon calmed down and astounded her by immediately getting another invincible erection (I couldn't do it now, worse luck!) and she remarked admiringly what a virile young man I was. At this point I took my courage in my hands and asked her if she wasn't offended by my long foreskin. "Whatever for?" she said. I told her about what the master at school had said and how I had felt bad about my foreskin ever since. She laughed shortly and told me not to be silly: foreskins were perfectly natural and desirable. Most normal girls would expect to find one on a man and might well feel disappointed if he didn't have one. She said she preferred a foreskin for a lot of reasons, but the main one was that she didn't think nature could be improved upon. She told me that as long as I kept it clean, no girl could possibly complain. As she spoke she sought out my penis with her hand and gently tugged the skin back. She then told me to lie back and concentrate on my foreskin, taking note of the feelings it afforded me, as she pulled the skin back over the head and then started slowly rubbing it to and fro. My thoughts centred on the excitement of the sensation caused by her soft hand, and eventually I came like a firecracker, swooning completely as I did so. I opened my eyes to find her staring at me with a flushed smile on her face. She ordered me never to feel bad about my foreskin again. I haven't!

Answer to Observations, 1/96

It would seem that you are shy to talk about circumcision. I am just the opposite, and very often get into a conversation on the subject both with men and women. I feel it's a subject that should be discussed more. So many men want to be circumcised, and a lot need to be, but they put it off rather than discuss it with someone because they are too embarrassed to talk about it.

I have corresponded with many men and women since I was circumcised, and have received many letters afterwards from men who have gone ahead and had the operation after our correspondence. I personally had to be circumcised 5 years ago at the age of 59, the reason being that I had a very long foreskin which rolled up when having intercourse with my lady friend, and made things very uncomfortable for her.

The surgeon took off two and a half inches of skin, but unfortunately this was not enough, and I am at present looking for a surgeon to take off even more, as I still have some loose skin behind my glans which my doctor says needs to be removed. My doctor happens to be a very young lady G.P., therefore I get a woman's view of the situation, which is always a good thing. I also have a step-daughter who is a staff nurse in a large hospital, so you see I get very sound advice from the female side.

I must say that since my circumcision I have enjoyed every minute of the situation. The feel of a naked glans against your pants is much nicer without that roll of skin behind one's glans.

I watched my circumcision being done, and it was a great feeling to see the surgeon throw that piece of foreskin onto the table. I could hardly believe that at last it had happened. I only wish that I had been done years ago as a youngster when it was advised, but I was a bit chicken in those days and did not want nurses looking at my penis.

I have had a few prices from private clinics to remove the rest of my foreskin, but they are all too expensive, some at £500, and one at £750, and some doctors who would normally do circumcisions won't do a tightening-up job, only a complete operation. If anyone knows of a good surgeon in the south of England who would be likely to do a second circumcision at a reasonable price, I would be very pleased to hear from them.

As you can tell from my letter, I am very much in favour of circumcision, and I think all males should have the chance to experience it on the NHS without having to pay high prices for the privilege.

Chad Varah

I was most interested to hear Chad Varah, the clergyman who founded The Samaritans, discussing sex in general, and masturbation in particular, during a record programme on Radio 3 recently. He was referring, of course, to the educational work he did amongst the ignorant in the early days, and said that it was a great pity that, in his youth, masturbation was considered to be a mortal sin, would make you go blind etc. He said that he knew this was untrue because he was "...an enthusiastic practitioner"! Such a confession from a revered reverend gentleman on Radio 3 just shows how times have changed!

A.S. – Scotland

I've been sent the following article by several members, to whom I would like to give my thanks and ask them not to stop sending them in, thinking that others would do it. It might work out that no-one sends them in, which would be a complete loss.

The article is by Dr James Le Fanu in The Sunday Telegraph. I've taken out the first part which is about surgery on a woman's goitre. Her whole thyroid was taken out leaving her to take pills to replace it for the rest of her life, which on reflection he thought was not really necessary.

My Change of Heart About Circumcision

Since this experience, I have speculated about how many other treatments which I routinely recommend, and which appear quite straightforward, might be unnecessary or have undesirable consequences that I could not imagine. An obvious example, and currently a contentious issue, involves circumcision.

Two or three times a year, concerned mothers ask me to inspect their son's penis (or twinkle, hosepipe, nudger, little man and a host of other euphemisms) whose foreskin is tight and cannot be retracted, and for which the obvious treatment is circumcision.

My opinion, however, has changed radically since reading an impassioned article by a Dr John Warren in the British Medical Journal, in which he claimed that “the foreskin is as important to the penis as the eyelid to the eye”. The effect of his being circumcised when young, he argued, was that “throughout childhood and into adult life, the tip of the penis was always uncomfortable, especially when rubbed against clothing”. Once married, he had observed “remarkably little sensation in that region whose skin seemed to thicken with advancing years”.

To substantiate his argument that circumcision is unnecessary, Dr Warren cited several scientific papers that show, first of all, that the “non-retractile” foreskin became “retractile” in most boys by adolescence and, secondly, that with the help of a local anaesthetic cream the adhesions around the foreskin could be gently separated off, thus avoiding the need for an operation.

There are, of course, compelling religious reasons why some people might wish their sons to be circumcised, but the medical justification is virtually non-existent. None the less, family doctors continue to recommend the operation, and surgeons to perform it, for no better reason than that the “obvious solution” to a tight foreskin is that it should be removed.

I would still be slightly sceptical about the adverse consequences of circumcision were it not that Dr Warren also described the effect of a manoeuvre by which the foreskin can be restored. This entails stretching the penile skin forward as far as it will go, and then strapping it in position with sticky tape to which a ball-bearing is attached, exerting a continuous gravitational pull.

After a couple of months, the stretched skin forms a substitute foreskin and, as a result, Dr Warren has found that “the tip of the penis becomes softer and steadily more sensitive, intercourse becomes much easier, with a great increase in sexual enjoyment”.

This increase in the sensitivity described by Dr Warren offers quite convincing proof that the foreskin has an important function. In retrospect, it seems remarkable that doctors should have thought for so long that it is expendable.

[Dr Warren is the driving force behind NORM(UK), a group devoted to foreskins, which has been highlighted previously in these columns and to which a few of our members belong. From all the knowledge we have, might there be a case for allowing young men, after giving them all the relevant information, especially those with a very sensitive glans, to have a circumcision if they so wish, on the NHS. With a not too tight circumcision, they could then, when the glans loses its sensitivity in later life, revert to restoring their foreskin. Just a thought! — D.A.]

Huge Helmet

Recently, a close friend of mine visited from Canada. He was originally from Somerset, but emigrated to Canada at the age of 19. We got very drunk one night and the topic swung to sexual preferences/interests. I said that being gay (as was he) I could only suck and wank cut men. His response surprised me. He said, "Oh, that's good, because I'm fully circumcised back".

I asked him if this was done as a baby, and he said not. He had developed a very tight foreskin as a teenager because his helmet enlarged a lot during puberty. So much so, that he was unable to retract it past the first half centimetre of helmet. He went to his GP who suggested gentle but progressive massage to help the foreskin back. Mike did this for six months, to no avail. He then emigrated to Toronto. On the campus there, he found a college doctor who examined his penis and said that he definitely needed circumcision. This was done under local anaesthetic about twenty years ago.

I thought this story amazing, as I'd always imagined Mike to be uncut. I asked to see the job they did and was surprised when he agreed. He has the most bulbous, large helmet I've ever seen. Even when flaccid it's really overhanging the shaft of his cock. He asked me if I thought his circumcision was 100% necessary. I told him, definitely, yes. He preferred the look of my cock, which is more in proportion with a smaller head. But I prefer his. He says that he has never met anyone with a more bulbous cock than his, and I believe him.

I asked him if he ever got looks from people when he goes cycling in his lycra shorts. He said that he'd never thought about it, but yes, his shorts were rather revealing. When your helmet is that large it's difficult to hide it away.

He likes being circumcised because it's clean, looks good, feels much better than before, and because if he wasn't, then we wouldn't have a mutual DIY session. However, he does wonder what coming with a foreskin would have been like, as he never wanked before his circumcision operation.

On balance though, Mike prefers roundheads, that is, having sex with them, and actually being one himself.

Dr Roundhead

[This article was accompanied by a couple of drawings which, unfortunately, we were unable to reproduce.

They showed the glans to be 8cm from tip to corona on the top; and 10cm diameter at the corona. The shaft being 12cm long with the circumcision line at the coronal sulcus. — D.A.]

Best Friend Revelations

What more sexually exciting could happen than a gay boy's straight best friend asking him when he got his cock cut. Well, that happened to me at the end of 1995. My friend Sam, who I'd known for six years, asks me, at this friend's party, where I got my circumcision performed and how much it cost. Sam has a large helmet and very tight orifice to his foreskin. He can't retract the foreskin at all when erect.

His younger brother also has the same problem apparently, and Sam has given him the information I gave him. Sam has reluctantly decided that there is nothing else for it but to be circumcised. He's not quite sure what style to have though, having a large chunky knob. I think that a tight cut just behind his corona would suit him, as this would ensure a tight and hard erection. His cock is much larger erect than flaccid, just like mine, and I told him about the appearance of many folds of redundant skin when soft if the circumciser isn't brave enough to take the correct amount off.

Well, this conversation with me really ended my 1995 well, and he might even need me to drive him to the clinic and home again after the operation, because he doesn't want his family to know until it's healed. It looks like I am giving him an exposed knob for his birthday. I said I'd pay if he gets it done by the same doctor that circumcised me.

Adult Circumcision Video

The video of a young adult member being circumcised, of which some members saw a preview at the Autumn gathering, is now completed. It shows the state of the penis immediately before the circumcision; the whole of the circumcision operation and various stages of the healing during the first month after the operation.

This unique video is currently available only in UK PAL format – a US NTSC version is planned for later. To order your copy please send a cheque or postal order for £15 to Vernon Quaintance, c/o the Acorn PO Box. The price includes the tape, postage and packing to any UK or EU destination.

Illustrations Welcome

Illustrations for articles are welcome, but to enable us to reproduce them decently please put them on one side only of a separate sheet of plain white paper and do them in black and white only. Annotations, such as dimensions, should be put onto a photocopy or tracing of your drawing. We will then typeset the information onto the illustration. — Vernon & David

Editorial

Since coming back from the AGM and meeting at Croydon I've been lying flat on my back, unable to sit in a chair, walk or stand, with a trapped nerve in the lumbar area. It's been either too painful to move or too drowsy when painkillers take effect. So nothing has got done. I've managed to send out information to a few enquiries for membership and that's all. The last month has seemed like a year.

Anyway, I'm writing this in longland and the two others on the editorial team are stepping in to see if we can get an edition off.

The meeting at Croydon was, as usual, very enjoyable, meeting all the familiar faces again. Unfortunately there was only one member there who hadn't attended before, and he came from France. Another newcomer came to join. The pleasant thing I find at the meetings is that once everyone starts to talk about their favourite appendage, they can't stop. I suppose it's a relief to be able to talk to someone about it at all.

A couple of points here. We have had problems in contacting Dean, the treasurer, and we hope that nothing has happened to him. To safeguard things, I have retained all the membership cheques until we know more, so if you notice that they haven't come through on your bank statement, don't worry.

The other is that there are always a lot of letters for me to send on to other members who have contributed to the newsletter. I would ask that all of these should be open letters and published for all, which is what we're all about, unless of course they are for private reasons like meeting up.

Finally, please note that the postcode for our PO Box has changed – The new one is quoted in the Contents panel on page 1.

Penis Preferences

I feel I must comment on the T.V. programme It's A Boy. This was a very one-sided point of view, I think all the patients that took part must have been anti-circumcision. One wonders why they had their babies circumcised in the first place, could it be that they wanted to see what it was like before being circumcised themselves.

People seem to have developed a phobia against circumcision in this country, No man should deny himself or his sons the ultimate pleasure and cleanliness or the sense of well-being that circumcision bestows, I'm sure the trend would reverse if people were much better informed of the results and the benefits.

I myself put up with a long dangling foreskin for too long, I was circumcised at the age of 59 and have enjoyed every minute of the result since. The only part of this programme that was any good was the fact that Dr. Sifman and his colleagues were right, I saw him myself once and he certainly knew what he was talking about.

I watched my own circumcision being done, and the relief that I got was really great when I saw that foreskin being cut off and put on the table at the side of the operating table, was I glad to be rid of it?

I am also a smoothie; being circumcised and hairless really gives the feeling of being completely clean and really naked when I go to the various Naturist Clubs, and I feel very pleased that I have been sensible enough to be circumcised.

I think it is now time to have a programme on Adult circumcision and listen to the people that are in favour of it, male and female, because it affects both sexes, or if not perhaps we could have a Video made up showing close ups of adult circumcisions and the benefits of it, also pictures of men with long and tight foreskins and showing the problems which arise with them. I am always ready to show people the result of my circumcision, either in the flesh or one of the many photographs that I could send them, I will do anything to convince people, as I think that it is a very worthwhile operation, I certainly have benefited from it in many ways. If anyone would like to contact me please do so through Acorn and I will reply by return.

Di's Attitude

After all the merciless attention of the national press covering the life and loves of Princess Diana, a short human interest comment with a special slant to interest Acorn readers should not come amiss.

Fact: Princess Diana is very strongly anti-circumcision, as evidenced by the authoritative reports that she resisted the long-term royal tradition for circumcising all royal males, which goes back to some time during Queen Victoria's reign. As a result, her two sons' foreskins were spared, and when Prince William ascends the throne he will be the first British king with a foreskin since George IV.

Fact: Prince Charles most definitely was circumcised and, since Princess Di is widely reputed to have entered matrimony in a virginal state, she will have experienced sex only with a circumcised man, at least before her marriage finally broke down.

Surmise: Since her dislike of circumcision is so intense as to make her flout the very powerful influences of the royal establishment, she can only have deplored her husband's altered state: enough perhaps to add fuel to her marital discontent? (And incidentally causing the establishment's implacable dislike of her). It is therefore reasonable to assume that, in seeking love, she would be only too happy to find that the object of her intentions has a foreskin. How successful in this search is she likely to have been?

So far, there are only two men who are reliably reported to have enjoyed the Princess's favours, and both were army officers. The first was a cavalry officer and, although born in the sixties, may well have been subjected to the residual upper class tendency to circumcise, but with a likelihood of 50/50.

The other army officer is another matter entirely, being a man of the people from a service corps background, which would be carefully avoided by the upper crust. He was born in 1967, and his parents are most unlikely to have had the opportunity, or desire, to have him circumcised. So the chances are that the Princess is able to make an objective comparison between the two states. Wouldn't it be great if we could get her to report to Acorn, though?

One last point. How likely is it that Prince Phillip is circumcised? Greek parentage, born outside the UK. Think about it!

M.D.

One Good Turn

I've known my friend Jan for years, so when she asked me to look after her husband Simon while she went off to a meeting I was only too happy to oblige. The poor guy was convalescing in bed after severe scalds to his hands and was swathed up to his elbows in cumbersome burn dressings. He was also severely depressed and in a certain amount of pain.

So I made him a cup of tea and we spent the morning chatting and watching the box. During the afternoon he cheered up a bit but started fidgeting as though uncomfortable, and I finally asked him what was wrong. He said he was busting for a wee and asked if I could help him down to the loo. I noticed a bottle next to his bed and suggested he use that. He looked embarrassed and said he couldn't manage with his hands bandaged. I told him not to be silly: I'd been married five years and nothing he had could come as a surprise to me.

I couldn't have been more wrong. Having confidently overridden his objections and pulled down his bedclothes, I was amazed – and curious – to see the biggest, fattest penis I had ever seen poking through the slit in his pyjamas. Amazed because of its size, but curious too because, unlike my husband who was circumcised, he was equipped with an impressively long foreskin with a protruding underlip at the opening at its tip. I couldn't help it, I just stood and stared at this fine fat cylinder of swelling flesh, and while I watched, it reached further and further down his leg as it lengthened.

But then, recalling the job in hand, so to speak, I hastily grabbed the bottle and stuffed his stiffening penis into the neck, unable to think of anything suitable to say. Unfortunately, I hadn't reckoned on how rigid his enormous erection could be, so I was absolutely gobsmacked when I saw the bottle, admittedly made of plastic, rise up from between his thighs and wobble about ridiculously over his erection. I couldn't help it, I sat there killing myself with laughter while he stared at me reproachfully with a red face. I managed to collect myself and asked him what he was waiting for, whereupon he told me that he couldn't pass a drop while erect. He also said he was now fairly desperate. I didn't know what to do. I couldn't just cover him up again with that great bottle wagging about on his willy, and it wouldn't subside while it was in my full view.

As I stood there choking back the giggles, I gradually came to the realisation that the only way to make his cock relax enough to let him relieve his desperate need was to give him a quick come. I felt awful about doing such a thing to my best friend's husband, but what else could I do? I was also feeling quite a thrill of excitement at the sight of such a big sexy penis, and the prospect of handling it turned me on even more.

I pulled the bottle off with a plop and, warning him not to breathe a word to Jan, seized his big willy in my hand and started wanking the loose cover of skin backwards and forwards over his knob, marvelling at the abundance of it in comparison with my husband's taut and skinless penis.

He watched pop-eyed as I milked away at it, occasionally pulling the skin right down to reveal the shiny purple policeman's helmet, until eventually he came with a roar of achievement, spurting his essence clear across the room.

Minutes later, his willy subsided to its original size, and I once again threaded it into the neck of the bottle. Soon after, he managed a quick spurt of pee, but what I hadn't realised was that his inch and a half of foreskin had got folded up and was trapped by the bottle neck facing the wrong way. Consequently, his urine built up inside his foreskin until the pressure overcame the resistance – it emerged straight back out of the bottle and wet his stomach and thighs. What a cock-up! Frantically I whipped the bottle off, and as I laid his foreskin straight in the neck, he cut loose with a powerful jet, nearly filling the bottle.

I had to dry Simon's pyjamas, which were soaked, and when Jan returned, I thought I'd better explain how they got wet, but without mentioning how I'd dealt with his erection. She merely laughed and said his foreskin was a bit long – perhaps she would have to fix up for him to be circumcised. "No fear!", he said vehemently. "Only joking", she laughed, and patted his penis affectionately.

P.S. A bloke at work who I am friendly with, gets Acorn – I think it's great.

Circumcision Relief

From UPI Health Notes

Circumcision doesn't have to hurt. An anesthetic nerve block of the dorsal penile nerve is a safe and effective way to alleviate a male infant's pain during circumcision according to Minnesota physicians. In a study of 1,022 infants circumcised using the nerve block only twelve had complications: eleven had small bruises and one patient bled at the injection site. This study should assuage the 1989 concerns of the American Academy of Pediatrics, which acknowledged that the nerve block could alleviate pain but questioned its safety.

Re: Observations by Anon

I am not so sure that I agree with Anon's thoughts (1/96) that the five-inchers and less may be 'the non-randy types who are unconcerned about sex'. I'm not over-endowed myself and I have always expressed a very strong sexual preference for small cocked guys. I've believed this to be mainly a personal matter based on the fact that I feel less intimidated when faced, often at eye-level, depending on the activity involved, with a small, rather than a monster, dick.

I'm beginning to wonder, though, whether my preference may be because the smaller guys are actually more randy, rather than less so, due to their determination to prove that size really doesn't matter, and they can put up a performance which equals, or even exceeds, that of the big boys. Of course, by choice, I have more small partners than big ones, so I can't make a fully critical comparison. However, I am sure that in the sauna I go to, the smaller guys are a pretty horny lot!...and there are plenty of them.

My Circumcision — 1 Year On

My circumcision a year ago was the subject of an article in Acorn 5/95. That article was written just over a month after the operation and so I thought readers might be interested in an update now that a whole year has passed.

When I went back to work one week after the operation I had slight discomfort, having been resting for the previous week. However I was nearly healed by the end of that week and the discomfort just faded away.

The scar line is about  $\frac{1}{4}$  way back down the shaft from the glans, leaving the maximum amount of inner skin and taking off the maximum amount of outer skin. It is comfortably tight when erect but still fairly loose whilst flaccid.

My glans is fairly sensitive so it does not take long for an ejaculation to happen, whereas it took longer before I was circumcised.

When I look back at being circumcised I am glad that I was done, especially since I work in a hot environment and the weather last summer was exceptionally hot. I found it much more comfortable without my foreskin than other summers with it.

The video which we made of the operation is now available (see advert in Acorn 2/96). I am sorry that it took so long to be edited due to a combination of personal circumstances for each of us involved.

K.H. – London

An Unnatural Drawback — And Some Questions

You are right, David. The foreskin should be left well alone until the boy is 4-5 years old as its development continues after birth in most cases, not being readily retractable for several years. I was told that my mother had struggled unceasingly to retract my foreskin from birth onwards. Though my penis bled, that did not ease her fervour at bath time. “It had to be kept clean”, she insisted, a chronic smegmaphobe.

Preputial retraction is only 4% in newborns, rising to about 20% at six months. Even by a year or two old, only half the foreskins are retractable, and some not fully so. A good 20% remain tight or unretractable into late infancy and early childhood.

The fanatical seeking out of smegma in intimate, tiny folds seems futile before 5-6 years of age. Perhaps that maternal abuse is psychological relief from the possible harmful effect of smegma on the cervix ... a kind of generation gap revenge on the male! Smegma was found in a Danish survey to be present in only 1% of 6-9 year olds, rising to 2% at 10-11, 6% at 12-13 and 8% with 14-17 year olds. Even 92% of adolescents were found smegma free when examined.

If any glans should be scarred, mine should. Closely examined the dorsal aspect is uniformly striated when flaccid, this lessening on the frenal aspect to silky smooth where the frenulum was once situated. From what I can remember my glans surface looked no different from so many others paraded in stumpy nakedness during school showers. The real variation lay in the circumcision scars themselves, from pre clamp and Plastibell freehand surgery!

The blunt probe used before circumcision (and to facilitate retraction) when carefully applied eases the layers apart without inflicting injury to the glans. Without full retraction after a dorsal slit of about 1cm, neat modern methods of circumcision would not be possible using clamps or bells. That way those requiring circumcision would be ‘beautifully circumcised’ rather than hacked about. As Shakespeare put it: “There’s a divinity that shapes our ends, rough hew them how we may.”

Whilst writing the above, I have been doing some further thinking. I have always wondered what it feels like to possess and handle a complete penis, especially when urinating, retracting or masturbating. In common with roundheads shorn early in life, and having never consciously experienced a preputial presence, I seek answers from those permitted to retain their foreskin.

1. Are involuntary sliding movements of foreskin both to and fro pleasurable, even to the point of distraction?
2. What does it feel like to manually retract a foreskin? Is the feeling more intense when done by another?

3. How does the exposed glans react to exposure to our movement, handling, washing and showering?
4. During urinating is the preputial sac and glans stimulated by the warmth and flow? How does it feel?
5. Is the inner surface of the foreskin more sensitive than the outside, and does the sensitivity vary in places?
6. Is the moist inner surface of the foreskin as sensitive as the moist surface of the glans, excepting the frenal area?
7. Is masturbation more foreskin or glans orientated?

Would anyone wish to sacrifice the answers to the seven questions for a dry, relatively insensitive glans and prominent scar. Answers to me c/o Acorn or for publication as I'm sure some roundheads would like to know what they're missing. Perhaps there's an eighth question. 'What are the disadvantages of having a foreskin?' (from a possessor's point of view.)

Anthony – North Devon

Re: Questions — 2/96

In reply to CW – Wales's letter about ejaculation, the usual volume of ejaculate is 3 - 5ml. This normally contains anywhere between 150 million and 300 million sperm cells. Even this vast number occupy only about 5% of the total amount of fluid. The rest is made up mainly by the liquid produced by the prostate gland with perhaps 5% or less being made by the so-called Cowpers Glands in the urethra.

The amount of spunk produced will increase only very slightly after a period of abstinence but can fall off dramatically if a second (and any subsequent) orgasm is induced within a short time of the first. The phrase 'short time' in this context can vary from person to person and even in the same person from day to day. Sometimes recovery between one orgasm and the next can be as quick as 15 - 20 minutes though, especially in older people, it can be 15 - 20 hours or even longer.

Some men produce considerably more than the average amount of semen. I have seen as much as 15ml at a single ejaculation and the massage afforded to the prostate gland during anal fingering or fucking can increase this still further. On the other hand the volume tends to decline as age advances. Usually a prostate operation dramatically reduces the amount of semen but this may be less marked nowadays because often it is only necessary to partially remove the gland using an instrument passed along the penis. Vasectomy does not visibly affect the amount of spunk produced.

Impotence (the inability to get an erection) doesn't necessarily prevent either orgasm or ejaculation but the 'squirting force' is reduced in such circumstances. The power behind the squirt and the number of squirts per orgasm depend upon the strength of the muscles of ejaculation and can vary considerably from individual to individual though I doubt that anyone has precise percentage figures in direct response to your original questioner. As with volume, age also affects the squirting force. As a youngster I could lie on my back in bed and easily hit the bedhead behind me. Nowadays, at 63, I'm lucky if I reach my nipples.

And finally, a very personal question of my own. I am a sexual 'oralist' and am not averse to swallowing my own semen. I know this practice is not all that uncommon but I should be interested to learn of the experience of others in this respect. The more outspoken may have their own tales to tell on the subject but it would make an interesting count if all members were prepared to send an anonymous slip of paper saying simply 'Yes' or 'No' with regard to their own indulgence to David Acorn at the usual address.

Circumcision Made Easy

Malaysian Product Promises Easier Circumcision

The Tara KLamp, invented by Malaysian doctor Gurcharan Singh, uses a bloodless and less painful 'clamp and cut' technique that allows the patient to go back to work or school after surgery, if he so desires.

He can wear the device under his pants if he wishes, for up to four days, and due to the KLamp's 'total occlusion' technique, the patient is also not restricted from bathing or any other activities – well, most other – since the wound is blocked out from the environment.

For doctors, the Tara KLamp promises a faster turnaround time and, say its distributors, prevents cross-infection.

"The main advantage is that patients now don't have to wait for the long holidays to get circumcised – they only need a long weekend," said Erwin Soo, senior manager (wholesale division) of Apex Pharmacy International Pte Ltd, which is marketing the KLamp in Singapore.

Dr Singh, in his early 40s, left his practice a few years ago to start his own company called Taramedic, which develops medical products.

The idea for the KLamp was developed "a long time ago", said Mr Soo, but the product only hit the market after it won the bronze award at Mindex, Malaysia's annual medical products exhibition earlier this year.

The Tara KLamp, which has been fully approved in Malaysia, is now used in hospitals and private clinics. Sales in Malaysia have since crossed 1,000 units and the aim in Singapore, for a start, is to achieve a penetration of 60 per cent of the 3,500 to 5,000 circumcisions performed among the Muslim community each year.

The Tara KLamp comes in a pre-sterilised kit complete with the device and special surgical blade. Sizes range from 'infant' to 'adult', specifically. Each KLamp costs from $23 to $26, depending on the size.

Re: It's Never Too Late

I refer to my story published under my pseudonym 'J.C. – Ayrshire' on page 6 in Issue 2/96 and have been asked if I also penned 'Learning' by J.C. on Page 9.

This has possibly caused some confusion as the themes could be taken as contradictory. If this generates any correspondence, perhaps you could mention in the next issue that there are two J.C.'s.

J.C. – Ayrshire

The Plastibell Technique

Just so that all, who are unaware of just how a circ is done using the Plastibell, have the facts, I post the instructions below: in broad terms those for the Gomco clamp are the same except that in step 8 the clamp is applied rather than a ligature. It is not a 'minor snip'; see notes at end.

1. Stretch the preputial opening.
2. Break preputial adhesions* with a probe or closed forceps.
3. Make a small dorsal slit of 0.5 to 1.0 cm in the prepuce. Keep the initial slit short; it can always be extended. To minimize bleeding crush the line of incision with artery forceps for one minute. Take particular care not to place forceps or scissors in the urethral meatus. Before cutting or crushing, lift the prepuce from the glans and visualize the meatus.
4. Separate the ends of the slit with a pair of artery forceps to reveal the glans. if necessary, extend the cut to expose the coronal sulcus.
5. Free any remaining adhesions* and lay the prepuce back (inside out) to expose the entire glans.

6. Slip the Plastibell of appropriate size over the glans as far as the coronal sulcus. It should fit over the glans easily; too small a bell may injure the glans.
7. Place the prepuce over the bell to hold it in place.
8. Tie the ligature as firmly as possible around the prepuce on the ridge of the bell; oozing will occur if the ligature is loose.
9. After one or two minutes to allow for crush, trim off the prepuce at the distal edge of the ligature using a knife or scissors. Trim as much tissue as possible to reduce the amount of necrotic tissue and the possibility of infection.
10. Snap off the handle of the bell, leaving the bell and ligature in place. You should be able to see an unobstructed urethral meatus.
11. No dressing is necessary; the baby may be bathed normally; the rim of tissue will become necrotic (dead) and separate with the bell in 5 to 10 days.
12. Occasionally, oedema will trap the plastic ring on the shaft of the penis. In this case it's usually necessary to cut off the ring, using a guide and ring cutter, although application of ice will sometime reduce oedema enough to remove the ring.

Author's Notes: * This is a misnomer for the synchechial membrane which bonds the inner surface of the neonate foreskin to the underlying glans penis and which is normal and natural in newborns.

Note: Circumcision is almost always performed without anesthesia. Steps 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 8, and 9 would be intensely painful. Neonates have fully functioning pain pathways. Circumcision causes severe and persistent pain.

More Words

I've smiled to see one or two correspondents have taken the word I coined earlier: 'circumcisee' into their terms of reference to describe a snipcock.

Although a roundhead, I do have a small amount of pliable skin left. However, there is absolutely nothing 'fore' about it, because it is very permanently back behind the corona, which represents its unscalable northern boundary.

How about the word 'aftskin' for this?

A Muslim's Response

Now, I would like to take issue with Horace Mann of I.M.A.C. Press on two points that he made in his letter in Acorn 1/96. The first one is he says that 70% of all circumcised males in the world are Muslims, that isn't at all true, there are 1.2 billion Muslims in the world today of which roughly half (600,000,000) are male, and around 90% to 95% of them are circumcised that is 540,000,000 to 570,000,000. The male population of the USA is around 120,000,000 of which roughly 70% that is 84,000,000 are circumcised. Mr Mann is, I think, forgetting about the Ethiopians who are Coptic Christians and are circumcised, then there are the very large number of African tribes who still practice circumcision, and even the tribespeople who live in the cities practice, their numbers are in the millions, and of course you have the 16,000,000 Jews in the world; 8,000,000 are males and all from the age of 8 days upwards are circumcised, so I cannot possibly see that 70% of all circumcised males in the world today are Muslim, of which I am one.

The second point I'd like to take issue with is to inform Mr Mann that circumcision is very much a religious requirement and if he had some knowledge of the Sunnah, he wouldn't have made that statement. The part of the Sunnah that covers circumcision is called Fiqh and Fiqh covers a very wide area within Islam other than circumcision and I'd also like to inform Mr Mann that circumcision can be carried out at any age and not between the ages of 2 and 17. I have never heard of Muslim boys aged 17 being circumcised, except perhaps amongst certain Marsh Arab tribes in Southern Iraq. Islam also recognises female circumcision and according to the Sunnah, only the clitoral foreskin should be circumcised, but unfortunately in Sudan and Somalia they go much further; they cut away the entire clitoris, labia majora and labia minora, leaving absolutely nothing and many girls have died in dreadful pain and in extreme agony – the removal of everything is more to do with African culture and not Islam. It is also a Basic Human Right to practice Religious rites and uphold circumcision which is a part of Islam and Judaism and not forgetting the Coptic Christians and Tribal peoples wherever they live. You are not the only one Mr Mann that totally supports Basic Human Rights, we the circumcised feel it is also our right as well to circumcise be they Muslim, Jew, Coptic, Tribal or whatever, in a nutshell, Live and Let Live.

You will be pleased to know Mr Mann that my youngest brother and his wife live in the USA, Illinois to be exact, and they have two sons both born there and my two nephews are intact. Their ages are 13 and 11 this year (1966) but they aren't Muslims though, their religion is Roman Catholic as I was before I became a Muslim in 1965, at the age of 18, when I embraced Islam in Glasgow (Scotland) the city of my birth. Furthermore I was circumcised in 1948 aged 1 year on medical grounds and on medical grounds circumcision is still required, and medical grounds for circumcision is also a Basic Human Right. I have another two nephews, again on my side of the family, and they are also intact, their ages this year will be 26 and 24, plus another 2 on my wife's side of the family (aged 18 and 17) again intact, so if any one or more of the six wish to be circumcised all I have to say to Mr Mann is it is their Basic Human Right, I rest my case in favour of circumcision and long may it live. After having said all that, personally it doesn't matter to me one way or another if another male is circumcised or not except if he is a convert to Islam then I expect him to get circumcised as soon as possible and live according to the Sunnah of which, as I said earlier, circumcision is a part.

I wish I.M.A.C. all the best, but I would like to say one more thing if I may to I.M.A.C. that is to Live and Let Live and respect and recognise that if someone wishes to be circumcised then it is his Basic Human Right; and to seek more knowledge on the religious reasons that support, back and practice circumcision, and with knowledge comes understanding and above all tolerance.

God Bless.

Circumcise Adopted Son?

Question: My wife and I have a son, 5, who was circumcised at birth. We've recently adopted another boy, who is 4, who is not circumcised. Should we have this boy circumcised to be like his brother, or should we just let it be? My wife and I feel strongly that we should have him circumcised, but we'd like another opinion.

Answer: We referred your question to Consulting Editor child psychiatrist Leslie S. Linet, M.D. who has a clinical practice in Brooklyn, N.Y. Dr. Linet responds as follows:

I'd suggest you have a frank talk with your adopted son, and be guided by his wishes in this matter.

I assume that if your son is circumcised, you are circumcised as well, and I appreciate your empathy with the adopted son who you think might feel uneasy about the difference between himself and his new brother and father.

He May Feel Rejected

But your deciding for him that he should be circumcised is very paternalistic. If you impose this surgery on him without his consent, he may feel it as rejection and punishment. His position in your family is not firmly established, and he's apt to misinterpret your concern for his feelings.

Find out if your adopted son actually wants to be like his brother and father in this respect. Have an honest discussion in which you explain to him exactly what the surgery entails. Give him ample opportunity to ask questions.

Have Several Discussions

Don't rush this decision – there's no urgency about it.

Have several discussions about circumcision. This allows you to double-check that the child understands as fully as possible. Surgery to the penis, especially for a young child, can be very threatening. You may find that he has all kinds of fears and fantasies about it.

I'd recommend that you have a pediatrician talk to the child to make sure he understands what circumcision entails. The pediatrician might also be able to ascertain whether the child really wants the procedure, or is simply going along with it in order to please you, and actually has great anxiety about it.

Misery

I estimate that I have lost 25 sq. ins. of skin from my adult size penis and, following a recent operation in an attempt to repair the hamfisted result of my original circumcision, I retain approximately 10% of my frenulum, and the sensory nerves on the underside of my penis have gone also.

I need constant stimulation to retain an erection as the skin is distributed in such a way that the messages I receive from my penis are such that it feels flaccid except when I can see it and match the sensation to the reality. It feels as though the glans is at rightangles to the shaft, and the underside hardly exists. My scrotum hangs from halfway down the shaft except when tight from stimulation when my testicles are forced inside me by the contracting skin, and the remaining shaft skin is pulled very tight.

I only experience pleasure with lots of lubricant, oil or vaseline. KY dries very quickly, and is often painful as a result. Even with the right level of lubricant the progress to orgasm involves a complicated system of squeezing and manipulation of the skin, so that I have to teach my sexual partner (if I can summon up the courage, as I find it very embarrassing) that simple up and down stroking can make me lose my erection, as it is so unstimulating. Men with foreskins or more simple circumcisions lose patience.

I have always felt uglified and consequently unattractive. Afraid of intimacy because of the difficulty of my penile response and appearance. Intercourse involves painful friction if it is prolonged, even with lubrication, as the shaft skin is effectively moving sideways rather than up and down, which it is not designed for.

I was the only guy in my class at school who was circumcised. I used to look with longing and envy at boys who had proper penises – beautiful, natural, and with unimaginable sensations that I will never ever experience – even properly circumcised ones.

Mum and Dad agreed to this. I realised when I was five that they had sanctioned the operation and I was unable to trust them ever after. I rage internally at least once an hour every day of my waking life and sometimes consider suicide to combat the constant agony of how things might have been and how things actually are.

I try very hard to love what I have left, but I'm aware that I avoid intimacy with others, and am furious that what should represent and be the most intimate aspect of my maleness should have been devastated and ravaged without my permission, which I would never have given and would have killed to avoid, as it was completely unnecessary. (Masturbation is tricky as pleasure can quickly change to anger.)

Only tightly circumcised guys know what to do with my penis and I resent this – I am fearful and feel less sexual than men with foreskins, even if they are skinny or small, as they at least have their foreskins. Even most wheelchair-bound invalids have their complete penises – I don't and never will have.

The thing that makes me male and which motivates my life is ugly and malfunctioning, and so easily undermines my confidence at every turn. I even have scars and desensitised areas on my glans.

I am fascinated by pornography and spend hours scrutinising American magazines looking for guys who have less skin than me. They are few and far between, and I get strangely turned on by circumcised men. I get very jealous and feel inadequate if they have generous amounts of skin left.

I love to play with foreskinned guys and am astounded by how much skin there is on an untouched penis – and I love to trace the veins. At the same time I am slightly contemptuous of the way uncut guys come so easily. They seem so matter-of-fact about it too and are strangely unadventurous about masturbation techniques. This is probably enough for now – so many contradictions.

Wishes For A Speedy Recovery

I'm sure that all readers will wish to join Brian and myself in wishing David a speedy recovery from his back problems.

We are happy to have been able to step in and put this issue together for you, but please excuse any lack of balance in these difficult circumstances.

Circumcision: What Do Women Prefer?

Question: I'm a 20-year-old circumcised male. I know there's some controversy about circumcision, but I don't want to get into that. I just want to know whether most women prefer circumcised (I hope) or uncircumcised penises.

Answer: You're lucky. Research suggests that most women prefer circumcised penises.

So concluded researchers at the University of Iowa after surveying 269 women who had recently delivered healthy boys. Fully 89% of the infants were circumcised. Previous studies have shown that mothers more than fathers usually determine whether or not to have their sons circumcised.

The researchers found that mothers are likely to have their sons circumcised because they prefer their own sex partners to have a circumcised penis.

Says primary author and principal investigator Associate Professor Marvel Williamson of the University of Iowa College of Nursing: "Female cultural preferences for penile circumcision in sexual partners widely influence American mothers' decisions on infant male circumcision."

Preferred For Sexual Activity

The researchers believe that their study "clearly supports the hypothesis that American women prefer circumcision for sexual reasons."

"Visual appeal and sexual hygiene were predominant reasons for favoring circumcised partners," says Williamson, "but tactile, naturalness, and other sense-related factors were reasons for the women's attitudes."

The researchers found that:

Between 71% and 83% of the women in the study prefer a circumcised penis for various sexual activities. Even among women who had sexual experience only with uncircumcised partners, only half preferred uncircumcised penises.

71% prefer a circumcised penis for sexual intercourse.

76% find the visual appearance of a circumcised penis more appealing.

75% prefer to manually stimulate a circumcised penis.

83% prefer a penis to be circumcised for fellatio.

92% believe a circumcised penis stays cleaner.

90% say a circumcised penis looks sexier.

85% say a circumcised penis feels nicer to the touch.

77% say a penis looks more natural when it is circumcised.

55% say a circumcised penis smells more pleasant.

Editorial

I'm thankful to say that at last I'm away from the horizontal position and can sit, walk and stand again. I have to say thank you to all the members who sent me their commiserations and good wishes. You're really a good bunch. It's a pleasure to sit down in front of the computer and get to work on another Acorn.

I get asked by so many new members about the starting of Acorn, so I'll have a shot at it.

An offshoot of Forum magazine was, and still is, a sexual contact system called The Forum Society, headquarters in Cardiff. As well as singles and couples advertising, there are also groups with specialist interests. A man, I believe he came from Essex, advertised to start a group interested in circumcision. Before he could get it off the ground he found for some reason that he couldn't carry on. So Tony, from Lancashire, who is now our President, decided he could take it on. Those of us who joined from the outset can tell you that the first edition of the newsletter was virtually a leaflet. We grew from there, but as we grew it was obvious that members couldn't write in to

Please send all correspondence to:-

THE ACORN SOCIETY
PO BOX 113
WESTON-SUPER-MARE
SOMERSET, BS23 1DJ

Letters for forwarding should be marked in pencil with the recipient's identifier. They should be stamped 1st class and be enclosed in an envelope addressed as above.

Cardiff and then have their letters sent on again, envelope out of envelope, paying double postage. So we took out the P.O. Box of our own here in Weston. He never said anything but it was obvious that, as numbers grew, Tony was struggling to do it all himself. Then his job took him to Norway, so Brian and I volunteered to take it over, me doing the editing and he doing the distribution. Then, Vernon, who is a computer wizard, volunteered to put the magazine into the snappy format it is today, with a little help from Mr Graphic Designer. There are about six of the founder members still in. And there you have it.

Early Days

I would like to start by saying how much I've enjoyed reading the newsletter. There are many points I would like to raise or comment on, but perhaps it would be appropriate as a new member to start by telling of how my early interest first developed.

Even as a very young boy I can remember being fascinated by my friends' penises, believing initially that everyone was either born with or without a foreskin (I believe on rare occasions, cases have been recorded where boys have been born without a foreskin – perhaps some readers may know about this). All war games that we engaged in inevitably ended with my friends being 'shot' in the penis, requiring a thorough examination and, as the majority were uncircumcised, retracting their foreskins for a detailed inspection. We also indulged in regular mutual masturbation sessions. I was sent away to boarding school at 8 years of age, which provided me with ample opportunity to pursue my fascination with penises. My particular favourite pastime was trying to guess who were cavaliers and who were roundheads, and then engineering an opportunity to discover whether I was correct or not. Furthermore, if they were uncircumcised, was any part of their glans penis exposed? We were provided with a list of all boys in the school each term and, by using my own code, I recorded against each name what kind of cock they had and, if uncircumcised, whether or not I had managed to glimpse part or all of their cock head. There were a number of occasions when boys left at the end of one term as cavaliers and re-appeared the next as roundheads. This would lead to discreet inquiries on my part to ascertain the reason for their circumcision.

We had a pair of Arab brothers in my boarding house, and I was amazed to discover that they had both been partially circumcised with approximately half of the glans exposed. On reaching puberty, the natural growth of their penises was such that the remaining foreskin no longer covered any part of the glans, and they thus acquired the usual circumcision appearance. I wonder if anyone knows whether this type of partial circumcision is commonplace in the Arab world (or in any other societies for that matter).

Do any other members know anything about a phenomenon I have seen described as 'Auto-Circumcision'? This apparently describes the situation where a person is born with a short foreskin which, on reaching puberty, retracts fully, thereby effecting an automatic circumcision. I read somewhere that Masters and Johnson conducted a survey, one finding of which showed that, amongst 21 year-old uncircumcised males, approximately 10% possessed foreskins which no longer covered any part of their glans. Evidently, by 70 years of age, this incidence had increased to 33%. Perhaps other members have access to more detail on this subject.

As a regular sports player over many years, I have often showered with numerous other men, and was interested by the observations of 'Anon' in 1/96. I keep my foreskin retracted most of the time and always whilst showering, ensuring that I expose the shaft behind the head, when washing, to ensure absolute cleanliness. It amazes me, however, how many uncircumcised men do not retract their foreskins at all when showering, and often those who do, do so in a rather furtive or secretive manner which, it seems to me, tends to draw attention to what they are trying to do. I have yet to see a fully exposed glans which was not an object to be admired. I am certainly proud of mine and believe it is not something to be hidden away, but to be enjoyed. There have been occasions when I have entered a shower or sauna with my foreskin forward, given those present time to register the fact that I am uncircumcised, slipped my foreskin back unobtrusively, and turned back to general gaze. Doing this has produced some most enjoyable reactions from others, and I have also found that it has often acted as an encouragement to others to follow suit and pull their own foreskins back.

I am sure that some members would say, "Why not be circumcised, and then your glans will be exposed continually?" I have given the matter serious consideration but have decided, on balance, that I would rather remain in possession of my foreskin. I derive great enjoyment in pulling back my foreskin, to show anyone who is interested, the size, shape, and colour of the glans; particularly if their appetite has been whetted by a general impression, first, of what its appearance is likely to be, having seen it covered by my foreskin initially. I also get great pleasure from seeing others pull their foreskins back in similar circumstances.

I would certainly be quite happy if I were circumcised. I believe there is no finer sight than that of a proud glans penis exposed in all its glory! Indeed, there have been a number of occasions when people, on seeing my penis for the first time, have been fooled into thinking that I had been circumcised, and were only convinced otherwise when I allowed them to push my foreskin forward.

I think you can gather from this brief essay, how much pleasure I get from being able to use these variations that having a foreskin allows me.

The Cure

Having just joined Acorn and reading the back issue of 1995 with interest, I find it an excellent magazine. I'm sure I will learn a lot from it.

My first recollection of anything about my own penis was at school, being examined by a lady doctor. After dropping my pants, she pulled my foreskin back. This made me shout as it had not been done before. I remember she said something like "Oh, boys!" Later of course I found there was a lot of pleasure to be had from sliding the skin up and down.

In my twenties, I started to have soreness behind the foreskin which got worse as time went on. I had a lady friend for about ten years, but after sex my penis was very sore and the frenulum had torn. I bathed it every day and eventually visited the doctor, which was a little embarrassing, and he gave me some tablets. By now the foreskin was very tight and pulled back behind the glans, so, at the age of 45 I considered circumcision. I'd seen an ad by a London clinic. Going to the appointment I was very nervous. The doctor asked me why I wanted the operation and told me how it would be after a few weeks later.

After healing, I was a little disappointed, the scar was not too neat, but everything worked well, the soreness had gone and the glans spread out more without the restriction.

In my case, circumcision cured my problem and I wished I'd had it done before.

Not So Happy

My marriage broke down 30 years ago when I was 50. I started to do my own thing, but my foreskin became tight. I needed to have it seen to but I was scared to see a doctor, but it got so bad that I had to go. The young doctor (RAF) who inspected me took one look and went redder than a beetroot. I still don't know why.

Anyway, I had the operation. The surgeon was very good and left me with as much skin as he could. Things then weren't too bad, but after 6 years I had a rough time as my urethra closed up. I was operated on to enlarge it, but at the same time they took the remains of my foreskin away as well.

Now it has never hardened off and when I get hot and sweaty it's very sore, so I have to be very careful and dress so that the knob doesn't rub on my clothing. I keep myself clean and wash every time I pass water, drying myself well. If I try to masturbate I have more soreness; creams and powder only a bit of a help.

I would be most grateful for any advice anyone can give me, please. I've suffered for so long.

A.S. – Hereford

I Love It This Way

I am a new Acorn member and have just worked my way through a dozen back issues. Apart from the obvious focus on circumcision, two other issues arising which caught my attention were depilation and nudity. Perhaps I can give some background. I am 46, athletic, average-to-well-endowed, and have been circumcised for 10 years. My wife is 38, tall, blonde, and immaculately shaven. We have been members of sun clubs for around 15 years.

My interest in male circumcision and female depilation was, I think, triggered in my mid twenties by a photo in Health and Efficiency. It showed an attractive couple emerging from the sea on a naturist beach. He was well-endowed, not aroused, but nevertheless strikingly circumcised with a large and prominently exposed glans. His partner was very attractive with her pubic area revealingly shaven. To me, the pose was a fascinating combination of naturalness combined with challenging sexual display.

It was as if the male were saying, "I know everyone's attention will be drawn to my glans and I enjoy showing it off. Providing I do so on a naturist beach, not erect, nobody can criticise me just because I happen to be circumcised." It was as if the female were saying, "I have made a deliberate decision to shave, knowing full well that it will invite attention. But nobody can prove this."

I never showed the photograph to my wife but I was able – after some difficulty – to persuade her to shave. For me it was a mega turn-on, and this in turn has made her happy to continue to do so ever since. She uses a hand razor, with plenty of foam, every three or four days to prevent (itchy) stubble.

A little later we got into naturism, firstly through 'free' beaches, and then through swimming sessions at municipal clubs before finally joining a series of sun clubs. We both enjoy sport, swimming and the open air, and I got (and continue to get) an immense kick out of watching her athletic, shaven figure on the tennis court, sunbathing, or in the pool. She is often asked to pose, and occasionally does so, for naturist publications – and more often for me.

At the same time, however, I was still fascinated by the idea of circumcision and wishing I could be in a naturist environment able to display a permanently exposed glans. I did not confide this to my wife.

About 10 years ago, however, I had two 6-week postings to Saudi Arabia on unaccompanied status. No alcohol, no sex, no nudity, not even cinemas. Ironically, however, I realised I was surrounded by millions of circumcised males! With time on my hands, and a night time imagination running riot, I began to make discreet inquiries. It seemed to me that the two most important considerations were, firstly, to avoid a general anaesthetic and, secondly, to find a surgeon who was really expert. Eventually, I came across a clinic which included circumcision in its specialities, including adult converts to Islam.

The surgeon was a Saudi, a practising Muslim, and a member of Saudi Arabia's dominant, and fundamentalist, Wahhabi sect. He had a London qualification and performed up to a dozen adult circumcisions a week, all under local anaesthetic. He impressed me at our first meeting and explained, with the aid of diagrams, that his standard technique involved radical removal of the foreskin and frenulum, to leave just enough loose skin to allow for erection.

I made a second appointment to see him, timed to coincide with my next visit to Saudi. In the meantime, I did not confide my intentions to my wife, but laid the ground by saying I had experienced some trouble with sand under my foreskin (though I was living in a modern, tarmacadamed city) and the hot climate. Whenever my resolution to go ahead wavered, I told myself, "The opportunity is too good to miss. You have the excuse, (sand and sun), an expert practitioner, and three or four weeks of no sex doesn't matter unaccompanied in Saudi." I will not describe the actual operation or its immediate after-effects because your readers will be familiar with them.

From the moment I left the clinic, however, I had the most fantastically exciting sensation of being permanently and irreversibly cut. This was followed by an agonising/ecstatic feeling as the stitches struggled to contain the morning erections.

When it had completely healed, in about four weeks, I was able to make a full assessment. When limp and cold, the whole of the glans is permanently exposed, with an almost imperceptible gathering of slack skin behind the glans. When I'm erect, I have a tingling, straining sensation with the penis bending upwards. There is very little free play, and for masturbation a lubricant such as vaseline is helpful. Sexual intercourse is simply fantastic!

When I returned to UK and my wife saw me for the first time she was at once horrified/astounded/sympathetic and fascinated. When we had intercourse for the first time we both found the combination of a taut, bent, bone dry penis entering a smoothly shaven, naturally lubricated vagina to be sensational. I'm sure that, in this context, the removal of the frenulum is a plus.

It still is, 10 years later. So is the pleasure of displaying an exposed glans with a shaven vagina on the beaches and in the sun clubs.

In the light of my own experience, I would offer several comments: Firstly, I have never regretted it. Secondly, I love the feeling of being permanently and conspicuously (in nature groups at least) marked. Thirdly, it is indisputably more hygienic. Fourthly, for me, it does make masturbation more difficult (is there some truth in the Victorian idea?), but it compensates by providing prolonged staying power in intercourse.

Finally, do any Acorn members share my fantasy of a nude swimming/sauna meeting, strictly limited to circumcised males? It would start with a line up/inspection to ensure that only cut members (i.e. no rolled back foreskins!) were present. There would be no sexual activity, but everyone would be free to stare and admire. Possibly a group photo? Only if participants were happy with this. I would welcome correspondence, either through Acorn's columns, or through its good offices.

J.F. – London

Answer to Anthony's Questions 3/96

First of all I should say that all foreskins aren't the same, and don't act the same. The perfect foreskin, by which I mean the centre point of all the varieties, could be described when flaccid, as not too loose and not too tight, is as long or slightly longer than the tip of the glans but doesn't close up at the end, so that peeing isn't interfered with. When erect it disappears completely, or nearly so, leaving a slack shaft skin, acting like a circumcised penis for intercourse but, with the harsher treatment of masturbation, can be brought back over the glans by pulling at the root.

There is a scale of difference, starting at one end where the foreskin is so short as to be indistinguishable from a circumcision, and at the other end where the foreskin is much longer than the tip of the glans, closes up to a bud at the end causing it to be tightish on retraction.

By far the majority of foreskins are as the perfect or slightly one side or the other of the perfect, doing the jobs I would think they were designed for: protecting the glans through the wear and tear of life, exposing the glans for intercourse, keeping the glans moist ready for intercourse, yet not getting in the way of peeing.

Now for the answers, although, as shown above, I can only answer for myself:

1. Any involuntary movement of the foreskin is very pleasurable, it doesn't happen often enough for me, and hardly ever to the point of distraction. Having a slightly loose foreskin the frenulum pulls it forward again in most cases. Of course, with tighter foreskins there is no involuntary movement at all, one of the differences mentioned.
2. Manually retracting the foreskin is the most delicious part of having a foreskin. From the glans being dry, it takes about half an hour for the foreskin to make it moist, and it is when it is moist that it is most delicious. The moistness creates a sort of drag as the foreskin is retracted and the drag is felt most as the inner foreskin tries to leave the rim of the glans. Doing this dries the glans quickly, so after about ten strokes the feeling is nowhere near as intense. Funnily enough, using another type of lubricant never seems the same, unless I've never found the one with the right viscosity. The second part of the question is answered by saying that I've never stopped anyone from doing it.

3. The newly exposed glans reacts marvellously to these actions most when they are of a different temperature to the glans. A draught of cold air – wonderful; a cold hand – smashing; washing with either hot or cold water – lovely; whereas a powerful showerhead at about 9 inches, hot or cold – heaven! The glans reacts for some reason by swelling!
4. I can't answer this one because only someone with a long closed foreskin knows, and they are few and far between. I expect that the next Questionnaire for a survey, which will be out very shortly, will show that most foreskinned men retract their foreskins to pee.
5. Both inner and outer foreskins are both very sensitive so they must be packed with nerve endings. They are quite different, being made of different materials, the inner not being able to be stretched at all, unlike the outer. It may be different between men, but I would say that my outer foreskin gives more all round pleasure, inasmuch as it loves a whisper of a touch and yet enjoys harsh treatment such as being chewed. The inner is more to do with the glans as above.
6. The sensation is so locked together that it would be difficult to differentiate between them.
7. I know you've been a member, Anthony, since the outset of Acorn, so if you go back to the sixth (F) edition in 1988 you'll read of an experiment by a man who first isolated his glans and then his foreskin to discover which gave him the best sensation to orgasm. He had a problem with the glans only, as he had to lubricate it and found that after orgasm he wasn't satisfied and had to finish himself off in the traditional manner. With the foreskin only (the glans being under a cardboard tube) he hadn't much problem, although he much preferred using the two together. I haven't tried it but I would imagine that the same would go for me.
8. Your last question about the disadvantages of a foreskin from the possessor's point of view has got me foxed. Maybe other men on the extremes of the 'perfect' hypothesis have them, but the only 'drawback' I can think of is that I've only got one!

A comment that I would like to make while I'm here, is that I may be wrong, but I don't think that there are any sweat glands on the glans or inner foreskin. During the time I've been laid up, the pain at times has caused so much sweating that clothes and bedclothes could be wrung out, and I've lost over half a stone. Gallons have been released through my scrotum, but nothing untoward under my foreskin. I began to wonder about the story of the soldiers in the desert. Was it just the sand that caused all the problems?

I could go on writing about my favourite subject for ever, but I'd better give others a chance.

Impotence Pill

Report by Lois Rogers – Sunday Times, 7th April 1996

A pill that could invigorate the sex lives of millions of men has entered the final stages of trials, and is being offered to hundreds of British patients.

The drug is aimed primarily at the estimated 10% of the male population who suffer serious problems of impotency, but early tests in healthy volunteers suggest it can also enhance normal erections. It will give men the opportunity to avoid the misery of sexual failure by discreetly swallowing the pill about an hour before intercourse. The only other treatments for impotency currently available involve injections into the sexual organ or the use of a suction pump.

Pfizer, the American drug company developing the pill, has recruited several hundred men from 20 towns in Britain as part of its final worldwide trial before seeking approval to market the formula. Early results from the British patients will be reported at a meeting of the American Neurological Association in Orlando next month. So far, there has been no evidence of problem side effects, and it is believed the drug, called sildenafil, is safe for long-term use.

Ian Osterloh, the Pfizer doctor co-ordinating the European section of the trial, said the drug only worked when men were receiving sexual stimulation; he would not comment on claims that it made normal erections bigger or longer lasting.

"I can say we are cautiously optimistic that this agent will make a major medical need as a new form of treatment for patients with impotence," he said. "It boosts the ability to get an erection in a sexual situation, but I must stress it is still a few years away from being on the market."

The drug was originally investigated as a possible treatment for heart problems. Although it had little effect on the cardiovascular system, male volunteers who took part in early tests reported that it had a pleasing and unexpected side effect. During sexual arousal, nerves in the penis produce increased levels of nitric oxide which stimulates production of another substance called cyclic guanosine monophosphate (cyclic GMP). This leads to the increased blood flow necessary for an erection. The action of cyclic GMP is inhibited by other substances called phosphodiesterases, which cause the erection to subside. Sildenafil works by temporarily blocking the effect of the inhibiting mechanism.

Most men suffer occasional impotence, and an estimated 5%, including some young adults in their early twenties, are so severely affected that they are never able to have sex. Few discuss it with their GP, and the problem is compounded because many doctors see impotence as psychological, or simply part of the ageing process. Osterloh believes increasing numbers of doctors now believe it is indeed an organic problem.

Women who specialise in relationship counselling believe the male-dominated drugs industry is missing the point, and that impotence is often the result of a poor relationship. Reintroducing the capacity for a man to go through the motions of sex, they say, will not solve the underlying problems. Suzie Hayman, a counsellor for RELATE, the marriage guidance organisation, and author of The Good Sex Guide 2, on which a Channel 4 TV series was based, said that too many men regarded sex as a mechanical process: "There are an awful lot of men who are having difficulty with sex and are really desperate, but they are aiming for the wrong thing if they treat it as a mechanical failure."

She was equally scathing about the claims that sildenafil could improve penis size. "A man with these drugs who has no care or skill will have far less of an effect than a man with smaller genitals who knows how to use them. Many men think their equipment has to be the sexual equivalent of a Porsche. Women know that a well-driven Ford Escort is infinitely preferable to a badly driven Porsche.

[So who do we believe? Doctors who say it can be organic, or women who say it's the men's fault. — D.A.]

Letters For Forwarding

As members know, our membership list is confidential and details are not divulged to anyone except those who need to know in order to run Acorn and send you your magazines.

The editor is happy to forward letters to other members provided they are stamped (preferably 1st class to reduce delays).

Please seal your letter in an unaddressed stamped envelope, enclose that and a note of to whom to forward the letter in an envelope addressed to the editor at the PO Box address given on page 1. (Note that the County and Postcode changed recently so please check this issue before sending.)

Comments On My First Ever Issue of Acorn (3/96)

First and most important point I would like to make is regarding the item on page 13, 'Circumcise Adopted Son'. Yes, do it as soon as possible.

You may need to talk to him about it to point out all the advantages and soft pedal any disadvantages that may come up. Consideration is given to their adopted son, but none to their own son.

I know a couple with a circumcised son and who adopted another boy who was uncircumcised. The father wanted the adopted son to be circumcised as well, but the mother would not allow it. The father wouldn't take to the adopted boy, and each time they were bathed in the kitchen (they had no bathroom) the father saw the uncircumcised boy and there was always some aggro. The father always favoured his circumcised son but would not consider his uncircumcised adopted son at all. I hope we may know in due course what happened.

Regarding page 2 'Penis Preference'. Yes, I saw the film It's a Boy. It seemed to be right that the Jewish father did not want his son circumcised. Some Christian parents don't want to have their sons christened and no one makes a fuss. It is only in the case of something like circumcision that the trouble comes.

Regarding page 9, 'Circumcision Made Easy'. This is something that interests me greatly. There have been numerous gadgets invented over the years. I saw a book of around 1886 which referred to a book of some years earlier which had illustrations of things used for circumcising only.

It is nice to be able to talk/write to someone with similar interests to myself. I lived in a small hamlet where there were three families:- a labourer with three boys and three girls, a farmer with two boys, and myself, the youngest. I used to play with the youngest of the labourer's sons. He taught me to rub my cock, and he would rub his and mine. I always got a sore place on my knob just above the peehole, but he always gave the excuse that it was caused by a spark from our bonfire. He had a tight foreskin, and when he was in the army in Palestine, they all had a medical, and those who were uncircumcised all had the chop. I used to play also with the younger son of the farmer who I taught to wank. He had a tight foreskin so I stretched it for him. He has about 9½" now. This all happened over 50 years ago – nearer 60. The farmer's son asked me why they did that, referring to my circumcision. He had three cousins in South Africa and the second one died from being circumcised.

My great interest is in circumcision and circumcising methods, and the gadgets used in medicine, in religion, and tribal.

Response to David's Question 2/96 — And More

As a new member, I must say I enjoyed the two newsletters. The idea of a question corner appeals. I am no expert, but have pondered on the question, and here put forward a few ideas which may or may not be right.

The scar tissue issue seems to be problematic when there is a foreskin present and covering the glans, and when difficulties arise or worsen, one thing seems to affect the other. As I understand it, the foreskin composition is much like that of the shaft skin, ie, without the layer of fat present elsewhere in the body, and that the skin is super elastic and able to stand a fair bit of punishment in usage. The skin covering the knob is almost paper thin, which you'll know if you have happened to have abraded it yourself. From what I have gathered, it is usually scarring on the foreskin which affects the elasticity or restricts the opening, and this prevents free travel to expose the head, or if the skin does go back, to almost choke the knob like an overtight collar.

I wonder if scarring to the actual glans then is something which is very superficial, quickly heals and, in the absence of depth of tissue, does not give rise to problems later. The foreskin itself is much thicker by comparison and also can be stretched in several directions, which presents far more chances of wounds and scars. I also wonder about the smoothness of the glans and the folded nature of the foreskin in relation, say, to poor hygiene or problems with urine which can lead to rashes or irritations, especially if the skin won't allow washing etc. Some males don't realise the foreskin should retract even with erection, let alone any ideas of maintenance and caring, or even thought of promoting suppleness and elasticity, regular stretching and lengthening... or helping themselves to learn responses, how to desensitise the glans to prolong pleasure etc.

If the foreskin is going to get cut off, then it doesn't matter if what is going gets potentially damaged and which, if left might give rise to scarring etc. Any damage to the glans might be far more superficial and be lost after the op, and not so noticeable either if, as some say, eventually that skin ceases to be so moist and lubricated, it thickens. Or, as is also possible, the exposed glans enlarges or alters shape (such as flaring out more, no longer being restricted by the foreskin), or is differently stimulated post op because of different shaft skin tautness.

I wonder, too, if one problem with an infant having his skin forced back, causing tears, is that when it is returned the two wounds can align, or partially so, and then rejoin if left, the damage being worsened if the forcing process is repeated time and again.

Recently I was reading in a copy of Forum on a point being raised about how common it was in first time penetrative sex for a male virgin to suffer a torn frenulum which often followed the foreskin being pushed back by penetration. It seemed to be a case that quite a few males, even though they'd wanked for years, had not exposed the head, thus not stretched the frenulum. I also wondered if having a short frenulum, or one which is attached more than normal to the back of the glans, has tearing potential. Does the frenulum also separate during growth or puberty? Does the shape of the glans at the back and the amount of frenulum length also have some connection? Perhaps, like me, you have worked out that each glans is individual/a variant on a theme, some having a dip only, some a pronounced cleft (the glans being in two lobes), yet in others is almost continuous. Some have little depth at the back, some turn in neat at the rim, others having a reverse flange; some are almost domes, others flat, pointed – the list is almost endless. I know one male who has had years of intermittent tearing of his frenulum, yet has a super length foreskin which can 'dock' easily another glans even when erect. I also know another who had his frenulum separated to allow his foreskin to expose the head, and his skin now goes fully back more like a severely cut one, and apart from a residual tag on the head with the rest set back on the skin, he is intact.

Perhaps tissue types enter into this as well. I am allegedly hypersensitive and have had a number of skin problems including suspicious cell changes. Yet, until I was 33 I enjoyed a good long and free running foreskin, albeit that my frenulum was a bit short. I had enough foreskin to fully cover the head erect, and sometimes with an erection it stayed covered, but other times it would roll back and, if the frenulum had not bunched the skin at the back I could have had a fully exposed glans. I had no problems whatsoever, was a frequent wanker, and enjoyed relations with partners. Yet suddenly I started having severe irritations, and then over 17 months the foreskin aperture shrunk, became less elastic, and would not retract at all when erect. Finally it was so tight that it bent my cock during erection like a banana, eventually becoming so tight it would not retract when flaccid, and started to impede urine flow. I had always made sure when peeing that I retracted some or all of the skin to get a clear jet, and made sure it stayed dry. Neither I nor anyone else can, or has, explained why I had to be cut. I was told by my GP that I would not like being circumcised even though it was the likeliest cure.

I had the op just a fortnight after seeing the consultant. I was given no details of what to expect and then suffered a series of problems from that day on. The operation went wrong and I ended up with a badly scarred cock which had been made worse through bad suturing techniques, losing most of the stitches, wound infection, and then bad alignment of the open wound. It did not help that the job was roughly done and left sore, exposed tissue where the frenulum had been cut off and altered. For over 6 years I had to put up with a scar line which bled at the slightest touch, and the wound had become a keloid scar which irritated, was inelastic, and was no asset to any form of pleasure. At my insistence, a second consultation was set up with another surgeon to correct this mess, who rated the chances of getting improvement as no better than 50/50. A dermatologist I saw told me that I was hypersensitive to surgery and prone to scarring. Throughout the 6 years I had continuously used hydrocortisone cream in an attempt to keep the scar supple.

The result of the second operation was being discharged too early and being assaulted by a maladroit nurse who ripped off the dressing, taking some of the stitches with it causing bleeding of the wound. The next day I had to attend the emergency dept. of the local hospital as the wound had opened and the other stitches were coming adrift. I had to wait another week to see the surgeon who applied surgical tape over melanin dressing strips. The wound took 3 months to settle down, but even now 8 years on I still have to use the cream to counter the irritation and fear of hardening.

The original wound left a ragged and raised scar, and also exposed nerve endings on the site of the frenulum which had been cut back, and there was also a noticeable twist in the penile skin to the glans.

After the second operation, my GP noticed some scarring of the meatus which became smaller. I have had to have this opening enlarged, having had a period of 6 months enduring various infections of the urinary system and failed GP attempts at curing them.

Very few people I know understand these problems, nor what is involved in this operation. There is a lot of sniggering and dismissive comment about the suffering, arising from ignorance and the general male inability to be serious about personal matters – which is a great shame all round. Others regard it as trivial, amounting to nothing more than the loss of a little skin, which it is not. I regret not knowing years ago of alternatives rather than an outright operation, such as stretching and freeing the foreskin, or even a dorsal slit. I am sorry that I didn't have someone to talk to at the time or since. I regret having to be circumcised and I still miss my foreskin and the double options being intact had for self pleasuring etc.

Seminal Thoughts

The average amount of ejaculate is 3-5cc, though it can be as high as 10cc, and the record at an amazing 15cc.

Semen has a pH of 7.35-7.5, deriving its alkaline nature from Cowper's Gland fluid, with phosphate and bicarbonate components buffering against the acidity of vaginal secretions.

The vigour of spurting must be associated with the degree of vitality, greatest in the young, with the quantity obviously reduced with successive ejaculation per session.

On the Good Sex Guide - Late, a retired madam suggested that men could be kept happy by being 'de-spunked' regularly! Complying with this advice, huge volumes would be cumulatively 'notched up', equalling many gallons.

Well, there's a curious balance between men and women... during a lifetime of menstruating, the average woman discharges 24-72 litres of fluid (5-16 gallons), containing 12-14 litres of blood (2.5-3.5 gallons), using 6,000 tampons or towels (costing £912 with VAT of £159.60)

With a man's single daily ejaculation of 3-5cc of semen, it would take a man 22-28 years to volumetrically equal the lifetime menstrual output of a woman. He is exempt of the 40p tax on each single period that a woman has to bear, as well as the inconvenience. If men were taxed at 8p for a daily wank, some would have 'thrown in the towel' long ago. Looking at the adage, 'The best things in life are free', the hand shandy for the randy must be well to the fore whether one is blessed with a fore' or not.

I have made some calculations on circumcision, using Dr Luisa Dillner's figures and data from the It's a Boy documentary, together with information already held. My 'breakdown' shows the practice to be on the increase, assisted by ethnic components of the population. There is an annual foreskin toll of 30,000 from a 350,000 male birthrate. The 7% circumcised by age 15 would amount to 24,500 a year, leaving the remainder of adult circumcisions at 5,500 a year.

Ritual circumcision of infants on religious grounds amounts to 10,000 a year, broken down as follows:- 1,700 Jewish circumcisions (by Mohelim); 8,300 Moslem circumcisions.

That ritual circumcision rate of 2.9% is made up of 0.5% Jewish and 2.4% of Moslem. Medical circumcisions therefore amount to 20,000 a year, of which only 1 in 6 is necessary, ie 3,300 or 0.9%. That's within the present infant medical circumcision rate of about 1%. The total circumcision rate for the UK is 30,000 divided by 350,000, or 8.6%.

Circumcision from an overall point of view is on the increase in Britain from the all-time low of recent years. The rally round the scar is five pronged:- Infant circumcision, medical and elective 1.0%; Boyhood medical circumcision by 15 years 3.1%; Adult circumcision 1.6%; Jewish ritual 0.5%; Moslem ritual 2.4% ---- 8.6%.

It is quite interesting that adult circumcisions are only 19% of the total, with 81% being still undertaken in infancy and boyhood, the majority still without consent, whether informed or not. For some, reluctant roundheadedness will remain a circumcision sore.

Counsellors

I quite agree with C.P. – Wiltshire about the programme It's a Boy. It was very one-sided. I also endorse his suggestion that there should be a programme, or video, on adult circumcision.

In this age, when there are counsellors for just about everything, perhaps Acorn should appoint a counsellor to advise people considering circumcision about all its implications and ramifications, and to allay any worries. Maybe C.P. or Dr Roundhead would consider themselves for such a position.

A question for members to ponder over and write about. Since species evolve and adapt to changing conditions and requirements, why are Jewish boys, who have been circumcised for several thousand years, still born with a foreskin?

G.C. – Staffs

[Good counsellors have to be completely impartial in a matter such as this, and I wouldn't think we have many of those. I would hope however, that Acorn is, in itself, a counselling service with all the viewpoints that are put forward. — D.A.]

Editorial

As you can imagine I get letters covering the whole spectrum through the pros and antis of circumcision. Generally I don't like the magazine to be too contentious as it does tend to hurt the feelings of one side or the other, but I thought that in this issue I should devote some of the pages to the extreme edges of our subject to show, if nothing else, how high feelings can run. It must be remembered though, that Acorn itself is totally impartial, and just a forum for members to express themselves.

The group was started (and stated in the very first newsletter) as "for people interested in foreskins and circumcisions" with the aim of "getting their cock into the best possible shape (for them)". This could mean getting circumcised, having a revision, cutting the frenulum, elongating the foreskin, restoring a foreskin, tattooing, piercing for rings, sub-incision or even splitting the whole penis in two down the middle (I've only seen a picture of that).

So although you might read something confrontational to you, don't take it to heart, it's the

Open Letter To A.J. (Misery 3/96)

I was saddened to read your letter: your experience and reaction to the hated legacy of infant circumcision so closely reflect my own. The first thing to say is that you are not alone! This may or may not ease the constant awareness and hurt caused by someone who was responsible for protecting you, betrayed that responsibility, and submitted you to a disfiguring operation which caused you to forfeit a whole dimension of sexual experience. It has taken me a lifetime to come to terms with my distress and resentment, and I do hope that my experiences in trying to overcome the problem can be of help to you.

Firstly, if you have not already done so, you should get a copy of The Joy of Uncircumcising by Jim Bigelow. In it, he describes the neurosis which perpetuates the outrage of infant circumcision and which, despite heavy inroads, still affects about 60% of new-born boys in the USA. He explains the background outlining the greed on the part of the medical profession, and the misinformation of parents which allows a surgical operation, which cannot be medically justified, to be performed on unconsenting children. He also prints hundreds of letters from men who feel as bad, or in some cases worse, than you do, and who, until recently, had no outlet for their feelings.

He describes the procedure for 'uncircumcising' which involves gentle skin stretching techniques using surgical tape and, in the later stages, specially designed weights. I myself have used similar techniques and have finally achieved a state where I have a natural looking foreskin which only a cock-connoisseur could tell from the real thing – until it is pulled back and the remnants of the dreadful knife-and-fork job perpetrated by the butcher who circumcised me are revealed. Although there is some slight gain in sensitivity, it will never make up for the myriad of nerve endings which they robbed me of when the most sensitive part of my body was sliced off. But at least I have the satisfaction of having thwarted the intention that I should go through life with the mark of their neurosis stamped forever on my body. I live in the hope that, if enough of us do the same thing, the futility of cutting it off in the first place will be brought home to them.

Further solace is to be found in our very own Acorn. There are a lot of sympathetic people who will understand your rage and despair and will give you support. Most pro-circumcisionists reserve their zeal for their own bodies, and recognise that it is unacceptable to cause permanent damage to the genitals of young children. With these I have no quarrel. But there are, of course, the hardline few with a crusading mission to circumcise every male child – and who resent what you have to say, since it challenges a cherished obsession. I find I recognise letters from such people in the first few words and immediately stop reading, since it upsets me terribly to see them advocating a practice which has caused me a lifetime of grief, and which I want stamped out – and will not rest until it is.

You should also contact NORM UK which consists of a large and growing number of men – and latterly of women – who feel as you and I do about circumcision, and are determined to do something about it. The first point to make about the organisation is that it has both Jewish and Muslim members, including a Jewish lady doctor who not only refuses to circumcise her own children, but counsels other Jewish mothers about an alternative religious ceremony based on welcoming the child into the world with joy instead of pain. NORM UK will give you advice on how to go about foreskin restoration and has a source for a British version of the Penile Uncircumcising Device (PUD) which can restore a semblance of the foreskin in two years if you are lucky – it took me six years with more primitive devices, but it was worth it! Although most NORM members are not gay, some are, and the point is made that all are welcome.

Finally, a word or two about the last edition (3/96). I see that electronic mail correspondence is now published and, naturally enough, mostly of American origin. The two letters from Compuserve's Sex Forum struck me particularly since they turn naivete into an art form! Firstly, the couple who want to circumcise their adopted son: the advice given is a totally laughable cop-out, and reflects their fear of upsetting one side or the other. How can they expect a boy of four to take a decision which will have far-reaching repercussions for the rest of his life? My view is, keep your neurosis to yourself and leave the poor kid's willy alone, it's not for you to muck about with.

The other letter supposedly answers the question, 'What do women prefer?', and comes to the foregone conclusion that a large majority of American women prefer circumcised penises. The University of Iowa carried out the survey. Since 89% of the women surveyed had circumcised their sons, were they really likely to get a balanced view? Anyway, with 95% of sexually active American males circumcised, most of these women would never even have seen a foreskin, so how can they possibly make informed comparisons? They go on to say that even among women who had only had sexual experience with uncircumcised partners, only half preferred foreskins. Once again, what is the basis for comparison? What can they possibly have known about roundheads? They must have been an insignificant minority anyway.

Such statistics are plainly rubbish, and only the intellectually unsophisticated, or those with closed minds, could fail to recognise them as such. You'd do much better to form your opinion on women's views from reading Acorn.

R.B.W.

And The American Opposite

I am a new member of Acorn, am absolutely fascinated by circumcision and want to do all I can to promote the circumcision of all males, universally, for their good health, total sense of self-confidence and feeling of well-being. It is particularly important to bring circumcision back into favour in the U.K. for these reasons, and so that the English-speaking world can be uniform in setting the good example that the rest of the world will one day surely follow. There are ways that man can improve himself and this surely is one. It is not a matter of fashion: circumcision is the oldest surgical operation in the world, it is very widespread, it is coming back into favour in the U.S.A. and Australia after falling off slightly for a short time, and certainly would have become usual procedure in the U.K. for new-borns if a few sensation-seeking doctors had not tried to make a case for it being 'unnecessary' just at the time that the NHS was looking for economic cuts, and the doctors under it for ways to save time and effort while getting their fixed salaries.

We were not cut for 'NO good reason', We were circumcised because of the thoughtfulness and kindness of our parents, be forever assured of that. While we may have felt odd as a roundhead among our cavalier friends of the post-war period, we were able to be proudly different, and can be sure that they were all quietly and enviously admiring our penis, even if they sometimes teased us and pretended otherwise, trying to hide their inferiority complexes they had to live with because their parents had unkindly and, yes, cruelly left them uncircumcised. It is all those of our contemporaries and those born since, who have been left uncircumcised, that we must help get to doctors and get circumcised.

I know how lucky men are to have been circumcised as an infant, because my parents unkindly left me uncircumcised when I was born. From the moment I saw the permanently exposed glans of the penis of a little friend, when aged about four, I felt very inferior. From that day on I dreamed of some day being circumcised when I grew up. All through youth I had to endure the unpleasant smell of smegma under my foreskin, even though I bathed very often, and in my teen years pubic hair would often get caught under the foreskin when it would retract inside my Y-fronts, and then roll forward, trapping and pulling some hairs very painfully. My friends would tease me about my odd skin-covered penis and, as a group, like to challenge me to masturbation 'timing contests' just so they could watch me slide the skin back and forth just a few times, and shoot off in an anti-climax to win the time, when they knew all the while that they were the real winners, as they rubbed and caressed their smooth, stiff, knob-capped members for many, many minutes afterwards, moaning with pleasure until finally, when all were ready, they would almost simultaneously all reach a climax and ejaculate together with loud screams of joy. By that time my penis had wilted and, almost in shame, covered its head with a long fold of foreskin, whereas, after their joyous coming, their penises all remained fairly large with the knob still proudly standing forth, and all of their members seemingly ready to perform again.

Needless to say, the moment I came of age at eighteen, I went to a doctor and had myself circumcised. Immediately I found the joy and satisfaction that they had known all their lives.

I want to dedicate myself to helping others find this true happiness, if they have not yet been circumcised, and to be working to be sure circumcision of male babies continues and increases from now on.

Ritual Dilemma

I was brought up in a Jewish home and consequently have seen and heard more on the subject of circumcision than most. Although my Mum was an orthodox Jew, my father was a gentile, and consequently she was drummed out of the family when she insisted on marrying him. Nevertheless, she could never forget her roots, and although my father was not circumcised, she insisted on bringing us up in the Jewish tradition, had my brother circumcised, and made us observe the Jewish festivals and the dietary rules of kashrut. Most of our friends were Jewish and we retained our family link with Israel where religious observance is not taken so seriously by the majority of the Sabarim (Sabras) who were born in Israel. In fact we lived there for several years.

When I was about sixteen my Mum left my Dad and returned to her orthodox background. I stayed with Dad whilst Mum took my brother with her into her new home. I later went to college where all my friends, except one Israeli girl, were non-Jews, and, although I continued to avoid breaking the Law wherever possible, without Mum's guidance I felt my Jewish identity waning to some extent.

One day at college, after a strenuous game of tennis, I went off to the changing room and barged in without noticing the temporary 'gents only' sign on the door – because it had fallen off – and was confronted by half a dozen of my male colleagues all in a state of nature, drying themselves vigorously with their towels! I just stood there open-mouthed with embarrassment before collapsing in giggles, whilst all the guys laughed and went on with their ablutions.

Afterwards I was talking to Rachel, my Israeli friend, about it, and she asked me eagerly if they were 'are!' (uncircumcised), since Jewish girls are not encouraged to have dealings with men with foreskins, and tend to be very curious about them. I told her that they all had foreskins which, because their willies had shrunk from the cold and the activity, looked like little skin tassels on the end of their cocks, which amused Rachel tremendously!

After leaving college I started mixing with the Jewish community again and frequently did baby-sitting for some of the families there. This became a regular thing, and eventually I was persuaded to start a 'gan yeladim' (Hebrew kindergarten). I had about a dozen kids to look after, and when a gentile friend asked me to accept her two boys for a couple of days I thought nothing of it. It was mid-summer, and I let the kids play in the paddling pool in their birthday suits. Of course the two gentile boys were uncircumcised and immediately became a source of curiosity because their penises looked so different. Later, two of the children were withdrawn by indignant parents, but the others were OK about it when I explained that it was only for a few days.

When I was at college I had two boyfriends who were both uncircumcised. Later, I had a Jewish boyfriend. I am now married but separated from my Jewish husband and have a gentile lover with a foreskin. With my Jewish blood I am supposed to take the Jewish line on circumcision and the avoidance of relationships with men with foreskins, but at the same time, being only half Jewish, I have the good fortune to be able to keep my options open.

One thing I notice is that Jewish mothers treat circumcision with much more concern than non-Jewish mothers who decide their sons should be circumcised. The reason is that the Jewish mothers are usually present or within earshot when junior gets the chop. They consequently hear, and see the effect it has on the baby, whereas the gentile mum just hands her baby over to the nurse and picks him up later, with only the aftermath to indicate what he's been through, although that can be bad enough – it's always distressing to see a baby in shock. So traumatic do some Jewish women find the whole process that they pray for a girl when they know they are pregnant so as to avoid seeing their offspring go through such an ordeal. I was there when my little brother was circumcised and shall never forget it. As a result, if I ever have a male child, I shall have to face a dreadful dilemma: my Jewish blood indicates that all Jewish boys should be circumcised. My maternal instinct, backed up by my gentile blood, insists that no child of mine shall ever be circumcised. I honestly don't know which way I shall go, but think that my maternal instinct will probably win.

Having experienced sex over a number of years with men with and without foreskins, you probably would like me to state my preference. I will content myself with quoting the words of Moses Maimonides, the great and respected 12th. century philosopher, physician and rabbi who said in connection with the penis and circumcision, "The use of the foreskin to that organ is evident. The bodily injury caused to that organ is exactly that which is desired. There is no doubt that circumcision weakens the power of sexual excitement and sometimes lessens the natural enjoyment. Our sages say distinctly: it is hard for a woman with whom an uncircumcised man has had sexual intercourse to separate from him." Who am I to argue with him?

Thoughts On Others' Letters

The latest magazine makes interesting reading – particularly the comments of C.P. regarding his circumcision. I can almost feel his elated relief...what an uplifting experience it must have been, to at long last see this redundant appendage, finally severed, wither and die in front of him.

I too stay smooth 'down there', my pubic area having had electrolysis treatment. I look forward to the eventual realisation of a fantasy of 'complete nudity' to some extent, the sheer 'vulnerability' of a bared, 'unprotected' circumcised cockhead is an exciting prospect. Annual progress reports on members' cut cocks (members' members!!!!) sounds like a good idea...K.H. seems to have been cut in the style I visualise for myself, ie. well back from the glans, with minimal loss of 'inner skin'. I wonder just how loose the remaining skin has to be in its flaccid state. I suppose this depends on the individual's erectile size-gain. i.e., if one is fairly large in the soft state, and erection not a great size increase, one could achieve a tighter-skinned flaccid shaft...for me this would be ideal if it were possible.

I must say I feel a little sorry for Anthony (3/96) – sorry he seems to feel so bitter at the loss of his foreskin, and sorry he has never been able to experience owning one. I do, however, also feel (nay, know) it is not the intense sensation he perhaps conceives it to be. Firstly, regarding any involuntary movement (in all things, I can only speak of my personal experience, of course) one has no awareness of it happening at all, tucked away inside one's underpants. On manual retraction, I would say the sensation is one of 'peeling', plus, in this case, there is also the visual impact of gradually exposing the glans – and, yes, by virtue of the circumstances surrounding it, it is more exciting to have someone else do it for you. Basically, unless thoughts are sexually orientated at the time, the glans does not 'react' to washing etc. – especially if you have a bus to catch – unless the water is too hot! Regarding stimulation by urination, in short, the answer is no (you can't piss with a hard-on anyway). And how does it feel? It feels damp – probably due to perspiration and/or residue from the last piss.

Inner surface of the foreskin more sensitive than the outside? Yes – hence, when I get myself cut, I will want to retain as much of the inner foreskin as possible, and lose as much of the outer as is practicable. The inner skin does indeed vary in sensitivity, peaking on the underside at the frenulum, but is not as sensitive as the glans. For me, certainly, masturbation is definitely glans orientated. I see the foreskin really as a means of stimulating the glans. For me, this is more distinctly so, as I prefer to actually hold the foreskin back and stimulate the glans by direct friction – with or without lubrication.

Foreskin disadvantages? Yes, there are some. Some guys' skin fits over the glans so tight they can't pull it back. Or if they do, it nearly strangles the glans – i.e. phimosis...the last drips of urine that leak out under the skin leaving the glans damp and smelly. Most cut cocks almost invariably looked stripped for action, sexier – and yes, your relatively insensitive glans would be fine by me – making sex last longer, and partners more amenable to oral sex. And the prominent scar – well, to me that's the mark of a real man!!

Zed

[The following is a letter from a man who was sent a copy of Acorn by a member, not from a member himself.]

Another Unhappy One

Whilst I am 'cut' myself, I am only interested in others who are not, but who do not find the fact that I have been clipped an instant turn-off, as I would myself. Frankly, I am one of those who, given the choice between an uncut 7-stone weakling and a gorgeous cut adonis, would have no hesitation in picking the former. I simply find the unaltered version far more sexy and interesting, adding to the standard thick/thin/short/long so many extra permutations of skin length/thickness/tightness/moistness etc. For me, the biggest yawn is the average American porn magazine with the inevitable collection of clipped cocks.

The impression given me by your magazine is that it is primarily for those who are cut, or wish they were, [I often get accused one way or the other! — D.A.] whilst I am exactly the reverse. I agree that there may be a very few instances where circumcision is unavoidable, but from what I read there are other alternatives for solving foreskin problems without immediately resorting to the knife. I suppose it all really comes down to what the guy with the problem would feel happiest with, but I reckon that too many medicos look at it as a knife only solution.

I am certainly glad that circumcision has waned in post-war years. In my youth, and from my sort of class background the ratio of cut/uncut in my experience was 60/40. My greatest anti has always been against the ritual circumcisers. Whilst there might be a slim case for the practice of primitive tribes to use it as a sign of adulthood, I always think that the height of arrogance is typified by the Jews, who, since biblical times, whilst making such a big thing about God's laws, then proceed, within 8 days of birth, to alter God's design of the male form! If men weren't meant to have foreskins they would either have been designed without them, or had them attached in a way that they would fall off at a certain age in the same way that milk teeth do.!

I hope that you don't mind my replying in my own, fairly vigorous point of view!

George

Winges!

I am renewing my subscription reluctantly and under protest, because over the last year or so I have noticed an ever increasing volume of anti-circumcision letters. I joined the Society believing Acorn, by its very name, to be a group of like-minded people who believed in the merits of circumcision, and were there to celebrate and propound the visual joy as well as practical benefits of the operation, whether infantile or adult. I am perfectly aware there is a place for the 'other side' as in all viewpoints, but why on earth do we need to hear the whines and winges of men who bemoan their fate. Why do they bother to join a group supposedly in support of the procedure, and anyway, how do they know what they are missing? It seems to me the only people qualified to give a balanced and knowledgeable opinion are those like myself who elected to have it done in adulthood with considerable sexual experience before as well as after (with both men and women), and I can tell you fellows, if you have still got one, get rid of it.

My other bone of contention is with the way women are beginning to dominate the columns, the majority being anti. While they may be on the receiving end, and a once in a while, well thought out, non-emotive opinion might be of interest, what do they know about our bodies. Dicks belong to men, and we know what is best for us, and we can do what we like with them. Women have protested endlessly about their own rights – rights to do what they want with their bodies (e.g. abortion), and it gets up my nose the way they now want to dominate us. Ironically, it is largely the decisions of women over males not in a position to protest, that has given rise to all these men who claim to know they would be better off with their foreskins.

Your member who recommended vitamin E is quite right. I began to use it on my glans (having done so for years on my face) after my op., and it not only keeps it supple and smooth and moist, but has helped reduce wrinkles and lumps left along the scar line.

Question Corner

I am curious about the reason for the familiar and unique shape of the human glans. I can see the evolutionary sense in having a cushion on the end of the cock, but why this particular rather intricate design? Has anyone any theories? How does it fit into the pattern with other mammals? Are glans and foreskins universal and, if so, what forms do they take?

Who Wants It!

I was brought up in various rural parts of the country and had never heard of circumcision until I was about twelve when it cropped up in a religious lesson. Judging by the class reaction and the jokes afterwards, nobody else had either, though many in the class were circumcised, including the person who asked the question as I recollect.

Prior to that I had assumed that foreskins were worn 'up' or 'down' as a matter of personal choice, although I could never understand how some got their skin to look so smooth. From about ten or eleven I put it down to a condition (probably as having misread some medical book – which were few and far between in those days) known to me as 'tight-skinned'.

The point being that for as long as I can remember, since about three or four years old, I had always preferred the look and feel of my penis with the foreskin drawn back and, apart from in front of my parents at bathtime or whatever, that's how it remained. On discovery of masturbation and a rudimentary knowledge of sex, the existence of a foreskin became even less logical (to me). My parents were never approachable on sexual matters, so I had to wait until I was twenty-one to get the thing removed. I've not looked back, and even now cannot understand why anyone should want a foreskin or, if they've got one, why they should want to keep it – or for that matter, why some people should get so uptight at the mention of circumcision. I can't think of one good reason for keeping a foreskin, other than personal preference.

Neonatal Pain

Circumcision causes severe and persistent pain that lasts for at least two hours, but most infants get no pain relievers for the procedure, a study says.

Researchers at Rochester (NY) General Hospital and the University of Rochester said they based their finding on a study of 67 newborns before and after circumcision. Some of the infants in the study were given acetaminophen, but all showed increases in crying and heart and respiratory rates after the procedure.

“One probable explanation for the failure of acetaminophen to control pain in the immediate post operative period, is that the pain of circumcision is too severe”, lasting for at least two hours, the study said. The infants given the pain reliever, however, did show signs of being more comfortable six hours afterwards.

The report said circumcisions are performed on about 86% of newborn American males, but most are done without anaesthesia or pain relievers. “It is imperative that safe and easily administered methods of anaesthesia and analgesia be found and utilised,” said the study, in the Journal of the American Academy of Pediatrics.

Reuter – Chicago

Circumcising baby boys may make them more sensitive to pain, Canadian doctors have reported.

Dr Gideon Koren and colleagues at the Hospital for Sick Children in Toronto tested boys who were being vaccinated against diphtheria, whooping cough, tetanus and flu, and analysed their response to the painful jabs. Circumcised boys were found to have significantly longer crying bouts and higher pain scores.

“Neo-natal circumcision may affect pain response several months after the event,” the study said. Other studies have shown that the body “learns” how to feel pain, and Koren said circumcision – often a baby’s first experience of pain – may prime them for future trauma. “Because memory of pain is believed to be important in subsequent pain perception...it is conceivable that pain from circumcision may have long-lasting effects on pain response and/or perception,” he wrote, and “male circumcision is the most common neo-natal surgical procedure. It causes intense pain and measurable changes in behaviour that last up to one day.”

Koren said there seemed to be no other explanation for the different reactions from the infants. They came from diverse backgrounds and were all healthy. “We also looked at cultural background and maternal intervention on pain response, but no significant associations were found.”

Hairs

I’ve been asked on a few occasions if trapped hairs have ever been a problem. These are generally caused by the penis alternately swelling and shrinking, and happens more often if you own a slack foreskin or a slack circumcision. In my case it generally happens when I’m doing something like straphanging on the London underground. What I do is slowly (quick movements frighten people in enclosed spaces) pull down my zip, take out my penis and free the hairs gently. Then I retract my foreskin to examine whether there are any old hairs clinging to my glans. If anyone gives me more than a passing glance, and these are generally office girls sitting in the seats immediately in front of me, I give them a nice smile before slipping my penis back inside my trousers and doing up my zip. Then everything’s all right with the world again. We all fantasise, don’t we?

Television

I was very pleased to see quotes from Compuserve and Internet sources in Acorn. To paraphrase the X Files, “the truth is out there”, maybe?

Readers may like to watch The Good Sex Guide, Late broadcast by ITV during the early hours of Saturday mornings. The panel, which includes Toyah Willcox and Dr Ian Banks, have discussed foreskins, circumcision, and even the controversial tearing of the frenulum. It is well worth setting up the video to record this informative programme.

I have always advocated circumcision on hygienic, sexual and aesthetic grounds, and have fully enjoyed these advantages for nearly thirty years.

Finally, in view of the difficulty of obtaining a circumcision on the NHS, or privately at a reasonable fee, has the Society compiled a list of medical practitioners sympathetic to its aims and interests.

A.W. – Sussex

[Over the years we have compiled lists of circumcisers. Whether they are still in action we do not know. Unless they advertise it is impossible to ask. We do have one doctor who is very good to us. — D.A.]

Premature Ejaculation

While there's some speculation that circumcision increases the risk of premature ejaculation, sex researchers Masters and Johnson believe this is “probably not true”.

Two factors, they say, make it unlikely. The first is that the foreskin of the uncircumcised penis retracts when erect. This exposes the glans, much the same way as circumcision does. The second is that researchers have found no difference in the rates of premature ejaculation in circumcised versus uncircumcised men.

Premature ejaculation very rarely results from an organic condition. Masters and Johnson say that, in over 500 men suffering from premature ejaculation, only one had an organic problem that contributed to the dysfunction.

Premature ejaculation often results from faulty conditioning: a man's being introduced to sex in a way that demands quick ejaculation. Sex in the back seat of a car, for example, or in living rooms with parents close by, conditions a man to ejaculate very soon after beginning sex play.

Finding Out

At a boys only boarding school in the late 50's and early 60's, there was a great deal of pent-up sexuality and testosterone wanting to get out! I was no exception and, inevitably in such a closed society with constant thoughts of sex, wanking was the favourite pastime. Although I was never to experience a proper 'circle jerk', I did experience mutual wanking with a couple of classmates. The strange thing about this was that there was never any hint of homosexuality – it was purely sexual release and possibly gaining knowledge about each other's bodies.

As a cavalier I was naturally in a minority – at a rough guess, roundheads made up about 75% of the numbers, but I never felt that cavaliers were made fun of, although it did seem that all the successful boys in the school, those who made up the 1st and 2nd rugby and cricket teams etc. seemed to be roundheads! I personally felt an 'outsider' as a cavalier and always wished to be circumcised so that I could be like the others. But here I am at over 50 still sporting a full foreskin, having seriously considered the 'cut' on many occasions, but fearful of the irretrievable nature of it!

My main problem as a cavalier was a tight tapering foreskin which would not retract. When I had a hard-on, just the tip would show, enough for me to shoot, but if the skin was pulled at all, the pain was excruciating. Strangely enough, we never had medical inspections, and I am sure that if this had been the case I would soon have joined the ranks of roundheads. We did occasionally see a cavalier return after the holidays now a roundhead, but I never knew the particular reasons for these circumcisions.

By the time I was 17, I was getting worried about the state of my foreskin, and the urge to explore sex with females was curtailed by knowing that I would have a major problem with my foreskin as I inserted my cock. My dilemma was solved by a roundhead friend. When discussing the problem with him, he said this was ridiculous, and was sure that I could do something about it. So he made me try to pull the skin back, very gradually and with a great deal of pain. I remember we sat in an empty classroom on a Saturday afternoon. Of course, as I manipulated my cock so it got hard, which made the task even more difficult, but I eventually achieved a full retraction and at that moment shot a huge load over the classroom floor! Never having been exposed before, my knob was incredibly tender, but from now on things improved, although it took years for me to lose that tenderness, and even when married a decade later, I had to be careful with premature ejaculation.

I was fortunate in having one roundhead and one cavalier wanking partner at school, so I learned quite a lot about the anatomy of the cock. The roundhead was very cleanly circumcised with no loose skin at all – probably average to large, say 6-7" with low hanging balls. The cavalier was smaller and, at rest, had a short foreskin which covered probably two-thirds of his knob. I was always conscious (and still am) of my small size – 5" length and about 4.4" girth when hard. However, one friend referred to it as 'a nice handful!' Do I hear the expression 'pencil-dick' being mentioned?

Still, despite its faults, my cock has performed well over the years, and gives me much pleasure when wanking or fucking. Although retaining my foreskin, I do not make use of it sexually – I always wank with the skin fully retracted and direct stimulation onto my knob (I can manage this now without lubrication) – and also in sexual foreplay I prefer the foreskin to be out of the way. I wonder whether this in a way is trying to emulate being a roundhead. But, the one part of the foreskin that is important to me is that 1.5" or so of inner foreskin which is behind the knob in full retraction, and which provides so much sensation. This is the section I would miss if circumcised and probably what makes me hesitate. Having read recently several newspaper and magazine articles about foreskin restoration, it appears that this area is important in regaining extra sensitivity.

A couple of final observations:-

I notice I am sprouting several white pubic hairs now – but only on my balls. This is a worry!

I occasionally notice a cock which has a distinct twist to one side (we used to call this a 'left-hand thread' at school), but I have only ever seen this on a roundhead. Does it also happen to cavaliers, or could it be something to do with the individual circumcision?

I observed recently in a changing room a roundheaded cock with the most incredibly deep rim – it must have been at least ¼" if not ½". Is there anything in the theory that the exposed knob expands more than the one covered by a foreskin?

I have also occasionally noticed cavaliers with apparently very tight foreskins – the outline of the knob is very apparent and the foreskin overhang tapers into a thinnish tassel. I've never been able to ask such guys if they have problems with retraction, and they seem to be prime candidates for circumcision. Does anyone else have any experience or knowledge of this phenomenon?

I wish we guys could be more open about discussing sex, cocks and circumcision without being thought weird. It was good to be able to do so at the first Acorn AGM I attended.

Reply To Questions

In Issue 2/96, David asked about scarring of the glans as a result of freeing the adhesions during an infant circumcision.

I have looked at quite a few circumcised penises in pursuit of my interest in the subject. Neither my own nor any that I have seen are scarred. The anti-circumcision lobby use this as an argument, but it is not born out in practice.

As for parental retraction of an adherent foreskin: in this case there are two surfaces to consider. The inner surface of the foreskin is very delicate and is easily damaged. It is primarily the foreskin which will be scarred if roughly pulled away from the glans in infancy. The scarring of the foreskin will reduce its flexibility so that, even when there are no adhesions, it will not retract over the glans because it has become too tight – thus a true phimosis results and circumcision will have to be performed to correct it. The glans, on the other hand, will remain relatively unaffected.

Whilst it is good advice not to try to retract the foreskin too early, I would seriously question the logic behind making no attempt at all before the child is four years old. Various published surveys show that the majority of adhesions have separated by the time the boy is five years old – but none note whether any attempt was ever made to retract prior to this age. It is only by manipulation of the foreskin by the parents and child that the adhesions are gradually broken down. Furthermore, by the time a child reaches school age, he should be aware of the need to wash every part of his body, including under the foreskin.

Parents should probably leave well alone whilst the boy is still in nappies, simply splashing a little plain water over the covered penis at bathtime. By the time the boy is two or so, the foreskin should be very gently retracted to the point where it naturally stops. The exposed area should be washed and rinsed, and the foreskin allowed to return. Gradually the skin will slip back further and further. The boy will also learn that this area too needs to be washed.

Urologists have repeatedly written that the majority of serious penis problems, which they see, have been preceded by neglect of good hygiene, most often starting in childhood. One survey showed that nearly a quarter of all boys entering a British university had never retracted their foreskins. What an appalling state of affairs! Urologists are almost unanimously in favour of infant circumcision as a preventative measure. Paediatricians, who never see their patients beyond childhood are, however, the ones who advise on circumcision – usually to condemn it!

A Big Acorn

Have you got a big Acorn? While in London on business recently, I paid a visit to the local Homebase Centre. There, near the checkout till, was this stand displaying big acorns, plus a selection of other fruits. These acorns are about 1.5" in diameter and 2" long – made of solid wood. They are impregnated with perfume/odouriser, and are intended to hang up in the car as an air freshener, this particular 'flavour' being Vanilla Oak.

This product is made by Holt Products Ltd., a common supplier of car accessories, so I suspect it is probably at numerous outlets. The product is correctly called 'fruits of the forest', of which six are available in the range. What better way to advertise your status than by hanging this in your car window or on the end of a keyring – as a bonus it even smells nice. The taste however, in case you were wondering, is dreadful.

Corrigendum

The gremlins somehow managed to attack the Editorial in Issue 4/96 between proof reading and final print. The damaged sentence (at the top of page 2) should have read:-

...We grew from there, but as we grew it was obvious that members couldn't write in to Cardiff and then have their letters sent on again, envelope out of envelope, paying double postage. So we took out the P.O. Box of our own here in Weston....

Editorial

Got another apology to make. Although 5/96 was finished a few weeks ago, Brian has been so snowed under meeting deadlines at his work, and not getting home till late at nights, the issue had to come out late. At the same time, he tried to organise an Acorn meeting in Edinburgh for all the northerners, but the response has been so dismal that he has had to abandon it and start all over again for a meeting in the south. Anyway to all those who wrote in wondering where we'd got to, thank you for all your caring.

In June, one of our members, I know not whom, joined in a discussion on circumcision in the newspaper Boyz, writing a letter purporting to come from me, asking all those who wanted to know the pros and cons of circumcision to write to me. Since then I have been inundated with letters, 60 or 70, from young men. I have written to them all, telling them what we are about, but it struck me that we have never had a written treatise on the pros and cons. I wrote a short one out myself, but thought it might be a good idea if everyone mucked in to write a proper one. How about it!

Please send all correspondence to:-

PO BOX 113
WESTON-SUPER-MARE
SOMERSET, BS23 1DJ

Letters for forwarding should be marked in pencil with the recipient's identifier. They should be stamped 1st class and be enclosed in an envelope addressed as above.

On the subject of writing, we seem to have got down to a minority of members who are keeping us going. Can I make a plea to the silent majority to take up pen and paper and write anything about the penis and associated subjects that comes into their head. It doesn't have to be long. And to the new members, I know you'll probably think that whatever you write has been written before, but no two people get the same slant on a subject, and in any case, a little repeating only shows the interest in the subject. Our lifeblood is your letters, your opinions and your experiences.

I have had a few letters from members who have written to other members and either not had a reply or been sent their letter back with no covering note. I can only think that a spouse or someone else saw the letter first and dealt with it, as I'm sure all our members are polite enough to respond.

There have also been some requests by members to know if they could get in contact with near neighbours. I would suggest that, if that is your wish, you write two copies of a short letter, giving such information as your age, your sexual status (so as not to cause any embarrassment), how you stand on the circumcision debate, and any other interest you may have on associated subjects, plus what you yourself expect from the recipient. It might help if you put in a note for me as well, stating if you have a preference for someone of a certain age or circumcision status, etc. Send the letters to me and I will try to tie you up. If you can put your telephone number or address in the letters it would speed things up, otherwise the first correspondence can come through me. I must add though, that in this case, if you don't receive a reply don't be disheartened, just remember it is unsolicited.

One Of The Original

I am just writing to say that I am one of the 'original six' and to thank you and your committee for all that you do to produce such an excellent newsletter, which I'm sure is read, and is of interest, to many who are not even members. I have kept all the newsletters and they make most informative reading, going back some eight or nine years.

I was interested in your remarks regarding the sweat glands under the foreskin. I had always thought that the rim of the glans, in particular, was liberally supplied with sebaceous (Tyson) glands, whose secretions form the main component of smegma, and which can be a nuisance, causing irritation and soreness (balanitis) to the inner surface of the foreskin. Hot climates do seem to aggravate the condition, hence the recommendation for circumcision for those who experience trouble. It would be interesting to hear from anyone who has further comments on this matter.

Where To Shove It In

Contributors' accounts of their wanking techniques are fascinating. And how about the related subject of 'things I have stuck my cock into?' I can recall when young, the urge to have my cock gripped – obviously quite a natural instinct. The problem was to find something the right size. I don't think texture came into it at that stage. I think a milk bottle was quite exciting – at one stage in my development I could get in when soft, then as I swelled the neck would grip me, quite painfully in fact. But it was only a partial grip, not along the length of the shaft. Then there were the cardboard tubes inside toilet rolls – about the right length, but too loose I remember.

Portnoy's raw meat didn't occur to me, but there was an embarrassing incident when I finally found an opportunity to put one bright idea into practice: the earth (I feel somewhat uncomfortable to use its common maternal title – the incestuous implications!) I had hit on this as potentially mouldable to my size and shape, and hopefully thereby supplying that need for all-round grip. I'd had the idea for some time, and one day about the age of thirteen, walking through a wood and feeling randy, as was not unusual, I found a patch of mud the right texture and set about first boring a hole with a stick, working it to what seemed to be the right size and smoothness. Then I had to pull down my trousers, lie on top of it, get my stiff cock into it, mould the mud tight around it, and try in effect to fuck the earth.

I can still recall the rather disappointing coldness and clamminess when, horror, I heard steps coming along the path, from which I would be visible. I stumbled to my feet, pulling up my clothes and facing away, made out that I was pissing, while I 'adjusted my clothing' and tried to tread the hole out of recognition. Then I turned to speak to the neighbour, very awkward and probably looking very guilty. I still wonder if he caught on – he was probably pretty amused.

I never tried the earth again, nor have I any experience with some of the other devices one hears about – vacuum cleaners, suckling calves (though I used to feed them sucking on my fingers in a bucket – rather erotic!), chickens. Can any other readers report on suchlike, or other childhood (or adult) inspirations?

Another vivid recollection. How good it felt when I finally got into a woman – how it felt so 'made for the job': gripping all over, warm, soft. The feeling of 'This is what I've been looking for!'

Learning The Hard Way

I am a confirmed Francophile and have a French girlfriend. It is no secret that the French are not circumcision-minded: foreskins are the norm and are expected to be present. The French edition of Marie Clare for women ran an article on the penis a couple of years ago and declared that the thought of having their offspring circumcised like the Americans do would never enter the mind of the average French mother. Consequently they can expect virtually all the average French males to be uncircumcised. Since, for a very good reason, the subject of foreskins (and circumcision) is often on my mind, as I describe below, I find there is no wavelength even to discuss the subject with French people, who regard interest in the subject almost as evidence of a character defect.

I recently read a French erotic classic called Les Pisseuses, (a light-hearted description of teenage girls in France) by 'Dorothee R...', in which a young man describes an episode when he was ten: "– my sister Catherine showed me her bottom, then took down her knickers, laid back across the bed, lifted her skirts, opened her legs, and introduced me to the reason why they called her mademoiselle! At twelve, Cathy possessed a most appetizing vulva, long and narrow, formed with two big fleshy lips, prominent, bulging, deeply notched, but still deprived of hair.

Then commenced, over several weeks, the apprenticeship of our senses and bodies. The following year, a girl older than my sister explained to her the mysteries of life, she even came to visit us a couple of times. She rubbed herself off in front of us, rubbed my sister and then turned her attention to me. She had no problem in pulling my foreskin back and to masturbate me: when I was young, mother had instructed me in the way of cleaning myself; for the first time, with her long slender fingers, she had pulled the foreskin back off my glans. But if I did have a prick which was already thick and hard during my erections, I still wasn't able to ejaculate yet. This depraved young lady disappeared from our world since mother found her too forward for her taste. Cathy and I resumed our little games."

If only my mother had taken the same trouble with me as that French woman did with her son! My problem is that I don't get enough friction to achieve orgasm from even the most energetic workout, and I have to ask my girlfriend to finish me off by hand long after she has finished. The difficulty is that, even though I pull my foreskin right back before I slip it to her, it flips forward again after the first couple of strokes and stays there, completely shielding my knob from the sensation it needs. A friend at work told me that 'La Fiorentina' would help, but never got round to explaining how.

The thing is that I've always had a long tight foreskin which completely covers the knob even with a full hard-on. My mother, unlike the French lady, firmly believed in leaving foreskins for nature to take care of, and consequently it wasn't until I was nine that I saw my knob uncovered for the first time. This came about when my parents took a young Australian girl as an au pair, mainly to babysit for me and my sister when they went out. She was very outspoken, and the first time she saw me in the bath she expressed shocked disapproval that I still had a foreskin, virtually suggesting that Mum was somehow neglectful, since she had not had me circumcised. Mum just laughed and said that such notions were out of date: no kids got circumcised these days.

The au pair then took it upon herself to teach me genital hygiene. She seemed fascinated by my foreskin, having never seen one before. The first evening my parents went out, she made me undo my flies and produce my cock, and under the curious gaze of my sister, proceeded to examine this long sprig of unfamiliar flesh.

Under such attention I naturally enough rose to a stiff erection. Although impressed, she seemed surprised to see that my knob remained totally covered, and was horrified when I told her that I had never yet pulled my foreskin back. She accused me of being dirty and immediately took steps to 'rectify' the situation. Ignoring my protests, and watched with intense curiosity by my sister, she painstakingly stretched the skin back over my knob until it clipped into the groove behind – and there it was – my raw little knob, soaking wet, and feeling cold for the first time ever. With my sister following eagerly behind, I was led firmly by my erect prong into the bathroom "to have the filthy thing washed"!

The au pair liberally soaped her right hand and, wrapping it around my engorged penis, started rubbing it hard back and forth over the exposed glans, and the wet folds of skin trapped behind it, with a brisk wanking motion. I nearly took off at this rough treatment of my sensitive knob, but soon found myself swooning with delight at having my erect penis masturbated, and by a girl at that! I soon shuddered to a dry climax, whereupon she rehooded my deflated willy and tucked it back into my trousers. She and my sister were all flushed, and I realised afterwards that they had enjoyed the exercise nearly as much as I had. This 'cleansing' operation became a near nightly occurrence.

The result is that now I'm a hopeless wanker, and because my glans has become desensitised by so much direct friction, I am unable to achieve orgasm from the gentle friction of my girlfriend's vagina when muted through the intervening layer of foreskin.

There is absolutely no question of circumcision, since my girlfriend takes the traditional French view of it and, although I'm interested in the subject, it doesn't seem a good idea from what I've read about it. Does anyone have any bright ideas? Or can anyone tell me who 'La Fiorentina' is, and how she could help me perhaps.

The Kindest Cut Of All

Circumcision for all ages as Russian Jewish immigrants exercise their rites.

By Raphael Sugarman

Published in Urban Gazette (New York, November 1992)

“This will feel just like a little mosquito bite,” says Abrom Romichon, double edged scalpel in hand, as he prepares to circumcise young Boris Belfer.

Belfer wears a wan grin. “I have never had a mosquito bite in that area,” he says.

Belfer, 20, always knew that moving to America from Russia would mean new experiences. A second language. Freedom of expression. The challenge of life in New York City. A ritual circumcision. More than 75,000 Russian Jews have moved to New York in the last ten years – many of them settling in Brooklyn’s Brighton Beach – with more than 65,000 of them having arrived since 1989 alone. And for many, undergoing a ritual circumcision, or ‘bris’, is not only a necessary rite of Judaism, but a celebration of religious freedom in the U.S.

“Such a thing was not possible in our country,” says Boris’s mother. Religious rituals like circumcision were illegal in the old Soviet Union, and punishment could be severe.

Assisting Russian immigrants with circumcisions has long been the calling of a Brooklyn group called ‘Friends of Refugees of Eastern Europe’, or FREE. Founded in 1969 by Rabbi Hershel Okunov and his brother Meir, immigrants themselves, FREE has coordinated circumcisions for nearly 10,000 males. While at least half were between the ages of 10 and 20, many who have undergone the procedure were in their 30s and 40s and even older.

“My Rabbi told me that it might be dangerous for me to have this done at my age,” says 62-year-old Talman Kopelevitch. “But I was in the Russian Army and I was not scared. I feel much more clean physically and spiritually.”

Romichon, the ritual surgeon or ‘mohel’, estimates that he performs about 14 circumcisions a week at Brooklyn’s Interfaith Hospital. He used to award each patient a silver cup, but stopped when his list of patients reached into thousands.

The mohel is assisted by a ‘sandek’, or godfather, who performs the liturgical part of the ceremony, offering wine. Nearby is Aaron Pasternak, the coordinator of FREE’s circumcision programme, who was a chemist in Russia and chief of a military factory that built missiles. He has turned down lucrative job offers in the U.S. because, he says, “I believe in God, and this is a better job for someone who believes in God.”

Also near is Dr. Sung Kim, a urologist who supervises the procedure. "Circumcising an adult is not terribly more complicated than an infant," he says, "though an adult may require more stitches."

Boris Belfer's circumcision takes only an instant. He, who now adopts the Hebrew name, Berel, for Bear, looks down sheepishly as he is stitched and bandaged.

"Mazel tov," everyone cries as the godfather plants a kiss on his flushed cheek. "Before this I thought that I would never go to a synagogue, that I was not worthy," he said, "Now I can go."

FREE, which is affiliated with the Lubavitcher Hasidic group, also helps newly arrived residents find housing and employment, runs an accredited high school and summer camp, and organises social and educational programmes.

Answer To Anthony (3/96)

- 1 Any kind of sliding movement of the foreskin has always been pleasurable to me. I think that many intact readers will confirm that merely retracting the foreskin is sometimes enough to produce an erection.
2. What does it feel like to retract? I can only equate it to baring my soul. Lytton Strachey found Jews aggressive because, to him, circumcision suggested an 'unsheathed sword.' If someone else pushes back my foreskin, the feeling is more intense because it usually prefaces oral sex.
3. Because it's not often exposed, the glans is very sensitive. If merely retracting the foreskin doesn't produce an erection, washing almost certainly will. Friction from, say, a towel can be painful.
4. Because I have been trying to loosen my foreskin, I retract it before urination. I believe many men have done this from boyhood. Apart from anything else, it helps aiming. If there is piss on the floor all around the toilet bowl, a man with an unretracted foreskin is most likely to blame.
5. Until recently I haven't been able to masturbate with my foreskin retracted. To me, masturbation has consisted specifically of rubbing the foreskin to and fro over the glans.
6. There seems to me now, there are no disadvantages to having a foreskin. There are disadvantages to having a tight foreskin, but that's another matter!

Creation According To Ancient Egypt

Recently, there was a documentary on TV regarding the source of human creation as believed by a religion in Ancient Egypt.

Throughout time there were different gods worshipped in Egypt, each starting generally in smallish communities and spreading wide or disappearing after a few centuries. In all cases a temple was built to the god.

In the 1800's, Victorian archaeologists discovered a huge temple to one of these gods, in fact three temples in one. No facts were published on this temple because of the nature of the belief of the worshippers. Wall drawings in the temple showed that the God originally came up as a head out of the sea. He then fashioned his body to his own liking, turning out to be the human form as we know it. The drawings then show that he put the knob of his long penis in his mouth and masturbated until he filled his mouth with semen, swallowed it and regurgitated it as people. He later transferred some of this process to the women he created. Every morning the priests of the temple went into an inner sanctum and masturbated in his honour, and it seemed that masturbation by everyone was a high social and religious act, although nothing was said in the programme about the difference between solo and mutual.

Centuries later, when Christianity was riding high in the world, the Christians found the temple. In their ascetic disapproval of all pleasures of the flesh, they chipped off most of the penises in the wall drawings (those that were left seemed to still have their foreskins, so it must have been really ancient), and presumably let the desert consume the temple.

So when the Victorians found it again, they couldn't very well tell anyone at home as the national prudishness couldn't tolerate such a lump of history. Full marks for the TV company who broadcast the story, although I can't see it as bringing the greatest international pastime into the open.

As Puppy Dogs' Tails

A medical article in The Times, by Dr Thomas Stuttford

For at least a hundred years many breeds of working dogs have had their tails docked. The Royal College of Veterinary Surgeons has in recent years decided that tail docking is unnatural and an abuse of the puppy.

Doctors never like to be eclipsed by vets and so they have been having their own ethical discussions on a mutilating operation of infancy. The standards committee of the General Medical Council, the governing body of the medical profession, discussed the morality of cutting the foreskin off baby boys.

Circumcision is to some doctors every bit as much an outrage as docking puppy tails is to some vets. Boys occasionally may bleed, and in some unfortunate cases become infected.

The members of the G.M.C. debated the problem at length, and reached no conclusion. Further discussion with interested groups will take place.

Rather than improve the standards of circumcision so that the occasional baby boy does not bleed, or if he does, there is somebody there to arrest the haemorrhage, and to make certain that infection does not occur, many paediatricians have advocated that circumcision should be abandoned altogether, unless there is an obvious medical condition that it would rectify. The difficulty is that, whereas paediatricians see baby boys when they have only one use for the penis – to help them to urinate efficiently – other doctors later look after the man when the penis has a sexual function. One of the only three pieces of original research in which I have been involved was in evaluating the merits of circumcision.

For the survey, we questioned prostitutes who attended a busy genito-urinary clinic about the relative merits of sexual intercourse with circumcised and uncircumcised men.

Nobody would claim the survey was statistically sound, but the results were striking. More than 90% of the women, who were chosen as their views on the pleasures of sex were unclouded by emotion, and their experience wide-ranging, thought that sex with circumcised men was more pleasurable.

There is evidence from Australia and Kenya, countries where circumcision is related neither to social nor income group, that circumcised males suffer less from all genito-urinary infections, including HIV. Whereas doubt is now cast on statistics that circumcision is associated with a lower incidence of cervical cancer in their partners, figures show it is related to a reduced likelihood of developing cancer of the penis and a disabling skin condition, balanitis xerotica obliterans (bxx).

I do not suppose a week went past in the busy genito-urinary clinic I attended in which I did not see a case of bxx, and hence a man who wished that he had been circumcised in childhood.

A Letter In Reply To The Above Article

Dear Dr Stuttaford,

Thank you very much indeed for your article on male circumcision. Almost all other pieces written in the press on this subject are so anti, it is refreshing to have the pro points put so gently and so well. I hope this note gives you some comfort for your bravery in expressing your positive convictions against some of the shrill letters which may reach you from the other side of the divide.

Perhaps through your contacts in the medical profession, you might pass on the message from my generation, born in the middle of this century when neonatal circumcision was widely practiced. It is to say that the great majority of us are well pleased with the hygienic, health and sexual benefits that this operation has given us. This is no lone voice; I have canvassed many friends and read surveys which confirm it. Our main frustration is that, due to changing and prevailing fashion, we have been prevented from passing on these perceived advantages to our sons! Many will say that our GPs placed every obstacle in the way of our request or inquiry.

Of course there are a few dissenting voices from our company as statistically you might expect. These are largely due to botched and mutilating surgery or poor parental counselling. Unfortunately, doctors have tended to regard circumcision with some contempt, as a trivial operation to be delegated to the junior and the inexperienced. In consequence, the results have not always been of a standard that the patient has every right to expect. To its owner, the penis is as much a vital organ as the eye, brain or heart, and is worthy of care and competence, both to avoid complications and achieve a good cosmetic result. Much of the criticism which is levelled at circumcision should be an indictment of the operator, not the procedure.

A large ambition of medicine in modern times has been aimed at prevention. Hence we are advised to modify our diets and our lifestyles (but not our penis) to avoid trouble ahead. At-risk groups for some cancers are continually being identified and are advised to undergo preventive surgery, even to the extent of mastectomy! Isn't it strange that in the singular of male circumcision the medical profession turns proven practice upside down? Moreover, we are not offered the choice as many other patients are in elective surgery when doctors feel the responsibility of decision is too great for a professional. There is a very good case for a clear document setting out the pros and cons of circumcision. This could be included in all maternity packs and parents left to decide. If they wish to have their son circumcised then this should be respected and the operation carried out with care and competence on request. We are, after all, allowed to take many other decisions on behalf of our children which have more far-reaching consequences in shaping their lives.

It was good to know from your report that the General Medical Council Committee have as yet reached no conclusion. I note they are to enter further consultations with interested groups. Doubtless these will be ethnic and religious communities where circumcision is upheld as part of their religion and culture. I think it is important that the larger group to which I belong, who have no other label than their conviction in the value of an age old procedure and their wish to see it carried out competently, should also be heard. Perhaps you may find a way of advancing awareness of this to your colleagues in Council and the wider public through your journalism, which I always follow and appreciate.

The Good Sex Guide – Late, Discussion

In a recent edition of The Good Sex Guide – Late, the team spent about ten minutes discussing circumcision. The host, Toyah Wilcox, kicked off by posing the question – Does having a foreskin give you more sexual sensation and make you a better lover? She went on to say that in the U.S. more than 80% of Americans are circumcised, but that Americans are increasingly feeling incomplete and want their foreskins back. Footage was then shown of an American, assisted by his wife, fitting a weighted foreskin stretcher to his circumcised penis with surgical tape.

Toyah then turned to the programme's resident doctor, Ian Banks, who described the operation and then referred to the film, saying that the fact that the procedure took from two to six years before anything remotely resembling a proper foreskin was achieved showed the depth of feeling and the degree of importance it held for those who didn't like being circumcised. This was to the shame of the medical profession who had a lot to answer for, since there were no good reasons for performing the operation, only excuses. The vast majority of problems arising disappear of their own accord in time.

Toyah then said that she had received lots of letters from men worried about how women react to circumcision, and was there a difference sexually; would they be missing something? Ian replied that common sense dictates that if you cut off a sensitive structure loaded with nerve endings, there was bound to be a degradation in feeling, but those circumcised in infancy would have nothing to compare it with, so wouldn't know what they were missing.

Toyah then turned to the other team member, Suzi Hayman, and asked her what women thought about circumcised penises and foreskins. Suzi gave the diplomatic answer that women would usually stand up for the sort of penis sported by the guy they were sleeping with at the time. Whilst some thought that the circumcised penis looked 'prettier' and appeared cleaner – giving rise to the hygiene myth – women with uncircumcised partners found the foreskin much more fun to masturbate, and thought the foreskin 'prettier', with the frilly bit at the tip being particularly attractive.

Ian Banks then spoke again about the dedication needed for stretching the penile skin to form a foreskin, and said that skin grafts did not work and usually looked awful. Toyah picked this point up and said she had received a sad letter from a man circumcised as a baby, who was done so badly he needed a skin graft. Now he was grown up he was aware that his penis was totally disfigured and wanted to know if another operation would help. Suzi said he should go to his doctor – procedures had improved over the years. She said that there were really deep feelings involved for so many men who feel mutilated by the operation, castrated even, and were aware that something precious had been taken away from them by their parents and the medical profession.

Ian Banks then mentioned paraphimosis, and explained the procedure for reducing it by squeezing until the foreskin popped forward again, whereupon Toyah said that some of her teenage boyfriends had been circumcised because of a torn frenulum. Ian said that it was a minor problem and that circumcision need not have been carried out. Suzi intervened, suggesting that boys and girls should curb their natural enthusiasm in handling the penis and use a lubricant to avoid tearing the frenulum. She then closed the discussion by saying, with conviction, that the body should be left as nature designed it.

I go into the detail of this extract because it indicates how much the message conveyed by NORM UK is getting through. After our joint letter was published in the British Medical Journal deploring circumcision and the damage it causes, of which I was proud to be a signatory, the reaction from the media and public at large has been intense. Several young people's magazines have published articles supporting our (NORM's) point of view (Marie Clare, Cosmopolitan and others are said to be in the pipeline), and there have been a number of articles in the national press, some mentioned in Acorn, not to mention reports on radio and TV.

Now, finally, a serious national tabloid is offering to publish a full page spread on the problems caused by circumcision, giving case histories of victims and their wives, on condition of finding someone prepared to come up front and be photographed for the article. Herein lies the problem. The main reason NORM did not exist decades ago is the very private nature of the distress felt by men circumcised in infancy, and the shame they feel in admitting their state to others or even discussing it. Consequently we are having a problem finding someone courageous enough to stand up and make his feelings public. Would any of our (Acorn's) disgruntled circumcisees be prepared to have a go? If so, please waste no time but get in touch with David Smith, NORM UK, PO Box 71, Stone, Staffs. ST15 0SF.

I Like 'Em Cut

A friend of mine has shown me Acorn, which I must say is most professionally reproduced. It was Issue 3/96. For what it is worth I offer some observations, but please do not identify me in any way. Nor do I want any correspondence with men. Okay?

In answer to your question, "What do women prefer?", may I, as an Englishwoman, say a circumcised penis, unquestionably. It is both aesthetically and physically more pleasing. But there is another matter. I remember in my teens it used to be said that a boy/man who was circumcised was far more virile, and that he had been 'done' to stop him masturbating. Of course, that's rather extreme, but I would have thought that it reduces the opportunity. From my point of view I can confirm the American research on every point: indeed, there is no way I would fellate an uncircumcised man. Absolutely no way! A friend of mine who is what might be described as a 'professional therapist' sees all shapes and sizes, and takes a similar view. As soon as she sees an uncircumcised penis the condom goes on immediately. And that used to happen before there was ever a risk of AIDS. Condoms were de rigueur for foreskins but, because she had her own protection, not required for muscles that were cleancut. Indeed, she actually enjoyed some of her clients in the latter category.

If Princess Di refused to allow her sons to be circumcised, all I can say is that it just goes to prove what a stupid woman she is.

Soreskin

From Forum magazine, Vol 28/11: Adviser Queries.

Q: As an older reader, I would have liked to have been circumcised earlier in life, but really there was no medical reason for it. However, I am finding now that when I masturbate, which I still do fairly frequently, the piece of skin which attaches the underside of the shaft to the glans gets rather sore, as I have a tendency to pull back fairly vigorously.

I've been wondering if it would be advisable to slit through this piece of skin to allow easier retraction of the shaft and relieve the soreness.

Your experienced advice and the best method of carrying it out (or not) would be much appreciated.

A: The piece of skin you refer to is the frenulum and it contains a small artery called the frenal artery. Although this artery will vary in size, if cut it can bleed in a very troublesome manner and may need ligation or cauterisation in order to control it. The scar left may remain tender and weak, and show a tendency to split after vigorous intercourse.

It happens on occasions that this slip of skin is so short and tight on erection that intercourse is painful and the frenulum is torn – and once torn, the tendency will be for recurrence. In this case, division of this may be needed, and sometimes the skin can be divided, leaving the artery intact. Nevertheless, the problems of the weak and tender scar remain.

As in any surgical procedure, the possible end result must be weighed against the reason for any operation being performed – there should be compelling reasons for any operation and the benefits expected must seem to outweigh any possible disadvantages. On balance, I would say that it would be better to try to be less vigorous in your manipulations, and use liberal amounts of some lubricating cream, such as KY Jelly, body lotion or any suitable face cream, for three months and see how you get on. I would not be in a hurry to proceed to surgery.

Question Corner (1)

Still talking about the frenulum. This must be the point where the artery going through the penis turns into the returning veins. Having indulged in a heavy amount of self-inspection, I notice that as soon as the major vein leaves the frenulum it divides into four or five still largish veins, one of which turns a right angle going around the tip of the foreskin before turning another right angle to go down the length of the shaft, on the top side, to the root. This vein is always obvious if you look at pictures of a penis with a foreskin, but is missing in the circumcised. The other veins coming from the frenulum artery also move around the foreskin, joining each other at times like country lanes, before journeying down to the root.

So, during circumcision all these veins are severed, and in some cases the frenulum artery itself. The inner foreskin is also covered in a myriad of tiny veins, red this time, not blue. Obviously, circumcision does nothing to impede the flow of blood around the area, but why should they be there in the first place if they can be done without?

D.A.

Question Corner (2)

Recently, in the local library, I leafed through a book entitled, The Bible: Myth and Medicine by Margaret Lloyd Davies and T.A. Lloyd Davies. In a section on circumcision, it states that, traditionally, “circumcision was performed by banging the foreskin between two sharp stones (usually of flint)” There is a reference to Joshua 5:2. I have never heard of this method before. I had always assumed that flint knives had sharp edges and that the foreskin was cut off. Banging between two stones seems a highly inefficient and painful method since, surely, it would just leave a mess of mutilated skin. Can anyone throw a light on this?

In the same section of the book, there is reference to soldiers in the Gulf War requiring circumcision because of balanitis caused by sand. I have seen similar references to circumcision being necessary for soldiers serving in the African Campaign during the Second World War. Are these stories merely anecdotal, apocryphal, or is there any published evidence/references to this actually taking place?

Ivan Goodhart

Restoration

As I said in newsletter 7/95, I am very happy with my restored foreskin, achieved entirely by stretching. There is only one thing that is missing, and that is a tight ring of skin at the tip, which would presumably require minor surgery, though I am not sure what benefits it would give me.

It has been said in your columns that the purpose of the frenulum is 'to flip the foreskin back in place'. But it seems to me that the tight ring at the tip of the foreskin is:-

- a) to hold it back behind the glans when wanted.
- b) to flip it forward when not wanted.

Any comments please.

I.D. – Herts

[You're quite right. The tight ring will do that, but only if your foreskin is tightish at the tip. You would then think that a loose foreskin would move back and forward with no motive, but it doesn't, so it has to be the frenulum that pulls it forward, unless, of course it is the sheer bulk of foreskin behind the glans which forces itself over. Any other comments. — D.A.]

Prisoners Circumcised In The Madras War of 1780

Raleigh Trevelyan's family was linked by marriage with the Macaulays. Both families were actively involved in the British administration of India for more than two centuries. Raleigh spent his early years there before attending the famous public school at Winchester, and later developed a career as an author and publisher. His book, The Golden Oriole (New York, Viking Penguin, 1987) is the tale of his Indian travels, motivated by the wish to visit the places associated with his distinguished relatives. The story is interspersed with accounts of the leading parts they played in the historical events of India.

One relative, Colin Macaulay, was born in 1760 and enlisted in 1777. In the very junior rank of ensign he served in the Madras army in 1780, when the Indian ruler Hyder Ali, furious at a breach of faith by the British, launched the Second Madras War, ably assisted by his son Tipu. The small British garrisons were rapidly overwhelmed and those not killed in the attack were imprisoned in dungeons at Seringpatam. In March 1781 all officers were put in heavy irons, chained together in pairs. Trevelyan (p.352-3) writes that many of the prisoners had “been forcefully converted to the Moslem faith, involving circumcision. As time went on, more circumcisions took place, the youngest and handsomest soldiers usually being chosen.”

Reading the diary of one of Colin’s companions, Thomson, one is surprised by the number of European boys who were brought in. Some were drummer boys, but others came from ships. On December 11th 1782, forty-seven seamen were mentioned as having arrived, sixteen of them not more than twelve or thirteen, all being immediately circumcised.

At my public school in the 1940’s, to see anybody uncircumcised at the swimming pool, where we bathed naked, was a matter of curiosity. In the eighteenth century, the “vile” practice of circumcision was regarded, according to Thomson’s diary, as something that “every Christian of the universe abhors”. A captive sergeant, writing to Captain Lucas, told how he and some other soldiers had been dragged out, stripped and shaved all over, then left lying in a state of “cruel uncertainty”. At last they had been given doses of the drug majum, and a dark-skinned surgeon had come in to do the deed, while some ‘caffres’, presumably rough workmen, held them down. The drug had “wrought differently”, some men becoming insensible, others not at all. The eventual pain in any case was dreadful. They had remained “under cure” for a month, and afterwards had been compelled to give drill instruction to Tipu’s battalion of captured Carnatic boys. A silver pearl was put in the right ear as a badge of servitude. Sometimes Colin and the rest would see the European boys on a roof-top: the boys would make signals, and “in floods of tears” remove their turbans.

At the end of March 1784, the prisoners were told that peace had been made. The irons were knocked off, and Colin and other captives went home on leave. Tipu secretly kept about a hundred men and boys in his service, but by 1796 only nineteen had survived, the rest having perished through “ill-usage”. Those nineteen had been trained to sing and dance, but were put to death in case they would be discovered. The (presumably) circumcised Colin was promoted to Captain in 1796, and continued to serve in the army as private secretary to General Harris, the Commander-in-chief. He was promoted to general and retired in 1828. By 1833, he was MP for Saltash and died in Clifton aged 76. W.Thomson’s two volumes of diaries were published as Memoirs of the Late War in Asia (London 1838).

Not much to say this time. By the time you get this edition the meeting in High Wycombe will be over. I know from the names who are coming that I will be making new friends as quite a few have never attended a meeting before.

For the benefit of the new members: we have an ongoing item called Contact Corner. If you wish to get into correspondence with other members, just write an ad, putting down what you're interested in and what you expect from others. Post through me and see what happens.

Again, for the new members. I have many of them write or call me asking for an interpretation of the correct names for items of the male genitalia. You'll find this on the last page. I would just like to say here, that if there is anything you don't understand with our subject, or have any other queries, please don't hesitate to ask.

Reply To 'Finding Out' — 5/96

I am now 76 years of age and have lived with a fairly tight foreskin which tapers to a long end. My foreskin does not roll back when I get erect, although I regularly retract the skin for penile hygiene and for other sexual reasons if I so choose. My father was a Jewish GP, my mother a Christian, and I was brought up in the evangelical religion. I never received any sexual enlightenment from my parents. My foreskin was never retracted. I was never told to wash under there. Even after I had full sexual intercourse my foreskin was not retracted, although I guess my glans would project from the foreskin while in the vagina.

At some time, when I was having regular and frequent intercourse, I developed a terrible infection caused by the accumulated smegma. A specialist doctor was the first to pull my foreskin back. I was taken aback and enormously surprised. I vividly remember the disgust of the doctor at what he had found. I was treated with a silver-containing ointment and given a cleaning solution, and have kept clean ever since.

I have always been very sexually active and being lucky in having found an equally sex-orientated wife. We normally had intercourse 10 to 12 times a week, now having fallen back to 2 to 3 times a week. I enter the vagina normally with the foreskin not retracted, but I am certain it does retract inside the vagina, although when pulling full back during thrusting so as to leave and re-enter the vagina, my foreskin slips back on again. I feel uncomfortable with a naked glans, and only enter the vagina with a retracted foreskin on rare occasions. If I use plenty of lubricant on my penis, I can enter and thrust with the foreskin always covering my glans. My wife takes great delight when I pleasure her clitoris with my foreskin, and much of our foreplay activity is with my erect penis sliding along the inner vaginal lips, meeting the clit. I usually hold down my foreskin to pass over her clit, thus pleasuring myself and her simultaneously. My most intense pleasures all come from the foreskin. The foreskin loses some of its sensitivity after it is first retracted. In oral sex my foreskin remains forward, by my choice, though for variety I occasionally bare my glans.

I cannot imagine how my first girlfriend could stand being near to what must have been a very smelly organ, and kiss and suck it. However, this she did. Much later I had the chance to ask her how she could have done this. She was a virgin until we made love and didn't know better, she told me, and, "I used to wash it with my saliva." Now, there was love indeed!

In conclusion. Although my foreskin was, and still is, tight, it is retractable. My first retraction occurred comparatively late in my love life, and it did hurt, although only momentarily, but not after that. We are, of course, all different, and there are of course plenty of cases of phimosis which do need circumcision.

The condition the writer also describes, bending of the penis, is, of course, the well-known Peryones Disease and to my knowledge can occur to both roundheads and cavaliers, but seems to occur more frequently with roundheads.

My Penis

May I offer to those interested a few observations based on my own circumcised penis?

The remaining skin on the upper side is of exact length to fit the erect penis when at right-angles to the body. On the underside there is three inches from the glans to the scrotal skin. Thus, if fingers are placed at the intersection of the penis with the pubic bone, the skin of the upper side of the penis is taut and no movement possible. This, however, does not mean that the shaft is covered by a drum taut piece of skin. It is possible to pull the shaft skin 3" to 4" away from the body at the root of the penis (giving a bell tent effect). This effect is greatest with the penis pointing towards the navel, and non-existent pointing below horizontal. On the underside the scrotum could be connected to the glans and there still be some spare movement. All this allows adequate mobile skin for draining urine and masturbation, particularly by a woman. Anybody considering circumcision and expecting a drum-tight effect, be warned; it would be that radical the penis would need almost complete flaying, and a very stiff erection. However, you still lose a piece of skin, by my reckoning, about the size of half a page of Acorn – can't be bad.

And on the point concerning sensitivity of the glans (which is only as sensitive as the sole of the foot anyway), if circumcised, it is certainly less sensitive to light touch. But all the nerve endings are still there, and moisture seems to soften and re-sensitise the glans, as during intercourse, fellatio, or particularly, your missus giving you a slow, soapy one in the bath! The tugging effect of the shaft skin on the glans is also very pleasant, and many masturbation techniques don't even employ glans contact at all, yet lead to exotic orgasms. This is speculative as I've never seen it on any diagrams, but it's always seemed to me that there is an orgasmic centre like a little clitoris buried somewhere towards the centre and rear of the glans somewhere below the coronal ridge, and can be stimulated with downward and forward pressure by the thumb in the coronal groove, top centre of the penis. My ex-wife was a master of this, using circular movements of the thumb in a thumb and three-finger, push-pull, claw-like grip just behind the coronal ridge, palm over glans, leading to exquisite orgasms with minimal movement or effort.

Lastly, concerning D.A.'s question "Does the glans sweat?" Yes, I think it does, or something very similar. If the glans is placed in contact with a plastic sheet, such as the plastic sleeve one might find on a paperback book, it very quickly becomes moist from some secretion which dries to a rather nice glaze. It also tans readily in the sun – odd, surely for an ‘internal’ organ.

Question:-

Is a small glans more sensitive than a large one? Does everybody have the same number of nerve endings, or are they on a number/area basis?

A.K.

My Circumcision

Circumcision was totally new and unknown to me until about the age of 12 or 13, and even then I didn't fully know what it was.

I think I discovered it by accident when I was walking along my local beach (which is probably how I discovered naturism as well!), when I came across a naked man sunbathing, and who appeared to be asleep. Believe it or not, I actually went back to have another look, and I think from then on I was taking a closer look at other boys' and men's willies.

A few times I would try to keep my foreskin pulled back, which I found a quite pleasant sensation, even if one effect of doing this was that I would start dribbling. After a while my foreskin just seemed to do as it pleased, and with it being so long I was surprised it stayed back as long as it did.

When I left school I started to write to several people all over the country, both male and female, but the females never wrote for long and they didn't seem to want to write about much, anyway. My naturist interest was now starting to grow and so did my group of naturist friends, the majority of whom were male, and several of them just happened to be circumcised.

At the same time I was visiting the beach whenever I could, and always preferred to walk up to what I called the 'quiet end' as I wasn't too keen on big crowds or noisy families. Even then it took quite a while and some coaching for me to strip off fully and let others see my foreskin was pulled back.

Anyway, I started asking a few questions with friends who were circumcised, and even wrote a few letters to various magazines asking if they could help. I think it was in 1989 when I managed to get the address of a clinic in London who did the operation for about £150 as an outpatient, after being advised that it was unlikely that I could get it done on the NHS unless I had a very good reason.

I wrote off, asking every question I could think of, and telling them what I wanted. They weren't too bad at giving advice and about a year later, when I was 25, I made an appointment and sent a deposit, which was a lot for me then.

I took a day off work and went down by bus on my own, telling no-one I was being circumcised, which I now think was quite brave of me as I didn't really know London, or know what I would feel like after the op. Anyway, when I got there I had a chat with the surgeon as to what I wanted and what he was going to do. He gave me one of those silly back-to-front gowns and told me to strip off my shoes, trousers and knickers, then go into the operating room.

Once in, he told me to lay on the operating table on my back and just relax. As I did so the nurse came over and pulled up my gown to shave me, but made a comment when she was pleasantly surprised to find that my willy was already clean-shaven (but that's another story). The surgeon then gave me several injections around the base of my willy to numb the area, and this I must admit was the most painful part of the operation, especially as I don't like needles. But it wasn't long before my willy was totally numb and I couldn't feel a thing.

Next, my willy was cleaned with a surgical solution and marked out for the op., then some sheeting put around to protect my clothing from any unwanted mess etc. At this point I wasn't going to watch any more, but can honestly say I didn't feel a thing but can just about remember a slight smell of burning as blood vessels were sealed, and then some pulling on my willy as he stitched it up. Lots of bandages went on, leaving just the smallest of holes for me to wee through.

When I got dressed I had some trouble getting my knickers on fully as there was so much bandaging, the size of the bulge being quite noticeable, even impressing me, but I knew it wasn't all mine.

After I'd dressed, the nurse came out to check the dressing and even added some more where the blood was starting to seep through. She advised me to wear some plastic pants for the next few weeks to save any blood staining my trousers, and then gave me a prescription for painkillers, antibiotics and some cleansing solution to wash my willy with. I was also given two A4 typed sheets of what I should and should not do, what to expect, and an emergency telephone number should there be any problems.

Once back home I was back at work the next day as if nothing had happened, and luckily my overalls covered the tell-tale bulge in my trousers, but it was a week before I took the first bandages off and had a much wanted bath. I must admit my willy didn't look a pretty sight, almost like a burnt sausage, and quite tender when the water touched it for the first time. It was also about twice as thick as usual (which would impress I'm sure). After this bath I put new bandages on, which wasn't the easiest thing to do, and from then on the bandages got smaller over the next few months as I washed my willy more and more and it started getting back to its normal size. After about six weeks the stitches started to dissolve, which I was glad of as they were starting to annoy me.

I went to stay with a naturist friend at about the tenth week, not expecting any naturist activity, especially as I was still using bandages on my willy, it being a little delicate. Anyway, it turned out that a few friends had been invited round for a small naturist social, some of whom I knew and some I didn't. I explained to my friend and showed him my bandaged willy, which he was pleasantly surprised about, and told me not to worry as no one would mind or expect an explanation as they would probably guess anyway. One or two of them already had an idea that I was thinking about a circumcision, and it turned out that they were all impressed that I had gone ahead with it and couldn't wait to see the unveiling.

When I did get rid of the bandages completely the sensation on my glans was quite overwhelming, and it wasn't long before I started dribbling. Even now, some years later, I'm having similar feelings when the underside of my willy rubs against something, and one friend has started putting tissues down when I visit.

On the whole I'm glad I had it done. I'm only sorry that I didn't have it done earlier as I would have liked my shaft skin to have been tighter, which seems is best if it's done much earlier. What has surprised me a little is the number of friends, even close relatives, who saw me nude before I was circumcised, have seen me since, but have never mentioned anything about my circumcision. Mind you, I'm lucky that I managed to get some nude photos of before I was circumcised, and some after as well!

Politically Correct

I have been an interested reader of Acorn for a few years now and there is one aspect that has never been covered, the association of circumcision with political views. It used to be true that circumcision was a class thing and therefore Tory men were much more likely to have been circumcised than Socialist men, but I've a feeling that these days, things could be slightly different. Since your organisation preserves anonymity anyway, why not ask your members to give their political leanings when they declare their penile preferences, just to see? You would also need to get their religious persuasion so that Jews and Muslims could be disregarded, since they are 'captive' roundheads, so to speak.

I was brought up in a wealthy family back in the fifties and, as a girl, all the males I knew, including my brothers and schoolfriends were circumcised. My first realisation that there was an alternative version occurred when I was 10. Four of us, two boys and two girls, used to play tennis on an old secluded court behind our house. After a couple of games one day, my friend, who was considered to be a fearless 'tomboy' and tried to live up to it, said she needed a wee but couldn't be bothered to walk round to the house. So she dropped her knickers and peed at the side of the court in full view of us all! The boys were shocked to the core at first, much to our amusement, but then decided they couldn't be outdone by a girl, so both got their cocks out and peed too. It was then that I saw my first foreskin because only one of the boys had been circumcised, the other peeing from a long hose of skin at the end of his knob. We soon found much more exciting things to do than playing tennis, and after an exploratory spell of mutual comparison, we graduated to touching and feeling, where I discovered the dynamics of the uncircumcised penis with the very noticeable difference in handling characteristics. Although we all eventually managed to give each other orgasms, we never actually tried intercourse. It was, nevertheless, the most stimulating sexual episode I can remember.

Thereafter, most of my boyfriends were circumcised, and it wasn't till I went to college and was able to get away from my background that I first experienced full sex with uncircumcised men. At the same time I was going through an 'equality' episode and felt considerable satisfaction in getting away from my privileged lifestyle and bucking the system, but I don't remember being all that interested in the difference between the peeled and unpeeled versions of the penis – mainly because differences are not apparent in the sex act when both are in action mode with all the covers off, although wanking is a different matter, of course.

My first husband, who was a member of my social circle, was circumcised. He was a dead loss as a lover, although I doubt if his circumcision had much to do with it – he was just plain selfish when it came to sex and often left me high, dry and gasping. He seemed to get little stimulation from normal sex, and often pulled out and used his hand to come, just when I was getting seriously orgasmic. Eventually I divorced him and five years ago married my present husband who has a long and tight foreskin.

Like me, he came from a wealthy background, but, unlike me, he was brought up in what is now known as a 'champagne Socialist' family. His parents were well-off with a posh house in Hampstead, but both were ardent left-wingers, much interested in peace movements and rights demonstrations. When my husband was born in a local hospital, the nurse came to see his mum and said the doctor had asked her to fetch the baby for his 'little op'. Apparently it was standard practice in that hospital to circumcise all babies in the fee-paying ward, and if any mum objected, the doctor sweet-talked her into having it done, so that virtually all the infants of the better-off had their wicks trimmed.

Anyway, when she heard what they wanted to do she went off her trolley and said that if the doctor tried to circumcise her son she'd take a pair of boltcroppers to his cock! So junior went home with a pristine penis and his mum in a state of righteous satisfaction that her son was not going to be identified with the despised upper class from which she sprung.

Eventually my husband joined the army and went to the military college at Sandhurst, much to his mother's annoyance – she wanted him to be an actor or playwright. He had previously gone to a fee-paying school, of course, and was aware that he was in a minority, since a lot of boys in those days were circumcised, but it never troubled him. In fact he found it rather an asset in the dormitory after lights out when the boys took up 'wanking stations' with a partner for mutual masturbation. He was apparently always in demand, presumably because of curiosity about, and possibly envy of, his foreskin and the ease of manipulating it.

He also tells of amusing episodes at Sandhurst. In particular, junior cadets' gymnastics, where some 200 cadets were paraded in the nude for the compulsory shower afterwards. He was interested to see that a good half of the cadets in his company were uncircumcised. The overseas cadets were interesting because the Moslems were very unhappy about undressing before others, but the Hindus and Buddhists couldn't care less. He thought that the difference in attitude was because the Moslems were sensitive about their circumcised penises, whereas the Hindus and Buddhists were all uncircumcised. He had the feeling that the roundheads were much more shy about their cocks than the cavaliers. He said it was the most hilarious thing to see 200 young men charging around the gym with their cocks and bollocks flopping about all over the place, and the variety in size and appearance would keep one of your statisticians happy for a month – I'd loved to have seen it! One interesting point was the fact that most cadets destined for Highland regiments were uncircumcised because 'a Jewish cock doesn't look right under a kilt'.

I enjoy having my husband's foreskin to play with and now look on it as a luxury, although previously I wouldn't have been so appreciative. However, his foreskin is very tight, and in fact, so tight that he cannot under normal circumstances uncover more than the very tip of his glans. He says his mother was unconcerned about it as a child, and anyway, he's not aware of any problems with it. He has no trouble at all in performing the sex act to his entire satisfaction – and mine. He suffers no pain on insertion and I love the feel of his skin moving inside me. In masturbation too, he has no problems. His skin is long enough for me to work it the whole length of his penis, and he loves it when I do so. He reckons on keeping it clean by urinating into the skin and forcing it out in a rush, and in the bath he can get hot water inside it by pulling his skin forward and pulling the opening apart with both hands. Neither of us have any plans to alter the situation – I can't imagine sex could be any better than it is already.

I thought you might be interested in circumcision attitudes in that centre of upper class privilege, Eton college. A survey entitled Evaluation of the Routine Examination of 13-year-old Public School Pupils, done by Dr. J.H. Briscoe in 1978, shows that 48% of the boys born between 1953 and 1965 had been circumcised. If you deduct the high proportion of boys from rich Jewish and Arab families you get a clear picture that a majority of the upper strata of British society had forsaken circumcision by then. Now that Princess Di has set her own trend in this matter by preserving the Princes' foreskins, you can be pretty sure that the vast majority of the upper classes have followed suit and stopped circumcising their kids. Comments anybody?

Smooth And Cut

As many Acorn readers will know from my past correspondence and articles, I am not only very proud to be circumcised (from birth) but also a completely dedicated total 'smoothie' for life. In a nude environment I have an incredible feeling of openness, hiding absolutely nothing at all.

With this all in mind (it seldom is out of my mind, often highlighted by appreciative comments being made to me in naturist environments such as clubs and saunas), I inevitably found interest in the letter in Issue 4/96 from J.F. – London, where he expresses largely like-minded thoughts.

Although J.F. has experienced the joys of being circumcised for only about a quarter of his life, he completely endorses views I have always held that to be circumcised is more hygienic, provides better staying power during intercourse, and is aesthetically so pleasing – especially so when nude with others – as well as having various other well-documented advantages.

Like J.F., I am married and, together with my wife, am a keen naturist and freely admit that to be circumcised in a situation where everyone is naked gives one an incredible feeling of openness amongst others. But to be totally open and exposed at his naturist club, J.F. really must, like his wife, try shaving (at least pubically) as well! I have been pubically shaved for some 20 years now and totally shaven (except my head) for about 7 years and, with my excellently crafted circumcision (thanks, Doc!), I appear in naturist environments totally open and barer than nude – incidentally the title of the journal of The Smoothie Club to which I have belonged for some years. Furthermore, I can assure J.F., from my own experiences, that to be circumcised, smooth, and have a partner who is smooth also heightens the intimacy of sex a thousandfold. This is so for both oral sex – whether heterosexual or gay (no nasty hairs plus totally clean fully exposed knob) as well as during full penetrative hetero intercourse which is magnificent!

Like J.F. I often fantasise about meeting a collection of circumcised guys – even more so if they are shaved as well – perhaps in a sauna or in the privacy of a building where such social nudity would be acceptable for an evening. But why not go the whole hog? The erect penis is so much more interesting to see and perhaps best for J.F.'s group photo, though his essential line-up and inspection would obviously be better carried out on the flaccid organs to stop any foreskins infiltrating! Which other Acorns would be interested?

I have written separately to J.F. endorsing his views and showing my keenness to be involved in any meetings he may care to organise. My comments in this article are naturally in no way to be considered insulting to my many friends who still choose to remain intact and/or hirsute!

Counsellors

In response to the short item from G.C. – Staffs (4/96), there seems to be a need for some kind of personal counselling about penile matters, including circumcision and its effects. While I agree wholeheartedly with David that counsellors must be impartial, this is difficult to guarantee in many areas of counselling. People, being people, are not perfect and do have their own bias and hang-ups, even if well-hidden and controlled. This applies even to counsellors; professional training does serve to make one more aware of potential personal bias and how best to deal with it, but no counsellor is perfect and many are far from this ideal.

I do feel that Acorn could offer more than an indirect approach to counselling through its pages. As a young man I had a very big hang-up about my status as a circumcised male; it caused me many mental agonies for many years. It was only in my middle thirties that I began to realise the true source of my sexual and penile concerns, narrowing it down to the fact that I had been circumcised as an infant and never told about it by my parents. Some personal counselling from someone who could understand would have saved me untold mental misery and uncertainty about my sexuality. I am certain I am not alone, and the contents of your pages indicates that there are many who could benefit from personal correspondence with another who would understand and help bring about a wider and more balanced view of a person's concerns or problems. I particularly note the number of men who feel that they would prefer to be circumcised, but are unsure about actually going ahead. Equally, there are those who have been cut, either through choice or before they were old enough to be aware, who experience psychological, sexual or physical problems because of their circumcision or the finished result being far from acceptable.

While the newsletter and the contact service does offer some help, there does appear to be a valid need for something more in the area of personal support and discussion. I use these terms in preference to actual counselling. While being a roundhead or cavalier may naturally lead any man to some preference for or against the cut for many different reasons, there are many well balanced males who have no major bias one way or the other. As a roundhead, happy to be so, I equally understand a man who should be deciding to keep his foreskin as I do someone who has a preference and makes a fully informed decision to be cut. There is a great support and confidence to be gained from being able to discuss these matters openly with an understanding friend who is willing and able to listen and draw out the deeper concerns that may be under the surface. There have been a number of men who have had themselves cut, only to find out too late that it was not the right solution for their problem; there was a deeper agenda which caused them to think that they should be cut, when the real problem was nothing to do with a foreskin, or lack of it, at all!

Let's consider this issue very carefully. Of course we don't want members persuading every cavalier they ought to be cut, and equally we don't want the opposite view forced that roundheads have lost something vital to their pleasure and performance. However, there are some well-balanced individuals among our membership who I believe could give timely support and confidence to those who are, for various reasons, concerned about their penis, its looks, performance, or have difficulties of emotional or physical origin.

What do other members think? Do any members, or others, have problems they cannot raise outside of Acorn circles, and feel unable to raise them publicly through the pages of the magazine?

Bob – Midlands

[I'm afraid I have to admit to doing something of this sort already. If I feel a new member has a problem I generally start a correspondence or telephone communication with him, and try to help. Some of these I have passed on to Vernon who acts as our circumcision operation agent. We also have members who, after reading a letter in the magazine from someone who appears distressed, write to him to see if they can help. Still, something official wouldn't come amiss. — D.A.]

My Surgical Experiences

I first had a circumcision performed at the ripe old age of thirty. Two reasons being, firstly cosmetic as I had a long foreskin and have always preferred the 'neatness' of the roundhead. Also I was taking high doses of antibiotics as acne therapy and was consequently plagued by attacks of thrush! As I was told the surgery was simple and likely to be problem free, I was admitted to a private hospital for a routine circumcision.

However, on discharge, I formed a haematoma, my eighteen stitches burst and I needed further urgent corrective surgery which resulted in more tissue being removed. Again I was told not to worry as 50% of men have the op, and in some societies it is regarded as universal. Furthermore, I was told the eventual cosmetic result would be eminently acceptable and there would be no loss of sensation or major scarring. However, approximately one week after my remedial surgery, I developed further complications, ie. a grossly infected circumcision scar, a urethral discharge, swollen testicles and, most distressing of all, prolonged priapism, which could only be resolved with frequent excruciatingly hot baths. The urologist was concerned (not to mention embarrassed), and treated the infections with the local application of betadine paint which stung somewhat. He also managed to manipulate the shaft in such a way that the penis temporarily detumesced (again, uncomfortably embarrassing) I then had to massage Heparinoid cream into the body of the organ to reduce swelling.

One month later, when I saw the original Consultant Surgeon, the infection had largely cleared up, leaving only small ulcerated areas, and there was some partial detumescence. I was advised to wait some six months before seeking further treatment, eg. the direct injection of a steroid into the keloid scar, which is very painful. My GP's opinion was that there 'was a very radical circumcision performed that exposed the entire glans penis as far as the sulcus'. In the months (and years) that followed, the remaining tissues contracted and the scar became more pronounced, which led to a diminution of pleasure and frequent tearing of the skin.

Finally, some three years after my abortive operation, I was referred privately to a Harley Street specialist (this time a Cosmetic Surgeon, not a urologist) who said it would be possible to graft an area of skin to repair the denuded area. He said the scrotal sac could be used on non-hairy men with pendulous scrotums, though, since I was hairy and dark, and had a 'tight' sac (his words) he would have to use a strip of skin from my hip or other non hair-bearing site.

The restorative surgery was performed at the Cromwell Hospital and took several hours. It cost £6,500 which my insurance paid, and resulted in me spending one week as an in-patient. The term skin-graft is a misnomer, skin patch being more accurate to describe the final effect. Cosmetically, the appearance post operatively can be bizarre, though my results were reasonable, and there can be a permanent loss of sensitivity. A large graft is prepared leaving an eight-inch scar in the donor site, but a sensitive and clever surgeon can site this in the inner thigh area where the scar will be masked, or at least indistinguishable from an appendix wound. Strong analgesia, antibiotics, sedatives and potent beta blockers are necessary to control infections and suppress the more vigorous erections. They have little effect. My doctor referred to me as 'Mr Dickie', and was of the opinion that I could ejaculate vigorously within minutes of coming round from the anaesthetic!! He also seemed to think that my normal position was upright.

In short, the surgery isn't to be taken lightly, and there are many pros and cons involved. I can refer anyone who is interested to the Plastic Surgeon in question if they like, as he performs about six of these operations a year, and is therefore one of the few practitioners who can adequately do so. Other post-operative results I have seen have been very good.

What I've Missed

One of the things which those circumcised against their will, ie. in infancy, wonder about most is what it is like to have a foreskin. Until now that has not been possible, but at last – in issue 4/96 – we have a letter from someone with the ability and articulacy to spell out in graphical terms what his experience of life with a foreskin amounts to. I am referring of course to David's excellent letter answering Anthony's wistful questions on the subject in 3/96.

So now at last I have a yardstick by which to measure what I see as my deprivation (and what some others see only as unjustified whinging). Firstly, I found your vivid description of how pleasurable any involuntary movement of the foreskin is, most instructive, since such pleasure is denied to me, despite the fact that I now have a manufactured foreskin. The reason for this is a total lack of sensitivity in the glans, loss of the sensitive inner mucous membrane, and an opening much slacker than that of a normal foreskin. So I'm afraid the restored foreskin cannot measure up to the natural article.

The second point, about how the most delicious part of having a foreskin is retracting it when it is moist underneath, will make discontented circumcisees green with envy! The effect of drag as the foreskin is pulled back and the intense feelings this generates is something they can only dream about.

The next point about the newly exposed glans being marvellously sensitive to temperature is something else which is unimaginable to a lifelong roundhead. I dimly remember as a child the unpleasant shock of hot water on my poor denuded glans when I took a bath. But numbness set in years ago and I'm not even aware of it nowadays. The experience of arousal from a powerful shower jet is sadly not an option since it does not happen.

Urination with a foreskin was always a matter of fascination for me as a kid, since the cavaliers could do so many exciting things denied to me – like playing balloons and winning the longest range competition through the added pressure created by the elastic skin reasserting itself afterwards.

The comment about the inner and outer foreskin being packed with nerve endings, and consequently very sensitive, brings home to your unhappy circumcisee that his distress is not just imaginary, or something to be shrugged off by 'pulling yourself together'.

The final point in this illuminating letter is the most telling of all. The answer to the question about the disadvantages of a foreskin from the possessor's point of view has the writer foxed, since the only drawback he can think of is that he only has one!

My only criticism of this informative and interesting letter is that D.A. didn't get his lady friend to add a few words of her own on the subject. I've been hoping for some time that she would expand on her valuable contribution, so well expressed a couple of years ago. [Sorry, the lady went and married, her husband not allowing me access! — D.A.]

I know that not every cavalier's experience is the same, but this puts into perspective those who yap on about how much everyone would benefit from being done, without exception being made for those who don't, or might not want it. In this connection, David, I have to mention the letter in 5/96 from our new American member D.L. It is always illuminating to get a view from the other side of the pond, and so far, unless I'm mistaken, every American contribution published has been expressed in forthright terms which brook no argument. Even the one letter from the States in favour of foreskins (from IMAC) was worded so strongly that I, of all people, found it O.T.T.! But to return to D.L.'s letter, I can't help wondering if he was taking the piss. His loving description of his deeply-envied schoolfellows' transports of joy as they pulled their sawn-off and exquisitely deadened equipment to fulfilment was difficult to take seriously. The question arises. If D.L.'s ancestors had stayed in Europe instead of migrating to the States, would he still feel the same way? Of course not! The whole thing comes down to peer pressure, and he should be asking himself if it's always right to follow the herd, especially in contravention of current medical opinion. He should, instead, consider the original reasons for its adoption there: puritan punishment of sin and a 'sinful' part of the body, neurotic (and insulting) fear of 'lack of hygiene', and then sheer greed on the part of the richest doctors in the world.

Finally, a word of warning to those who write in claiming that circumcision has improved their love lives. Make the most of it while it lasts! If my experience is anything to go by, your skinless sausage will gradually lose sensitivity as you get older, finishing up with the texture and responsiveness of your average parsnip. But if that's what you want, good luck to you.

The Love Of Circumcision

There is a basic true Psychology of Circumcision that we, who have been circumcised, fully understand and can explain quite simply to those who haven't.

All men have an innate feeling that the glans of their penis should be permanently exposed, and most are therefore fascinated by circumcision, which is the way to accomplish this. With circumcision, your glans is permanently exposed for you to see and enjoy, and for others to see when you are before them naked. Your circumcised penis attests to the fact that you are a member of a special initiated group. Your glans is exposed because you have undergone a wonderful ritual called circumcision. The most masculine part of your body, your glans, is not hidden. Your masculinity is laid bare, thereby expressed; and you have a bond with all other circumcised men, a subtle, but deep, bond which exists between males who know each other to be circumcised.

Amendment To Letter In 4/96, Page 11

Thank you for publishing my letter in the magazine. I now have reservations on the first paragraph re the circumcision of the four-year-old adopted boy. We were not told a lot about the case, only that the five-year-old had been circumcised at birth. I say this in spite of what I said later in my letter.

Male Genitalia Nomenclature

Penis	Cock
Testes	Balls
Testicles	Balls
Scrotum	Ballbag
Glans	Knob
Prepuce	Foreskin
Meatus	Pee Hole
Frenulum	Strip of skin under the knob
Corona	Rim round the rear of the knob
Sulcus	Valley directly behind the knob
Raphe	Marked line running from the anus, through the centre of the scrotum and up the underside of the penis
Urethra	Tube through the penis for peeing
Sub-incision	Cutting through the underside of the penis lengthwise through to the urethra
Bifurcation	Cutting the whole of the penis vertically, lengthwise. (sometimes called butterflying)
P.A. (Prince Albert)	Inserting a ring through the meatus and coming out through the frenulum
Priapism	A hard-on that won't go down
Tumescence	Engorging of blood into the penis
Detumescence	Subsiding from the swollen state

There's much more, but that's about all the usual ones.

Editorial

Another year is coming to an end as we enter our tenth year, and I still marvel that we are here. But this year has seen more new members than any other year and the interest of our longer standing members doesn't seem to wane. It must be a really powerful obsession we all have.

Looking back, we seem to have had more problems than before. My first illness since 1967 laid me low for all those weeks, Brian has had more than his share of viruses, 'flus etc., and Vernon retired to find himself busier than he was before. Let's hope next year will be much smoother.

The meeting at High Wycombe was great. First-rate hotel and organisation, thanks to Brian. He and I went to great pains to try to match up room-mates in ages and what we knew of their interests etc. We couldn't be sure we'd got it all right but I think it worked as no complaints have been forthcoming. For the first time since the first meeting there were more newcomers (17) than 'old-hands' (13) present. At the beginning the amount of trepidation by the newcomers was marked, asking many questions on what was going to happen and what was expected of them, but they soon found that they were among a bunch of like-minded friends who they could talk to openly. Some obviously thought that the weekend passed too quickly, and I was one of them. I must thank everyone for the friendliness and the care regarding my health shown to me, and am only sorry that there wasn't time to talk longer to everyone.

With this issue will come the annual subscription forms. The sub remains the same at £10 and we hope that everyone will stay with us. As each of you resubscribes, I will be sending the in-depth questionnaire out, and hope that you will assiduously (there's a nice word) fill it in and return (all anonymously).

You may like to know that we have members in the following countries:- Australia, Austria, Canada, Finland, France, Holland, Indonesia, Ireland, Norway, Spain, Tenerife, and America. We send them all greetings and would ask if they would keep us acquainted with circumcision/foreskin trends, history etc in their respective countries.

The team wish you all a very Merry Xmas and a prosperous New Year.

Rites And Wrongs

1 There was a small typographical error in Hannah Morris's intensely fascinating letter in which her Israeli friend asked if male colleagues were "are!". The question may have been indelicate for a young Jewess, but hardly an exclamation!! The Hebrew for unclean is 'Arel', with the collective noun 'Arelim' for the uncircumcised. (The Arab equivalent 'Aghral' for uncircumcised, and 'Aif', shame, conferred on an adult Moslem remaining intact, is comparable to the uncleanness of the state of Judaism).

It is quite amazing that Jewish ladies eagerly prize the 'forbidden fruit' of foreskin knowledge and experience. (No wonder Arel Flynn was so popular!!!)

2) Ivan Goodhart was right to question circumcision in biblical times by banging between two sharp stones. (Ouch!!) The charbuth zurim (Hebrew for stone knife) used by Moses' wife, Zipporah, on her son, must have been sufficiently painful used on its own (Exodus 4/25). Joshua used the flint instrument on the children of Israelites around Mount Sinai (Joshua 5/7). The instrument was more of a tearing than a cutting one, so the 'Ismol', iron blade, was later substituted for it, and even today the steel knife is whetted on both sides to a regulation based on an interpretation of Psalm 149.6.

Acorn members would certainly be amused by a gem of Arabic folklore; Abraham was supposed to have circumcised his son with an axe, and was rebuked by an angel for his haste!! That certainly adds punch to Hannah Morris's mention of Junior getting 'the chop'.

3) In 'The Kindest Cut of All', there was mention of a Sandek present during adult circumcision ceremonies on Jewish Russian immigrants at Brooklyn, even if only for the liturgical part. In the infant operation, the Sandek (godfather) restrains the baby in his lap with the legs spread apart, bent at the knees, and flexed outwards. The godmother (Sandakit) passes the infant over for circumcision, as the mother is ritually unclean for 40 days after the boy's birth. The mohel (circumciser) is a Hebrew archaic word meaning father-in-law (father-in-law!)

Many will be amused that in-laws and godparents originate from ritual infant circumcision. Perhaps that might promote the C of E (circumcision of Englishmen)!

4) My reading has unearthed curious Arabic words related to circumcision. First, 'Hatana', the Arabic for nuptials, is actually a blend of 'to marry', 'father-in-law' and 'circumcise'. From Hatana comes:- 'Khatan' – son-in-law, with 'Khitan' – male circumcision, 'Khatana' – daughter-in-law, with 'khafd' – female circumcision.

Circumcised parts, both male and female (Al Khita Nani), have to come together for sexual intercourse to have taken place. This has a bearing on fast breaking! Glans insertion is no misdemeanour provided the scar remains outside. Should the penis go in as far as the circumcision scar or farther, the fast is broken. (This could add fresh insight to 'scar crossed lovers! and the offence of circum-sinning.)

Because male circumcision in Islam involves less foreskin removal than in Judaism (which is decidedly less vigorous than the surgical methods used in the U.K.), the site of the scar on the erect penis is midway down the shaft. This would permit the sensuous, impulsive, Musselman to introduce up to half his penis without breaking the fast of Ramadam in daylight! (Night-time intercourse is allowed during Ramadam, as it is during the Jewish Sabbath.)

An Opinion From Macrobiotics

For someone who has been interested in Macrobiotics, it is obvious that it is the theory of the yin and the yang, the Chinese philosophy which explains basically, circumcision.

The flag of South Korea is the symbols of the yin and the yang. Yang is the penetrating, and yin the receiving. Yang is the physical strength and longevity, while yin is the growth and intelligence.

An important point is that one cannot exist without the other, and that nothing is yin or yang in itself. Anything is more yin or more yang than something else, and the wise man is supposed to be the perfect association of them both.

So, in the diet, what is said to be yang is what gives strength and longevity, and what is yin is what makes children grow and gives intelligence.

But there is, too, what the Chinese call old yang and old yin. They could be said to be bad yang and bad yin. It is not exactly that but it helps the understanding. It is what happens when one principle arrives at the excess of its nature and begins to have some of the characteristics of the other.

So, for the diet, what is animal is yang and what is vegetable is yin. Macrobiotics advise eating mostly complete cereals because they are the most yin in the vegetable kingdom, and the more well balanced. So brown cereals are young yang and meat, especially cooked, is old yang. Cereals give more longevity than meat.

Globally, too, yang drives to violence and at the limit, to violent death. At the extreme to a child, idiocy. While too yin drives to weakness, and all the bad mixings of the both to all the illnesses.

Once I read in Mishio Kushi that too yang hate hairs. When they see cats in the street they shave them – and it was the revelation. I am not at that point, but I hate hairs touching my skin where there are no hairs – my ears for example. And it was exactly the same for my foreskin touching my knob. And I realised at once that circumcision was typically something of the shepherds of hot and dry countries. Nearly only an animal diet – milk, cheese and meat – hot yang, dry yang. No primitive population of cold or temperate countries ever circumcised, but was very common in all hot countries. Also, more in the dry ones than in the wet ones (less fruits and salads). And more amongst the shepherds than amongst others. And at the origins, Jews and Arabs were primitive shepherd populations living in hot dry countries. And it must be pointed out that the main place of excision is central Africa, which is the hottest place in the world, and dry.

Kushi believes that most of the bad problems of our society – drugs, violence, and so on – come especially from eating too many animal products like milk, cheese, butter, fish, eggs and meat, cooked and salty, which makes them more yang. The Japanese usually eat fish raw for avoiding too yang.

Well, here is, I believe, the problem. A too yang diet makes contact with the foreskin unpleasant. As much for the man himself as well as his partner, man or woman. And that unpleasantness is a warning of danger of bad luck. And so people by intuition feel attracted by circumcision; that it would reduce a feeling of danger. And so people feel more pleasure being circumcised or with circumcised men. Anxiety obviously reduces the pleasure, even unconsciously.

But on the other hand, I have reason to believe that circumcision reduces the energy of the man. It can be a lesser bad, but it would be better to eat less animal products.

Compared to men, women are yin by nature, physically weaker, but more intelligent (I sometimes doubt this but it is the theory). So most women will prefer a man with a foreskin and only a few women, with much yang, will prefer a circumcised man. While the proportion of men attracted by circumcision will be greater.

Astrology says the same thing in another way. Mars is the planet of strength, efficiency and energy. But if too strong, it drives to physical accidents, wounds in war, car crashes, and so on. And at the limit – violent death. And the foreskin is an organ receiver of the energy of Mars, so cutting it reduces the energy of Mars. So if Mars was too strong at your birth, it can reduce the danger of accidents, but it reduces the global energy.

Globally, young yang drives towards energy as a rule, while old yang drives towards violence, conflicts and violent death.

Here's what I believe. Let us imagine that a man naturally, can have 100 in intensity in sexual pleasure. With a too yang diet he will fall to 30. Getting circumcised, he will get 60. But by being circumcised, he will never reach 100 any more. Therefore, is not circumcision better or not outside of the diet.

My Interest In Circumcision

I can date my interest in circumcision back to the academic year 1977-78, when I was a boy of 10 at prep school. The school had religious inclinations and we were given a very thorough introduction to the Bible by a spinster lady. Plodding through the Old Testament, we came to an episode known as 'the circumcision at GilGal', when all the Hebrews born while Moses was leading them around the desert for 40 years were cut en masse. The spinster lady was prepared to teach us about this obscure period, but refused to explain what circumcision was, and said that we had to ask our fathers. I just looked in the glossary in the back of the Bible and realised I couldn't ask my father about that, and set about finding out more from other books.

There wasn't much nudity at that school, although I knew that some boys had different-looking willies, but later that year I went to a different school as a boarder, where things were very different. Here, we had to take our baths in two tubs in the middle of the communal bathroom, with no form of privacy whatsoever. A matron stood by and kept her beady eye on everything. On getting into the bath, one had to stand up, scrub your legs, then ask permission to sit down. So for a short time everyone else got a full frontal. Although most boys were uncut, there were several Muslims, and at least one

Jew, sporting circumcised cocks, in addition to a few English boys and the Hong Kong Chinese contingent. Interestingly, most of the English circumcisees were from army families. I don't recall that anyone ever commented on their appearance; it was common enough to be unremarkable, but on one occasion I recall being asked whether I was a roundhead or cavalier by a couple of the roundheads. Ever since, I wished I'd joined in that conversation.

In my class were thirty boys, five of whom were cut: I could recount their names immediately. One Muslim, one Chinese and three English non-Jews. Again, it was never commented on. Glimpses in the showers after games filled me with curiosity, and I began retracting my foreskin in private, with occasional panics when it wouldn't return afterwards.

Progressing up the years in public school, I found that I had more privacy, and in the fourth year (c.1982) I decided to try the experiment of keeping my foreskin permanently rolled back to pretend that I was cut, much preferring the appearance of the exposed glans to a wrinkly bit of foreskin. It has been kept that way ever since, although it gets plenty of exercise back and forth each night. I find that retraction is permanent if I wear briefs, but that the wretched ugly foreskin slips forward if I wear boxers.

This alone is enough to convince me that I want to be circumcised, a conviction that has now lasted over ten years, although finances and opportunity have never coincided. I have thought about doing it myself, but couldn't, and I might have had it done when I was in Africa were it not for the fear of horrible infection. So I buy a copy of Playgirl most months and envy the Americans their cut cocks. Once, in an embarrassed hurry, I got an Englishwomens' magazine and was horrified to find nothing but foreskins!

Although there is always the slight doubt as to whether it will really be what I want, I know that one day I'll get myself cut, sooner, rather than later, I hope. I would welcome any comments – I was going to say tips – from other members, recently cut as adults. Especially on how much skin should be taken off, and recommendations of reliable surgeons in the south of England.

Mike

[All our information so far has been that the Chinese, like the Japanese, do not generally circumcise, but ensure that from babyhood the foreskin is kept retracted so that in adulthood they appear to be circumcised. Can you remember, Mike, whether there was much skin bunching behind the glans? – D.A.]

Question Corner

In Issue 1/96, page 6, an item culled from the Internet by V.Q., contains the sentence, "I also frequently see ads in magazines (not dirty) about rings you put around the penis for a few months to make it look better by permanently keeping the foreskin retracted.” Bud Berkeley also mentions these rings (or similar) in one of his books.

I would like to know what these rings are like, how they can be obtained and the cost. Can anyone help?

E.S. – Greater Manchester

Support the Cut

Over the last year I have read the magazine with interest, but can I now make a plea for a more positive response supporting the benefits and pleasures of being circumcised.

I admit to having a vested interest – I was clipped as an infant and am very happy with what I have – and it is very unlikely that it could be changed, so why not be happy with what you have. Surely it is more important to have a happy sex life than to constantly worry about what might have been – look forward, not backward. Having a satisfactory sexual experience depends on many more things than the shape of your penis. Does the absence of a foreskin really make that much difference, or is it used as an excuse to cover up other sexual problems.

Having been gay since my early teens, and now in my 50's, I have obviously seen many penises, all shapes and sizes, and have never found that a foreskin or its absence made any difference to sexual performance or pleasure. So much appears to be in the mind, not in the real action.

I am always interested in learning more about the history, rituals and people's experiences of circumcision. I will be happy to correspond with any members who are interested. Size, shape or sexuality do not really matter as long as there is a detailed interest in “man's best friend”.

Circumcision — A Prospective Owner's Guide

In reply to your inquiry regarding your interest in circumcision, there are several 'pros' and 'cons' you should consider for a state that rarely occurs naturally. The circumcised state is a minority condition, with the UK rate currently about 9%. Most circumcisions are performed in infancy and boyhood, with 81% of circumcisions by 15 years of age, adult operations amounting to only 19%, with a longer healing time of 2-3 weeks and associated discomfiture. The overwhelming majority of those agreeing to or electing circumcision are satisfied with their new status, as indeed are many circumcised in infancy without their consent for whatever reason. Despite majority contentedness, there is a small minority unhappy at an unnatural state considered unsightly, mutilating and possibly sexually and psychologically disabling. Should you still wish to consider circumcision as a personal preference, and not as a medical necessity, the following should be weighed carefully:-

Advantages of Circumcision.

1. With the glans cover removed, there is nowhere for smegma to collect, so the penis is permanently cleaner, with hygiene made simple and easy.
2. The glans surface will change from the original mucous membrane to a condition similar to other surface skin, and be less prone to genital herpes, thrush, warts and other venereal conditions.
3. Permanently bared, the glans will become plumper from the near bullet shape to the familiar fireman's helmet shape of the circumcised. Even flaccid, the penis takes on the form of an uncircumcised erection, available for sex.
4. The dry, clean surface of the glans will give the owner confidence, and be appreciated by ladies, especially for fellatio. (Some women find foreskins sticky, smelly turnoffs.)
5. For the macho man, circumcision renders the penis more virile, even threatening. For the exhibitionist, as the ultimate nudity. Virility can be enhanced by a Prince Albert piercing always on view with the penis.
6. Urination is simplified with a stronger, more accurately aimed stream, and no dripping onto underclothing afterwards. (From the preputial sac.)
7. Reduced sensitivity prolongs intercourse, with the larger glans providing more intense vaginal stimulation.
8. Circumcision has a social significance, originating as a tribal mark in antiquity. It has been popular with the British Royal Family, upper classes, and nudists for decades, and is currently favoured by gays.

Disadvantages of Circumcision.

1. Circumcision is not without risk. Complications like uneven skin removal, haemorrhage, and infection can occur. The final effect can occasionally be unsightly, with twisting to one side, painful erection, and even surgically created phimosis.
2. With lost cover and protection, the glans is susceptible to cold conditions (in winter and swimming), sunburn, harmful substances and abrasion (rubbing). (On a personal basis, on harmful substances, I used to quote, as an industrial chemist, that you washed your hands before going to the toilet. Many chemicals are toxic by skin absorption. I found rubbing quite an irritant, especially when the glans sulcus caught in the Y-front opening, leaving the glans trapped outside, rubbed by trouser material with each step. In public there was no chance for relief for considerable endless minutes and hundreds of steps.)

3. Reduced surface sensitivity reduces potential pleasure significantly, added to by the loss of highly sensitive foreskin inner membranes.
4. Masturbation requires more forceful handling, and restricted movement necessitates a change in technique. Lubrication may be necessary to avoid chafing of the scar line or glans rim. (Even Jewesses have preferred foreskins for handling!)
5. Should glans thickness be excessive, intercourse for the woman could be painful; not helped by its dryness and the lack of loose, lubricated folds of foreskin that would reduce friction.
6. The stark uncompromising appearance of the flaccid circumcised penis is often considered stumpy and unnatural. It is instantly identified in showers, changing rooms, urinals, and medical inspections, and even through sheer bathing costumes (when the plump glans has become excessively ridged). Circumcision can produce times of intense embarrassment socially and sexually where foreskins are the norm in a predominately uncircumcised population. The foreskinned penis is more aesthetic, as evidenced by its monopoyn depiction in art.
7. Circumcision is irreversible. Any dissatisfaction cannot be put right by other than rudimentary restoration, taking great effort over several years. Some glans cover, but no properly functioning, fully sensitised prepuce, can be artificially reproduced. Even in the simplest Jewish procedure, a second stage of the operation was introduced as early as 140AD to prevent future attempts at glans coverage by Jews!
8. Being in a physically marked minority, the circumcised person is subject to jibes and ridicule, contemptuous use of the term 'roundhead', ethnic quips and other forms of contempt. Circumcision without religion, or necessity, could prove psychologically harmful to a sensitive person.

Having balanced the 'pros' and 'cons' of being circumcised, and are still in favour of the operation, you should remember it is your penis, and that any cutting would be on your instruction. Do you want to be clean-cut, American style ... tight as a drum, with no residual foreskin; a Gomco clamp method would give a neat result. If sensitivity is important, then all the inner membrane of the foreskin could be retained. Should access to the glans be the aim, a partial circumcision would leave most of the glans covered, and the circumcised state not apparent.

Same Subject — Australian Thesis

In the latest Issue you ask for articles about the pros and cons of circumcision. It happened that I had already written such a piece (for a local baby magazine) which they don't seem to have published (at any rate they hadn't paid me), so I thought I'd send it over to you. It's written from an Australian perspective, of course, but I imagine it would still be of interest.

"Congratulations – it's a boy!"

Now comes the question you may have been expecting – or dreading: should he be circumcised? Here in Australia, twenty years ago you would have been encouraged to say yes; ten years ago you'd have been encouraged to say no. Five years ago you wouldn't even have been asked, but now The Question is being asked again. What should you decide?

Sadly, most of the information (or misinformation) you'll see comes from those with heavy axes to grind. On one side a group called NOCIRC (at least they make their intentions clear) puts out propaganda calling it a mutilation. On the other, various less organised, but more mainstream, campaigners make out that it is as essential as vaccination. Neither is true.

There are medical benefits from circumcision. Circumcision at an early age prevents cancer of the penis. This cancer is uncommon, but generally fatal. Treatment means amputation of all or most of the penis, which is not very pleasant. In Australia, about one uncircumcised man in 1,500 will contract cancer of the penis, generally in later life. Uncircumcised men and boys are much more liable to urinary tract infections. These infections usually just need a course of antibiotics, but they can sometimes have serious consequences. Infections of the head of the penis – medically called balanitis – don't occur in circumcised boys. 10-15% of uncircumcised boys will suffer from these infections, which are uncomfortable but not life threatening. Some individuals are more susceptible to them than others, and even if you decided against circumcision when your boy was born it's worth reconsidering the question if he gets these infections often.

The foreskin of a newborn baby generally cannot be retracted. This is normal, but if it persists beyond the age of four or five it is called phimosis, and a secretion called smegma starts to accumulate under the skin, causing irritation and an unpleasant smell (from a bacterium which infects it). If phimosis continues into his teenage years it will not help his sex life. Around 10% of uncircumcised boys are likely to have this problem (though the figure is higher in some Asian countries). More serious is the case of a tight foreskin which is pulled back and cannot be got forward again (paraphimosis). This is a medical emergency and failure to seek prompt attention can have serious consequences, such as loss of the head of the penis.

These are the only medical problems which are definitely prevented by circumcision. Most other claims, such as the idea that circumcised men are less liable to STD's, belong to the world of fairytale. A few – such as the question of cancer of the cervix (in the wife) and susceptibility to AIDS – must still be regarded as neither proven nor disproven.

What are the medical disadvantages? There is one problem which only affects circumcised babies – ulceration of the meatus (the hole at the end of the penis). This is not common, and requires no more treatment than a mild ointment, but left untreated can lead to narrowing of the opening. Even so, this is rarely sufficient to cause trouble; surgical rectification (a tiny cut) is simple but not often necessary.

This, though, is only part of the story – there are also hazards of the operation itself. The major risks – death, or serious damage to the penis – are very low indeed. Your baby is much more likely to die from a urinary tract infection resulting from being uncircumcised than he is to die from the operation. If you include the risk of cancer in later life, circumcision is hundreds of times safer than having a foreskin. However, the risk either way is very low. It is not comparable to the risks your baby faces if you don't have him immunised against the common infectious diseases.

The risk of less serious complications – haemorrhages, infections etc., is higher, though still lower than the risk of urinary tract infections in uncircumcised babies. But the most common risk is that you (or your son) won't be happy with the end result. In my survey (of which more in a minute) quite a few men and women mentioned minor problems with their own, their lover's, or their son's circumcision. These were either cosmetic defects, such as an uneven cut, unduly prominent scar, or complaints about the style of circumcision (usually not enough skin removed, but occasionally the opposite).

I carried out this survey a few years ago, with the help of Australian Forum magazine and the Family Planning Association. Its aim was to find out the things about circumcision that medical researchers have mostly ignored – how people feel about it, and how it affects their sex life. It found that, if anything, circumcised men and their partners enjoy better sex than uncircumcised. A foreskin was more likely to be a hindrance than a help to a happy sex life. Circumcision didn't make the penis less sensitive, but neither did it reduce the likelihood of premature ejaculation. So you will not be doing any harm to your baby's future sex life by having him circumcised. Equally, provided he is able to retract his foreskin in due course, you won't be doing his sex life any harm by leaving it there. If he isn't able to retract his foreskin – and about one boy in ten will have this problem – he will have to be circumcised in any case. (There are alternatives, but they are generally less successful – worth considering only if you have a deep-rooted objection to circumcision.)

Which brings us to the question, "Should you leave it till later?" Many parents are now taking this line, and as a result many school-age boys are being done. The advantage is that you only need do it if it's necessary, and that the boy can understand what is to be done and why, and contribute his own opinion. The disadvantage is that complications such as bleeding and infection are about ten times more common when circumcision is carried out on older children.

Whichever choice you make, there is a chance that your son will wish you had done the opposite. This is inevitable, but the survey shows that circumcised men were generally happier with their lot than uncircumcised men. In other words, Australian men prefer to be circumcised. However, you can't put a foreskin back, but a man who is unhappy about having one can have it removed. Even so, it is not always easy for a worried teenager to go to his parents or a doctor and say, "I want to be circumcised". The survey brought me several letters from people who desperately wanted to have it done but didn't have the nerve to ask. If you intend your son to choose for himself, make sure he knows the choice is available.

There is no single answer. Circumcision is not something that has to be done for the health and well-being of your baby, but it will be beneficial to his health and well-being. It is easier now than later – but it can be done later, and it can't be undone. If you do have it done, there is the possibility that you – and he – may not be happy with the result. Which way you choose will depend on which factors are more important to you. You do have the choice! Nobody has the right to forbid a minor procedure which will improve your son's chance of survival to a healthy adulthood. Equally, nobody should force you to cut off his foreskin if you want it left – it is a natural part of the body, and the risks aren't all that great.

J.B. – Australia

View From Canada

As a recent subscriber, I can report that your issues have been very interesting so far. I am very interested in the viewpoints of people in other countries. Over the past couple of years, I have undertaken an extensive research project on circumcision, and most of my material has been raised from Canadian and American sources.

From what I have found, the circumcision rate here is still very high, even with insurance companies no longer covering the cost. There is still a very strong push from the medical profession for routine circumcision. There are several methods used here: Gomco clamp, Plastibell, Freehand method, Mogen clamp. The Mogen clamp has recently been touted as the quickest and easiest method. Also recently, some professionals suggest the freehand method should be used more often.

Recent radio and television shows on circumcision have seen hosts and callers pro the cut. Magazines who have polled women readers also found that the cut penis was a positive preference. One magazine ran a feature article on the uncut version. Reader reply mail again was mostly pro the cut.

Of great interest here is the scar left behind – it is found quite erotic by some; is it light or dark; how far up the shaft is it; symmetrical or not? Many see it as a form of body art which is beautiful, as is the fully exposed glans.

I would really appreciate hearing from other readers so I can further my research on the topic, with views and facts/stories from other countries.

Personal views, medical procedures used with end results – and male/female preferences and why. Perhaps correspondence can be sent to me via Acorn. I can certainly supply additional information for future issues.

By the way – what is the meaning of ‘cavalier/roundhead’, and where did they originate. These terms are not used here at all (slang here is cut/uncut).

R.Y. – Canada

[May I start the ball rolling a little. In the west where you come from circumcision is the norm and has been for years, but in the east the French Canadians and the ex-British Island Colonies predominantly favour foreskins. Is there a culture battle over this? We would love to hear more about the circumcision culture, and if you'd like to ask any specific questions, I know that you'd get plenty of response. The cavalier/roundhead slang comes from our last civil war in which King Charles' men wore frilly feathers in their hats, and Oliver Cromwell's men wore round steel helmets. The likeness of these to our cut and uncut states brought about the simile. – D.A.]

Reply To T.H. 6/96

What an incredibly lucky fellow to have had his foreskin retracted for the first time in such an erotic way. I was not so lucky, being taken to the family doctor on numerous (or so it seems) occasions at, I suppose, around the age of 5. He used to retract it, somewhat painfully, and send me on my way with some gauze between the glans and foreskin which my father used to remove later – the gauze, that is!

Eventually my foreskin settled down, but after puberty became very long and loose, overhanging the tip of the glans by a good inch or so when erect. I can sympathise with T.H. because, in my case, when having intercourse, my foreskin would stay still inside the vagina and my glans would move within my foreskin – not too bad for me but not too good for my wife. I assume that T.H.'s predicament is similar.

We found that several things were possible:-

1. One of us hold my foreskin back while having intercourse – uncomfortable and not really practical.
2. Sticking or tying back my foreskin – it worked but not really practical again.
3. Circumcision

Eventually, we opted for 3; at the age of 26, and frankly we have never regretted it. The surgeon did a very good freehand job and, although the remaining inner skin varies in length slightly, the skin remains neatly behind the glans when flaccid, and taut when erect. I have a small amount of frenulum which I would not be without.

I know from the letters in Acorn that circumcision does not suit everyone, but if T.H. is unhappy with his present state then he should seriously consider it. If he could prove to his French girlfriend the benefits from the enlarged glans, corona, and consequent improved stimulation of her vagina, then he might well overcome her prejudices.

Frenulum Thoughts

Presumably, the intention behind the design of the penis was that the foreskin was provided to protect the sensitive glans, which, by the same token, could be exposed when required for action. In order to ensure that the protective foreskin returned to cover the glans once its required function was fulfilled, the frenulum was created to pull the foreskin forward again. It does not appear, to me at least, to serve any other purpose.

I have carried out some experiments on my own cock to try and give some idea of what difference it would make if my frenulum were no longer attached. With a full erection, and foreskin retracted as far as possible, the tension on my frenulum is clearly apparent, and on release my foreskin immediately begins to return to rest at the rim of my glans. However, if, instead, I press the tip of my glans downwards, thereby relieving the tension on my frenulum, my foreskin is then quite happy to remain where it is, without moving forward towards the glans. I wonder if any members have any direct experience of an uncircumcised penis with detached frenulum, and what difference the detachment has made?

I was fascinated to read about I.D.'s restored foreskin and would like to ask one or two questions about it. Has he managed to achieve that slightly adhesive quality which exists between the underside of the foreskin and the glans? I occasionally use a technique to tuck part of my foreskin back under itself, which obviously has the effect of exposing a greater amount of my glans, and what little part of it is still covered is in direct contact with the outer surface of my foreskin. I have found that no matter how long I leave it like that, the same adhesive-type quality is never achieved, presumably because of the different nature of the skin on the outer surface of the foreskin – and I wonder whether this is a problem with a restored foreskin?

As he presumably doesn't possess a frenulum to do the job for him, does he experience problems in keeping his foreskin forward or, if he lifts it into an upright position, does his foreskin simply fall backwards with the effect of gravity? Similarly, is he still able to achieve the same circumcised appearance as previously, or has the stretching affected the elasticity of his foreskin so that it simply falls forward again?

Finally, has he noticed any change in the texture and sensitivity of his glans as a result of the protection it is now getting?

Line Drawings

Requests are always coming in for pictures and drawings. I've explained previously how difficult it is to transpose pictures, especially coloured ones, into our format. A member sent me in a couple of pages from the magazine Arena covering a debate on circumcision. Two whole pages, one each, was given to two photographs of penises, one natural and one circumcised. I asked a lady friend of mine to make two line drawings of the photographs and these are the results. I liked the photographs because they seemed to me to be typical of each type in repose, the ruckle of skin in the sulcus of the circumcised and the foreskin not quite covering the whole of the glans.

Comments On Last Issue (6/96)

Regarding the last newsletter, I should be delighted to receive any letters to initiate correspondence: it would be nice to get to know some of our members. In view of your comments about letters being sent back, I am a little chary about initiating correspondence in case they fall into unwelcome hands.

On page 2, one of the originals, Bill, remarks on the sebaceous glands. I have always made a point of looking for these when examining a penis. My findings are that when circumcision is done at birth, these are very atrophied and hardly visible compared to an uncircumcised penis. On mine, cut as an adult, and only completely exposed since my radical cut some 15 years ago, I still have the knobbly remains of the glands. Not as obvious as they were in my uncut days, but still evident.

One suggestion with regard to getting new members. May I suggest you place an advert in H & E Magazine. There are a lot of people, both male and female, with an interest (as I know), and I'm sure we could easily double our membership.

On page 13 – the frenulum debate. I suggest you remind members about the letter I sent from Amanda (via H & E) in which she snips her boyfriend's frenulum to such good result.

Finally, I am getting sick and tired of these NORM people (R.B.W.) constantly on their soap box. It's about time we who enjoy our cut state should do a bit of tub thumping and get articles printed in such mags as Cosmopolitan. It's all too much one-sided.

Bob – Surrey

[I can only print what I am sent. In Issue 4/96, I wrote an article in which I described the delights of a foreskin without once slagging circumcision. Could not some circumcised members do the same regarding their own cocks, as they surely give just as much pleasure in a different way. You might note that in this issue there is a bias towards circumcision, which is how things turned out this time. – D.A.]

Hello everybody! We now enter another year – our tenth, and I don't have to ask if any of the enthusiasm for the subject of penises has waned. It seems that once it's in us, generally from boyhood, it stays forever, and, whatever anyone may say, it is generally healthy. My only hope is that everyone can be happy with what they've got, or can change what they don't like, without duress, one way or the other.

At last I feel that the long survey is ready for distribution and it will be going out first to those who have already renewed their subscription. I'd like a 100% take up, which shouldn't be difficult as it will only take a few minutes and can be totally anonymous.

I know I keep repeating this, but we are always requiring material for the newsletter. If everyone made an effort to send in just one piece over the year it would be great. It doesn't have to be long or a masterpiece. Everyone could write something starting with one of these; I noticed the difference first... My first sexual experience... I found out how to masturbate when... My biggest sexual embarrassment was... How I felt about my status when a boy... etc.

As you'll see, we've had a take up again of 'Contact Corner'. Please use it if you wish, and don't be embarrassed to state all your interests, just like the second one in this issue, as members then are left in no doubt about your requirements.

Finally, if you have any problems at all, including lack of self-esteem through the way you view yourself, loneliness, rejection – any of the rough things of life, or anything physical, please let us know. Who knows, we may be able to help and we've masses of support.

Chinese Non-Circumcision

A propos of your claim that the Chinese do not generally circumcise (8/96), I can offer this personal experience. I trained at a gym (and showered) for three years with a Chinese man I assumed was circumcised. One morning I explained to him that I couldn't come to the gym the following day because I was going to a "bris", and explained that this was a Jewish ceremony involving cutting the skin off the end of the boy's penis. I then added, "You must have had the same operation." My friend said that this wasn't the case. He had had a foreskin until puberty, when one night it had retracted of its own accord. His penis, he said, "opened like a flower." It was quite painful for a few days. He added that this happened to most boys of the same age in China.

Parental Rights – Parental Duties

There is a very strong suggestion these days, emanating particularly from the NOCIRC camp in America, that parents do not have the right to have their sons circumcised. We even hear of sons threatening to sue their parents for assault in having had the operation performed, although I have yet to hear of such a case being successful. I think therefore that the situation in which the parents of a newborn child find themselves vis-a-vis circumcision bears some analysis.

The first point which should be made about the circumcision decision is that it is a decision for life, whether it is for or against the cut. We often hear that leaving the child intact effectively places choice in the boy's own hands. When he is an adult, he can himself determine whether or not he wishes to be circumcised. I believe that the so-called choice which is being preserved is illusionary. Picture the 18-year-old, newly arrived in adulthood. Are the arguments for or against circumcision put to him? Is there literature available which explains clearly to him the advantages and disadvantages, what the operation would involve, and how to obtain it? Of course not. And if the 18-year-old, in his wisdom or foolishness, decides he wishes to be circumcised, how should he proceed? He will get little help from his GP unless there are definite medical indications, with no chance of a referral to a consultant or an operation on the NHS. If he is streetwise, persistent and can accumulate a fair sized pot of money, he can go to a private clinic. But how many 18-year-olds have the knowledge and experience, let alone the funds, required to pursue this course? We must face the fact that, although adult circumcision remains a theoretical option, for most it is never a realistic choice. In practice, if a father leaves his son uncircumcised at birth, the son is highly likely to die with foreskin still intact. To circumcise or not to circumcise, either way it is in effect a choice for life.

But suppose that the father is convinced by the arguments in favour of circumcision. Suppose he takes seriously the evidence that urinary tract infection, with consequent kidney damage, is more prevalent in uncircumcised than circumcised boys, evidence which persuaded the American Academy of Pediatrics to revert to advising in favour of circumcision. Suppose the father is persuaded by the prophylactic arguments: that circumcision will prevent phimosis, paraphimosis, balanitis and other diseases of the foreskin which can require surgical intervention in up to 10% of boys and men: that circumcision gives added (but by no means complete) protection against venereal disease and AIDS. Suppose the father thinks that circumcision is an aid to genital hygiene, knowing that the fact that a foreskin is retractable is no guarantee that it will be retracted and cleaned on any regular basis.

If a father is convinced by all these arguments, what is he to do? Wait until his son reaches adulthood and deprive him of the benefits of circumcision for 18 years? Surely, if he believes that he is acting in the best interest of the child, he has a duty to have him circumcised.

In our society, people are often placed in positions of authority which give them the right to influence or direct how others act. In the place of work, the employer determines how the employee shall act during work hours. Police officers have the power to arrest; judges and magistrates the power to imprison; and prison officers the power to confine. In all walks of life, people are daily taking decisions which will affect the lives of many others for better or worse.

This is particularly true of the parent. A parent's responsibility is awesome. For an extended period of time, the child is totally within the parent's sphere of power and influence. Decisions have to be taken daily, hourly, on behalf of that child, when there is no certainty that those decisions will be right. Children are indoctrinated into the religious, cultural and social mores of the parents. If a child is born into the Christian, Jewish or Moslem faith, he may drift into indifference, or atheism; very few will cross the boundary between one religion and another. The education chosen for the child will significantly affect his ways of thinking and his opportunities in later life. The diet chosen, the environment in which he lives, whether or not his parents smoke, all are likely to have a significant influence on his future and well-being. There are even routine medical decisions to take – to immunise or not, for instance; whether to risk the possibility of damage through inoculation in return for the protection offered against serious disease.

Nevertheless, these responsibilities are borne lightly. People weigh up the pros and cons, take a measured decision and act for what they hope will be the best. There can never be any certainty that a decision will be right; if such certainty existed, no decision would be required. Nor is inaction necessarily a valid option; always to do nothing as a matter of policy is a decision in itself, and will many times bring results infinitely worse than if a positive decision for change had been made. Life is uncertain and full of risk. Most of the time we accept that risk – we still drive cars even though we know the relatively high chance of an accident. We trade that chance against the advantages of speedier and more convenient travel. In medicine, all drugs have side effects for some people. After rigorous trials, a drug is accepted for clinical use, even though it is known that its effect on some patients will be deleterious. And when we are that individual who is affected, we rail against the system, feel ourselves ill-used and demand compensation. Such personal anger is justified, but it is against the fates that we should fulminate, not against those who took decisions in good faith and with the best possible evidence. As humans we crave certainty when there is no such thing.

There is little doubt that the actions of parents have a profound influence on the child, for better or worse. The parents must take these actions and decisions. The child cannot be left uneducated until adulthood to decide for himself the education he wishes to receive. The child cannot be raised in a religious or cultural vacuum. If immunisation is delayed, the protective shield is lost. Mankind depends upon each generation being raised to succeed its parents and to take its responsibilities in turn. The responsibility for raising the next generation has, from time immemorial, been given to the current generation. We, as individuals, may not like what our parents did: “They fuck you up, your mum and dad...”, as Philip Larkin so eloquently put it. But who can doubt that most parents act as responsibly as possible towards their children., caring for, and nurturing them to the best of their ability, accepting as part of that role the necessity to take decisions on behalf of their children, and to act positively for their children whenever such action is required.

In this context, circumcision is just one of many decisions which a father must take on behalf of his son. Society has given him the right to act. It is his duty to take that action in what he deems to be the best interests of his son. If he is convinced of the merits of circumcision, he has the duty to confer those benefits on his son. To do otherwise is to surrender his role, to abnegate his responsibility, to fail to act as a true father.

Awakening

Being circumcised makes me feel cross, due to the fact that it was an amputation to a part of 'my' body in which I was not able to give my consent. Because of others' fears and concerns I am left un-whole. The procedure is also inhuman towards infants, who greatly feel the pain. I believe being circumcised robs me of a 'fully' intact functional penis.

Foreskins are beautiful! Perhaps those with them feel differently. I believe the foreskin is there for protection, pleasure, sensitivity, lubrication and 'privacy'. A penis with a foreskin is like a beautifully wrapped parcel, and what a wonderful surprise some of the contents can be (as seen from magazines and videos).

I have heard of the success stories of men who have regained their foreskins through devices that 'stretch' the skin back into place over a period of time. As one of my New Year's Resolutions I hope to achieve this also.

Ever since I can remember I have been curious about other men's penises. I was never taught about sex from my parents; never given the 'talk' by my father about what to expect when my body started to change during puberty. When these changes occurred, I felt strange and didn't realise this was normal. I grew up with fears about my body and became very insecure, which I am still trying to overcome.

Growing up in a very large city, one would think that I would have seen 'all kinds of men in the flesh'. I am sort of shy, and embarrass easily. The only way I was able to see what men looked like without their clothes on was by frequenting porn cinemas and buying magazines. Many of these men were 'idealised' and far from what a normal man was said to have looked like.

Last Christmas, I spent time with a friend in London and experienced seeing a real penis other than my own. It was also my first sexual experience and helped to break down many of my fears and misconceptions of how a man's body should or should not look. I enjoyed all aspects of our fortnight and wanted to safely try everything and anything possible. He said it was like opening 'Pandora's Box', and being that he was older, was not up to any of the kinkier things. That first time was very special to me.

Because this was my first sexual experience, it is only fair to claim myself as a bisexual. I say this, not for any fear of being labelled as gay, but more for the fact that all I want is a relationship with a person, either male or female, who is genuine, and would care for me as I would in return. Personally, I would rather find a nice guy, someone with whom I could explore further. I find it sexier to explore and grow with a partner than to have multiple partners. But who am I to say, since I have not really experienced either.

Thank God for the ability to fantasise, and yet it is still quite lonely. I love to masturbate, especially with a good lubricant. I really find it erotic, and love to feel and see my hand slipping over my shaft and glans. This would be an extraordinary bond with another man, lover, or even several men. Also to learn and see other techniques. Other rubbing techniques excite me also, especially using someone's stationary palm or foot, and not to leave out 'penis'!

I would like to start exposing myself to others – (OK – I'd better start this again). I would like to be more in tune with others who have the same feelings as I do. Having just moved to the Midlands from Scotland, I feel alone and isolated, and hope greatly to find others who are genuine with similar interests. What I really wish is to build further my confidence level, and this would greatly help whilst around those who are understanding.

I hope that I haven't evaded the main topic – that is the last thing I want to do! I just feel that at the moment I have not had enough experiences to say, "I only like..." or "the penises that...", da blah de blah de blah. I feel the rewards are greater once one has seen what is out there, and for the most part, if the penis happens to be big, little, fat, skinny, circumcised or uncircumcised, it doesn't matter. I truly feel all that matters is that it's attached to a genuine guy with a good sense of humour, who is understanding, caring, daring, and who likes to try new things. Am I asking too much?

I have so many other questions and feelings, with great hopes to share them with others in the near future.

Two Replies To D.T.'s 'Learning the Hard Way' 6/96

I am French and I have some reasons to suspect that 'La Florentina' means anal sex.

But outside of that, I believe that you would have to read "Bagwan shree Rajneesh" or "asha Rajneesh", the guru of the Oronge people. Somewhere he explains that you can have more intense sexual pleasure without orgasm. I personally tried it and found it to be true. The first time I fucked, restraining my orgasm, I felt that I was giving up my soul. The second time it was less hard, and the third time it was OK, and I had more pleasure without orgasm.

Some people learn how to do it as above, but some people tend to do it unconsciously. It may not be so in your case, but one never knows, it could be.

But for that one has to know meditation, and the first part of meditation is relaxation, and plenty of doctors could teach you that.

J-P. – France

You pose a question about what you describe as 'La Fiorentina' and which a friend had mentioned to you but then failed to discuss or detail for your benefit. As soon as I read your letter my memory clogged with something I had read years ago and I actually turned up the book concerned. Alex Comfort, in his book, Joy of Sex, page 180 of the updated and extended 1986 print, states this, but under a slightly different title:-

Florentine – Coitus a la Florentine – intercourse with the woman holding the man's penile skin (and foreskin if he has one) forcibly back with finger and thumb at the root of the penis and keeping it stretched back all the time, both in and out. Excellent way of speeding up ejaculation, and greatly boosts intensity of male sensation if you get the tension right.

This I think is the answer to your main question, but if I had the time now I'd say a lot more on it, also how to perfect the technique yourself when alone, and also use it during or after extended intercourse.

You also mention your love of wanking and how you feel you have desensitised yourself. Whilst I am now cut, having had the benefit of an ample foreskin and also shared your loves, I can understand why it is so appealing. I'd merely say here that perhaps you are being unnecessarily hard on yourself, and perhaps in fact you are misunderstanding what is happening and why.

Take this item of advice from Dr Ray Hamble who advises on male problems (and is a member of the Society too), that wanking as much as possible, (and more besides), can't be bad, both with or in the absence of shared sex. In other words it is a form of sex in itself, but has got a bad press by others not sharing enlightenment.

Indonesia

An item and reply culled from the Internet by Vernon.

Muslim interest springs from working in Indonesia for many years where Muslim circumcision ceremonies are a festive event and very public. The concept of being uncircumcised is unthinkable. While I have observed many of these ceremonies I am interested to learn of other cultures' methods of circumcision. In Indonesia it is done by a member of the mosque using an implement that resembles a pair of scissors, though I have seen it done in villages with the equivalent of a cut-throat razor. Generally the circumcision is done to boys between the ages of 6 and 10.

John Phillips <antique@gist.net.au>

Most of the comment you wrote about Indonesian circumcision are right, but as you know, Indonesia has thousands of different cultures, so in some parts the boys are circumcised between the ages of 6 and 10, in others, before 6, some over 15, etc. but for sure it is very rare to find circumcision performed on the newborn, maybe because it is an initiation and also a mark that we are become true Moslem from now on (like baptism in Christians).

Circumcision in Indonesia has now become more and more popular. Even the non-Moslems (mainly Indonesian-Chinese) are also having circumcision shortly after puberty. They just go to the doctor alone or with friends (no parents) and ask for it.

To be uncircumcised is a bit embarrassing and for sure some of our friends will tease us (during childhood). Even when you grow older they will still ask if you have been done or not, so sometimes you have no choice but to lie or have it done.

Books

Recommended books to all who are interested in background reading on Acorn-associated matters, particularly from a historical viewpoint.

First, a Victorian classic, My Secret Life by Walter. There are three major background points to make about the Victorian times through which Walter lived and fornicated. Firstly, circumcision was unknown, secondly, ladies did not wear knickers, and thirdly, the WC had not been invented!

Walter discovered early in life that he had a tight foreskin. His first recollection at the age of 7 or 8 was of his nursemaid continually playing with his penis and trying to pull his foreskin back when she took it out for him to pee, causing him to feel pain as his prick tip showed. Once she also masturbated herself with his hand as she played with his foreskin.

Later, he and his cousin Fred took a pee against a hedge, and when they compared cocks he found he could pull Fred's foreskin back and forward, but not his own, causing Fred to jeer at him for having a tight skin. The same thing happened at school and he developed an inferiority complex over his foreskin.

Walter then finds that one of the maids does not object to him putting his hand up her skirt and feeling her vulva, and in return she would feel his cock and try to pull his foreskin back, without success. As a result, Walter worried about his foreskin, thinking the maid would think it odd and that he would not be able to have sex.

When eventually he was old enough to seduce a young maidservant, his foreskin got quite sore from her handling of it and from the vigorous act of copulation, so he asked the advice of a chemist who told him he could have a snip (a minor dorsal slit to relieve the restriction) or just leave it – it would stretch of its own accord. Walter wisely decided to leave it and sure enough it soon started functioning normally. Circumcision was not on the menu in those days.

Walter grew up obsessed with sexuality and, in particular, the size of the male member and the function of the female organ, particularly how women peed. The fact that there were no WC's in those days made it sensible for women to wear no knickers, since it was quite normal for them to pee in the street. Walter tells how he followed three housewives, who had been celebrating, as they went round a back street for a pee, and induced them to let him watch. After offering them half-a-crown apiece they agreed and each lifted her dress and peed in front of him, letting him feel their pussies as they did so, which made it go everywhere. Afterwards, each in turn held his penis, one pulling his foreskin back as he did the same thing. He talks of his amazement at seeing one woman sit on her heels with her long skirt hiked up to her waist, laughing at his confusion as she propelled a cascade of urine six feet out in front of her before it hit the ground.

Later he spends a page or two philosophising about what most turns younger women on sexually, and came to the conclusion that it is the sight of a big pego, and the opportunity of sliding the foreskin back and forward to reveal the knob.

A century later, Walter had a female rival who did her best to follow his example as a sexual athlete, but whereas he claimed to have serviced over a thousand women, she only managed a couple of hundred men. The woman in question, Anais Nin, was a true nymphomaniac who wrote prolifically about her sexual achievements in her diaries, recently published as Henry and June. She claims to have slept with five men in one day – and then masturbated afterwards. She said she felt guilty afterwards – about masturbating! Her husband apparently was fairly happy about her sexual activities, providing she avoided confronting him with them. One of her lovers was her own father, Joachin Nin, who apparently abused her sexually as a young girl. But instead of hating him for it, she was grateful to him for introducing her to the world of sex, and it was she who seduced him later on in life. These episode are mentioned in The Erotic Life of Anais Nin by Noel Riley Fitch.

The most prominent of her lovers was the notorious American author, Henry Miller, who wrote such classics as The Tropic of Cancer, describing his (and her) sexual activities in the grossest of four letter terms: he had an adolescent obsession with “cunt”, which was the only thing about a woman that interested him. He would definitely not be a cult figure in today's feminist environment. This didn't worry Anais at all, who took pleasure in his brutal lovemaking and encouraged him to write “books to be read one-handed”, as she described them. She showed her gratitude to him for giving her sexual fulfilment by picking up all his household bills (courtesy of a rich husband).

Henry Miller described Anais as a foreskin hunter, saying she wore a necklace of imaginary foreskins as an emblem of her conquests. She apparently preferred sleeping with Henry who was uncircumcised to her husband who had the overdeveloped mushroom glans associated with the roundhead, which she found uncomfortable. Henry was quite proud of his foreskin, but, as he describes in his book, he nearly lost it to the urgent persuasion of an American doctor friend. This fellow would not stop hounding him to get rid of it, although there was nothing wrong with it (although it was rather long), ignoring Henry's protests that it gave him no problems. Eventually, despite Henry's reluctance, this doctor tried to force the issue by making an appointment for him at the clinic to be circumcised. (What is it with these guys?) Anyway, Henry suddenly took stock at the last moment, and with Anais's energetic and vocal support, told his ex-friend to piss off, saying he had decided to keep his precious foreskin.

In her diaries, Anais described how she embarrassed a new lover, half her age, she had just met, by pulling the petals of a rosebud back and making – in a public place – suggestive remarks associating her actions to the fact that she intended to pull his foreskin back for him when they got home. As well as being a self-confessed foreskin fancier, she was also hooked on oral sex – both giving and receiving – and said how much she enjoyed drinking sperm.

Another Sort Of Book

Had to write and tell you that I've just bought and read Circumcision – a Guide to a Decision. A most interesting little publication.

Initially, it purports to be completely unbiased, setting out the pro's, maybe's and con's in a cogent and easily assimilating fashion, to help one decide – one way or the other. I don't think anyone who wasn't more pro than con would buy it in the first place, and, if you're considering it, you don't really want anyone to say, "No – don't do it". Anyway, by the appendix, the author is declaring himself virtually 100% in favour. So much for unbiased advice! This is not a criticism of the author, or the booklet – it's just that the content, for the most part, is 'A Guide to a Positive Decision'.

One or two points caught my eye in particular. One – the categorical statement circumcision will lead to an increase in glans dimensions (even if one already makes a consistent practice of wearing the skin back???). Also, under 'hygiene', the declaration that 'circumcision renders the penis permanently clean' (with no other attention whatsoever, on circumcision the penis is somehow made magically, permanently clean???)

New to me, but with the right ring of truth about it, is the idea that a long-foreskinned cock is 'infantile', and, 'a failure of normal development' – in nearly half of the male population... This is an interesting selling point for circumcision – hopefully encouraging a guy that he would look more of a man if he had his 'little boy's skin cut away'. To most of us, at least, little boys don't look sexy. Uncut guys do, but only when they have a hard-on. Cut guys virtually all the time. Moral – if you want to look more sexy – which you do, don't you – just eliminate that redundant scrap of skin.

Where you have a medical/religious rite which has been around for in excess of 3,000 years, performed by men, on men, perhaps initially at upper levels of society and its bravest warriors, is such a practice, if it is likely to interfere with sexual performance, going to last that long? I think not. Therefore, it seems that whilst some would say there really is no good reason to get circumcised, if one is so inclined, there is, conversely, no good reason not to be circumcised.

Sensitivity

One reads so much on the topic of 'sensitivity', or rather 'loss of sensitivity' of the circumcised penis and writers never seem to be able to decide whether there is any loss at all. I would have thought that the obvious thing to do to find out, is to ask anyone circumcised as an adult. I had thought I could have contributed here to what they did not know. However, I was very surprised to read in the introductory letter that membership is about 66% circumcised (mostly as adults). It appears that there is a vast amount who could contribute to the so-called 'loss of sensitivity' debate. I do hope there will be articles in the newsletter by some of them on their reasons for circumcision as an adult.

Comments On Issue 8/96

1 Anthony's "Prospective Owners Guide" quotes a figure of 9% as the UK circumcision rate. This is equivalent to 1 in 11 being circumcised. I don't know where he got this figure from as all the evidence I have seen, including my own observations of men and boys, puts the rate at about 1 in 7, ie around 14%. That clinics are now openly advertising circumcision on peak hour commercial radio seems to indicate that there is a considerable demand which had not hitherto been satisfied. It seems likely that the circumcised proportion will grow in the future rather than diminish further. Any official figures for circumcision rate must greatly understate the facts by 2-3 times, since there are probably more circumcisions performed privately (in clinics, by mohelim, and in doctors' own surgeries) than are done in NHS hospitals and thus included in official statistics.

2. His reference to circumcision being favoured by gays is irrelevant since gay men are as equally divided on its merits as are heterosexuals. This was obviously intended to be a damnation of circumcision by association.

3. Unless a man is in the habit of ignoring his wife's feelings, and just 'sticking it in' without any form of foreplay, there is going to be little difference in friction, etc. during penetration between circumcised and uncircumcised. During erection, the average foreskin retracts to be fully behind the coronal rim of the glans. Foreplay will almost always result in the glans and inner foreskin being dried out considerably from the damp state they were in before erection. Lubrication is primarily provided by the female herself, with a contribution from the man's pre-cum.

If, on the other hand, the foreskin is so long and tight that it has not retracted at full erection, then it will be most likely that the penis will be inserted into the vagina with the foreskin still over the glans. There will be no contribution to lubrication from the outer skin of the foreskin. A number of wives of uncircumcised men with long foreskins, have complained that their partner's foreskin simply sticks to the walls of the vagina and he virtually masturbates himself inside the foreskin without giving her much pleasure.

4. Although I am a member of the circumcised minority, I have never been the subject of adverse comments about my circumcised state, and neither has any other circumcised male I know. This basically just doesn't happen in Britain the way the opposite is said to occur in the USA.

5. In the line drawings submitted by David I would not have immediately recognised the left hand picture as being a circumcised penis. I saw it as typical of a flaccid uncircumcised penis with the foreskin retracted. Whilst my own infant circumcision is far from complete, the remnant of foreskin doesn't lie in rucked up folds as shown, but instead forms something more akin to the cup of an acorn. A properly performed circumcision would have removed a bit more foreskin anyway, so as to leave the coronal ridge and groove permanently free of foreskin.

[It was a drawing from a photo. If you look at the film Dick, showing hundreds of American cocks, your hypothesis would make it clear that the great majority of men in the US all have foreskins. — D.A.]

Medical Fetish

My initial sexual experience (if it can be called that) took place many years ago at a school medical examination when I was thirteen or so. After the school nurse had completed the usual sight and hearing tests etc. I was introduced to an elderly retired(?) doctor who proceeded to conduct a very thorough and comprehensive genital examination. The inevitable occurred – I developed a ferocious erection and the medic expertly masturbated me into a pile of tissues he had conveniently standing by.

The experience was stimulating and arousing whilst being shocking and embarrassing at the same time, and I cannot deny I found it intensely exciting. When I had a college entrance medical at 19, the same thing happened as I once more became engorged and the middle-aged doctor commented strongly.

A circumcision at thirty followed with the usual 'swellings' and a more than clinical approach being adopted by that (older) doctor.

The problem, if indeed there is a problem, is that I am now seemingly hooked on so-called intimate examinations, and tend to see specialists up to four times a year. As I go privately and they are well paid (my health insurance covers the cost) do you see any problems occurring with my fetish? So far, the urologists I have seen have been all too keen to be a part of the charade and indeed, some reciprocate fiercely.

Do you think I am compromising their medical standing or integrity, as I would hate there to be repercussions? Also, are male patients of this nature rare, as I gather the female of the species is the more prevalent, and often problematical?

K.G. – London

[I would think that if you like it and they like it and no one grasses, then everyone should be happy. I'd love to know more detail, such as your excuses for going and what does 'reciprocate fiercely' fully mean. Any other comments from members? — D.A.]

Sky TV And Circumcision

Recently, while watching a programme from Granada called Health & Beauty, there came a half-hour slot called "Appointment with the Surgeon". Under review were the following subjects: Malaria, Breast Cancer and Circumcision. The first two topics were dealt with at length, with diagrams, photographs and a discussion by a panel of interested parties. When it was time to talk about circumcision, we were treated to a 1-2 minute dialogue by the surgeon (I didn't note his name) without any illustrations, or participation by others. The surgeon gave his viewers the following information:

Circumcision is carried out for religious or medical reasons. Most people think that the Jews invented circumcision, but this is false. They picked it up from the Babylonians, who in turn had picked it up from the tribes of West Africa. Non-religious circumcision is carried out on men and boys for only one reason – a foreskin that will not retract. For both groups it is a day procedure, although men are usually given a general anaesthetic. Where boys are concerned, they have a sore willy for 2 or 3 days. The procedure is very traumatic for their mothers as the willy looks as if it had been shut in a door. Adults have a worse time of it. They get erections while asleep (don't boys!!) and this is very painful. The adult willy doesn't heal for 3 to 4 weeks, and if during this period the owner is so foolish as to make love, he only has himself to blame for the consequences. The surgeon then looked straight at the camera and pronounced, "Circumcision, the cruelest cut of all". My wife commented, "Utterly ridiculous!" I couldn't have put it better.

I can't remember seeing a more disgracefully biased programme in my life. Why wasn't the well-documented reduction in urinary infection as a result of this benign operation touched on? The likely, if as yet not 100% proven, fact that circumcision may give a significantly better chance of avoiding AIDS was not touched on. Nobody with an opinion on the matter was questioned, and no traumatised mothers were to be seen. Can you explain to me why there is this conspiracy in the UK to put down circumcision? I am completely baffled.

Moving on, I have read every issue of our newsletter, and really appreciate the work that you put into it. However, in my opinion it ought to be a celebration of circumcision. Unfortunately there seems to be a surfeit of wingeing letters from people who seek foreskin restoration for example. It is hard for me to feel sympathy, as the first 20 years of my life was ruined by the possession of one, but there you are. Then there are the nymphomaniac grandmothers who love long, tight foreskins and the hints that circumcision may cause homosexuality. I know that you try very hard for a balanced content, and I don't want to sound negative considering the great service that the newsletter provides, but perhaps you could make it a little more pro-circumcision in the future.

A Cut Below

Part of an article from the magazine MAXIM

Although circumcision may be performed for medical reasons, some doctors now question how often the operation is justified. If the foreskin's too tight, they argue that less drastic alternatives, such as stretching or loosening, should be tried first.

In the past, medical evaluation of the surgery has been delayed by the enthusiasm of its supporters, and a fear that any criticism might be seen as anti-Semitic. But, as we reach the end of the 20th century, even some Jews are beginning to question the desirability of a practice which, they're taught, is a vital part of their cultural identity and an essential covenant with God.

Their dilemma is understandable – it's difficult to question a custom sanctioned by 3,000 years of tribal experience and sanctified by religion. However, the truth is that the rite is not an essential part of Judaism. Put bluntly, it's an act of mutilation from a primitive biblical world where God demanded human sacrifice – more akin to cutting off the hand of a thief than the welcome a new-born child might expect on entering the world. The question increasingly being asked is: does this sort of practice belong in modern society?

In fact, medical opinion in Britain has been turning against circumcision since as long ago as 1949. Before the war some 30% of British men were circumcised, mostly around the time of birth. In the 1950s circumcision of new-borns declined rapidly to 20%; these days only around 7% of boys are circumcised, mostly for medical reasons.

In the US, however, circumcision remains the norm – around two-thirds of men are circumcised. (Take a quick peek at an American sex book and, if you've got a foreskin, you could feel distinctly unfashionable.) Many American doctors still believe it is cleaner and healthier to have the operation. But their views often seem to be based on the religious idea that the uncircumcised are unclean in a ritual sense – and medical argument is then used in an attempt to justify and objectify it. Close examination, however, shows there is absolutely no scientific basis for this view.

Smegma, the normal secretion of the healthy penis, accumulates under the foreskin, and certainly smells if it's not washed away regularly. Maybe that explains why it has been readily endowed with unhealthy attributes. Cancer of the penis, for example, was thought to be caused by accumulation of smegma on the uncircumcised penis, and cancer of the cervix by the transfer of smegma during intercourse.

It's true that these cancers are rare among Jews – but then, cancer of the penis is less common among rarely circumcised Swedes than among Americans who've generally had the op. Other studies have failed to show that cervical cancer is any more frequent in women whose partners are uncircumcised, even when the number of previous lovers is taken into account. It's now widely recognised that this particular cancer is caused by a virus transmitted through secretions during sexual activity, as with cancer of the penis. Possession of a foreskin makes no difference at all.

Indeed, none of the claims made today by its supporters – that circumcision promotes good health – make any more sense than the 19th-century belief that a man with a foreskin was likely to masturbate more frequently, causing madness.

As a former nurse in a GUM (Genito-urinary medicine) department of a major hospital, I was privileged (if that's the right word!) to see, touch and examine more penises than most other females, except maybe an enthusiastic call girl. I have been reading Acorn for some time, often with a smile on my lips, but also with a lot of interest and some sympathy with those who write such unhappy letters about their penile state. If only you men could all be granted the sexual organs you would like to have, the world would be so much happier (thank heavens women don't seem to have this problem).

One point mentioned in a previous copy of the newsletter was the difference in attitude to circumcision between urologists, who are sometimes pro and paediatricians who are solidly anti. I couldn't agree more, but this is an oversimplification, and the situation needs to be discussed. Firstly, although a lot of senior urologists favour circumcision, it is nearly always the case that they are circumcised themselves; what they were taught in their student days was very different from what they are taught now, and medicine being one of the most hidebound and conservative of the professions, they would hardly admit that they were wrong – or admit that they themselves had been done unnecessarily.

Most younger specialists are intact (I speak from experience of a select cross-section!) and they take a different attitude entirely, having lived with a foreskin all their lives, and thus being able to separate fact from fantasy. After all, the vast majority of men go through life with a foreskin, without the need or inclination to get rid of it. In addition, a large proportion of urologists these days are women, and they are even more reluctant to circumcise.

The facts speak for themselves. Nowadays, conservative procedures (such as steroid creams and minor surgery which removes no tissue) are well understood on the continent, and are so effective in preventing foreskin problems that, except in cases of BXO, circumcisions need hardly ever be done. It seems scandalous, but these procedures are unknown to the vast majority of British GPs, a lot of whom refer kids for circumcision unnecessarily. The fact that so many such circumcisions are still entertained can be laid at the door of the older, dyed-in-the-wool specialists who refuse to update themselves and accept modern methods. But they too are becoming cautious at the possibility of court cases brought, not through the British courts which tend to sit on the fence, but the European Court which sets a lot of store by the rights of the individual – and has no experience of circumcision.

Certainly, over the years, I have seen some heartbreaking cases where men have been so horribly disfigured that they finish up virtually impotent for life. I have seen men with too much skin removed causing pain and distortion on erection: blood vessel damage giving rise to an agonising haematoma on erection (an 18 year-old kid, sadly suicidal), and appalling botch jobs which serve as a living monument to criminally ham-fisted surgery.

I remember being lectured once on the advantages of circumcision to men from the hygiene point of view, with the danger of smegma build-up being stressed. I mentioned this later to a female specialist and she just laughed. She told me to go away, get a mirror and look under my own prepuce and tell her what I found. The point being that in normal washing of the vulva, the foreskin of the clitoris does not usually get retracted, and smegma can, and does, build up there – because it is entirely natural and no one any the worse for it!

It is now recognised that medicine has advanced a long way since the days of M&B tablets, D&C ops and tonsillectomies, which are recognised to have achieved absolutely nothing, whilst latterly, hysterectomies and episiotomies have been largely put in the same category, not without opposition from those old fashioned consultants who are unable to accept rationalisation and modern methods. It is clear that circumcision also comes into this category, and in medical circles in this country it is now widely recognised that it causes more problems than it cures.

As far as non-medical operations are concerned, female circumcision has been banned in most countries, including UK, for years, and the docking of puppy dogs' tails has recently been outlawed on the grounds of cruelty to animals. Meanwhile, little boys' foreskins are still to some extent fair game for the dwindling number of doctors prepared to operate. Perhaps this has something to do with the fact that we have a Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, but only a National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children.

Marjorie Mitchell

Speculations

I have just been reading through some back editions of the magazine, which has prompted some speculative thoughts to come to mind on the effects of circumcision on society. Being circumcised myself, it has struck me that, throughout my life, most of my friends and most of those I would have liked to be friends with, have also been circumcised. I cannot work out if this is a class problem or whether being circumcised leads to a friendlier disposition, or some sort of common outlook on life. Have any other readers noticed anything like this?

My working life was spent at various collieries – coalmining I suspect being thought of as a fairly down-to-earth and working class profession. Yet I have always been impressed by the friendliness of the mining community. I have also noticed that a higher proportion than I would have suspected were circumcised, possibly as many as a third, young or old (old being under 50 in recent years). Do men who work closely together, and bathe together, prefer to be circumcised?

Most speculative is the divorce rate. Divorce has increased as circumcision has decreased. Are modern uncircumcised partners more fractious and harder to get on with? Is their sex life not as good? Or pure coincidence?

On a slightly different topic. On this week's Channel 4 Seriously Funny programme, a large female comedienne (possibly Roseanne Barr, although I'm not too familiar with these modern comics) stated that all women see a penis when looking at a man. This being so, do they see a circumcised penis or not? Perhaps our female readers or readers' wives can help. I once read that women view a circumcised penis in much the same way as men view breasts. Do women try to find out a man's penile status before dating, or just take pot luck?

Lastly, over the years, I have built up a small scrapbook of features and letters about circumcision on a random and ad hoc basis. Of the letters, culled from many sources, 53 are for circumcision, 44 against. These include 26 from women for circumcision and 15 against. You will observe that this leaves men slightly against it, but if you remove the letters from men embittered by being 'mutilated' at birth (10), men are for it too. At least as far as people who write letters are concerned, or possibly the press who print them.

It's just struck me that my wife left me for an uncircumcised man, having always said that she preferred a circumcised one. So perhaps it's not that important after all.

Yohimbe

I came across the following on the net and found it very interesting. Have any members come across it or are using it? If so, would you please write in and tell us of your experiences. If you are using it, I would appreciate it if you could correspond with me and advise me with relation to cost and availability.

B.H. – Leeds

Yohimbe

Yohimbe has shown particular promise as a herb that can make erections harder and firmer. Studies show that yohimbe, a tree bark extract, has been shown to increase blood flow to the penis.

A recent clinical study in Rhode Island (published in the Journal of Urology) tested the active ingredient in Yohimbe on a group of men who had experienced chronic sexual dysfunction. For those who had been impotent for less than two years, the improvement rate was an astounding 81% – simply from taking a moderate dosage of this amazing substance over a period of one month. Two out of three patients who previously had experienced only partial erections, and had failed in normal intercourse at least 50% of the time, now reported fuller and more lasting erections, leading to consistently successful lovemaking.

Yohimbe Successful in Treating Both Organic and Psychogenic Impotence

Earlier, less systematically controlled medical studies had reported 70% - 80% "good to excellent" results with impotent patients. A landmark strictly controlled Canadian study in the 1980s showed that the active ingredient in Yohimbe could be a significant aid in restoring potency in diabetic and heart patients who often are prey to impotence.

Overall, the study's success rate for serious organic cases was 44% – startling enough to be prominently reported in Science Digest, Time, and Health magazines, as an alternative to invasive treatments.

The Yohimbe extract triggers chemical changes in the body that can also aid psychogenic cases of impotence, due predominantly to fatigue, tension and stress. In a 1994 Italian clinical study, half the patients received the active tablets for 8 weeks while half received placebos. The Yohimbe group showed a 71% positive recovery rate compared to the placebo group's 22% rate. Then the placebo group was changed to Yohimbe and scored a 74% success rate. Something in Yohimbe, then, obviously stimulates the male libido.

Yohimbe Suppresses Action of 'Aging Hormones' and Bolsters Critical Erection-producing Hormones.

As an alpha-adrenoreceptor blocker, Yohimbe reduces the effect of hormones that cause constriction of blood vessels which often increase with aging. Yohimbe particularly aids blood flow to the corpus cavernosum to more readily engorge the penis. At the same time, Yohimbe increases the body's production of norepinephrine, known to be essential to erections (this, too, diminishes with age). Plus Yohimbe steps up adrenaline to nerve endings, which can quicken male sensual stimulation.

Without drugs, Yohimbe can rejuvenate male libido by restoring and enlarging the chemical pathways needed for full functioning.

Unhappy

I am a very new member of Acorn which makes me feel I have entered a conversation halfway through. But having just read through some past issues of the newsletter, I would like to write about my own experiences.

I had the misfortune of being born in Australia in the early 1960s. I say misfortune because at that time circumcision was automatic. Unlike in England, where circumcision was an indicator of social status, in Australia, caught up in the post fifties panic about hygiene, circumcision was standard for nearly all newborn baby boys. I had never seen a foreskin until I moved to England.

While at primary school, I think I was about 9 or 10, my class went on a journey to a museum. I remember us all sitting on the floor with our legs crossed. We were watching a film about Aboriginal tribal customs. Part of the film included a complete close-up depiction of the circumcision of a boy in the tribe. (I clearly remember one of the male teachers exclaiming in sympathetic pain at the footage). I still vividly remember the 'ritual' very clearly. Whether we were meant to see this footage or whether it was an accident I cannot say.

In my reading of Acorn back issues there was one point that appeared to elude most writers/contributors who are pro circumcision for infants/children, and that is choice.

I am deeply unhappy about being circumcised. I have no idea of what my own body should be like. Part of me was removed before I had the consciousness or ability to give consent. I will never know what I have missed out on by not having a foreskin. While I have always been aware of there being something missing from my penis, it has taken me many years to acknowledge the anger I feel about it. It is almost as if my own mind has taken years to absorb what happened so many years ago. For a long time I held the attitude, 'Oh well, there is nothing I can do about it now'.

I remember when I was about 19, sitting in the university bar talking to friends. Everyone was comparing scars. There were tales of childhood accidents, car and motor cycle accidents, mishaps with machinery etc. I remember pronouncing that I didn't have any scars. Of course it took me years to consciously realise that I did in fact have a very significant scar.

Life is about choice. We all make choices. A child with a foreskin can, when an adult, make the choice to remove it. That is fine. Every adult has the right to determine the condition of their own body. I personally cannot understand why an adult would wish to have his foreskin removed, but I respect his right to choose. The child who has his removed through someone else's choice, does not have that luxury. It is my dick! Why wasn't I afforded the right to make any decisions about it? If you have a son, let him decide what kind of dick he wants to have. What right does anyone have to remove healthy parts of a newborn child? Endless surveys may conclude that circumcised penises are preferable, but it is my dick, and I demand the right to decide what my own dick should be like.

I have had many discussions with my mother about why she had me 'done'. I am the fourth boy of the family. My brother, the second boy of the family, was not circumcised until he was about 6 months old, after he developed problems with his foreskin (that, I believe now, could have been cured without resorting to amputation). Subsequently, the rest of us were cut. My brother is unhappy about being 'done', and has not had his own son's foreskin removed. In fact, none of my Australian nephews have been cut.

No one has the moral right (while they ludicrously still have the legal right) to make those kind of decisions about another individual's body, unless life is threatened. What happened to concepts such as self-determination? Or the rights of a child? Circumcision is child abuse of the most base kind. Legislation in Britain forbids the tattooing of people under the age of 18, in the belief that they may regret the tattoos in later life. Yet it remains perfectly legal to slice off part of an infants genitals.

I am currently restoring my foreskin. It is a slow process, and will not of course restore the lost nerve endings or the sensitivity to the glans that was originally there. But what else can I do? I am a victim of circumcision. At least I am doing something. I have gained a centimetre of skin over the glans in the past year. The colour of the glans under the new 'foreskin' has changed, and it has become softer and slightly moist compared to the glans skin still exposed. Because both the glans and the 'foreskin' are slightly moist, there is a vague stickiness and the two pieces of skin cling to one another. Sensitivity has increased to such an extent that it is now painful to the glans, due to rubbing on clothing, to walk without my restoration device in place. Previously, in my cut state, I felt nothing even when wearing jeans without underwear. The regrowth is a slow process, but finally, after thirty four years, I am reclaiming my body as my own.

Do most circumcisions occur in infancy because babies can't say 'no'?

R.H. (5/96) displays a great deal of intolerance when he complains that the magazine is being over-run by the "whines and wingers of men who bemoan their fate" and yet goes on to talk about his own 'op' (the removal of his foreskin). Is this a man who is telling others not to rally against their condition, and yet resorted to surgery to rectify what he himself was unhappy about? I thought Acorn was a forum for all points of view?

Hospital's New Service

Article in the Huddersfield Daily Examiner of 25.1.97

An NHS hospital is stepping in to help Huddersfield parents who want their babies circumcised for religious reasons. Its new service will help increase safety, it is being claimed.

Bradford Royal Infirmary, which launched the service for its own city six months ago, is extending it to people in Huddersfield and other towns. The hospital is one of only a handful in the NHS to provide a circumcision service. Staff carry out the procedure for a £60 fee at a clinic every Friday in the hospital's maternity area.

Religious leaders who carry out circumcisions charge up to £200. Most ritual circumcisions take place in this fashion. The hospital's move has been welcomed by the Racial Equality Council, which said it would increase choice. A health support worker able to speak Urdu and Bengali will be at the clinic.

The hospital is extending the age range for the procedure, and will carry out circumcisions on babies aged between three and nine weeks. Previously, they had to be six weeks or younger. Extra staff have been taken on and new equipment installed. An explanatory video has been made for parents.

The service, set up primarily for Muslims, is available for other faiths, such as Jews. Hospital chiefs said circumcisions for medical reasons would continue to be free. But, by law, charges have to be made for those done on religious or cultural grounds.

Letter from America

I was born in 1942 and was circumcised shortly after birth like many (but not all) American boys at that time. The fee for the operation was $10. As a young lad, before and after puberty (which for me began at age 11), I was quite self-conscious and shy about being cut (circumcised), and also greatly fascinated by circumcision and foreskins, because (a) many of my schoolmates were uncut; (b) my parents never informed me about circumcision (they didn't want to talk about it); (c) I am a shy and diffident person anyhow. Later, I was much more accepting of my circumcised condition, and became quite pleased with it.

Three of my cousins, roughly the same ages as me, and my two brothers were all uncut. Of course, we compared 'equipment', and as a teenager and young man, I had many pleasant jack-off sessions (wanks, as you would call them) with all three cousins. In my small high school class, as well as I can remember now, 32 of the boys, or 56% were cut, and 25 boys, or 44% were uncut. So I have had more exposure to uncut cocks than many American males. Later, when I went to university, and then into the army, the 'cut rate' was much higher than it had been at my high school. Nowadays, or at least a few years ago, 90% or more of the boys in most U.S. schools were cut.

As far as I know, all the U.S. military services (not only the Navy) strongly encourage circumcision. If a boy is born in a U.S. military hospital, whether Army, Air Force or Navy, it's almost a sure thing that he'll be circumcised unless his parents put up a big squawk, or there are medical reasons against it. I've read much anecdotal material of adults being 'modified' in the U.S. forces, but I personally know of only one case. This man served in the Coast Guard in World War 2 and was circumcised in a Navy hospital. He's very glad he had it done.

Till about 1986 I believed that my continuing interest in circumcision was very unusual, if not 'weird'. I then learned that I was very far from being alone: that lots and lots of people, both male and female, are fascinated with this matter. However, many of these people are very shy and bashful when it comes to talking or writing about circumcision; they are 'closet enthusiasts' if you will. I discovered Chuck Thompson in Hollywood and got most of his lists (of 'Celebrity Circumcision Status') and newsletters. Later, I joined a group called The Cut Men's Club of America and Canada (CMCAC), and later still, I subscribed to the GNU newsletters out of Washington D.C. However (and I'm not alone in this opinion) I feel that Chuck and his contributors are becoming bored, boring and 'written out'; they're running out of good material. CMCAC fizzled out and was a big disappointment, while GNU lately seems 'dormant'. A recent amusing development over here is the willingness of some publications such as Rolling Stone and Village Voice to ask certain male celebrities (mainly singers and athletes) if they are circumcised.

Within my overall interest in circumcision generally, there are several 'sub-topics' I am especially looking into, viz. (1) 'annular' or 'partial' circumcision, in which only a small part of the foreskin is removed; (2) Islamic circumcision (it's not easy to find worthwhile literature on this subject); (3) the history of 'routine circumcision' (i.e. of infants) in the U.S., U.K., Australia, New Zealand, Canada and elsewhere; and (4) circumcision among significant minorities or special groups in countries that are generally uncircumcised, such as most of Europe, South America and Japan.

Books: I'd like to mention two in my own library that are of special interest. You may already know of these books.

Circumcision: A Parent's Decision for Life, by the late Aaron J. Fink, MD (1st edition: Mountain View, Calif. USA: Kavanah Publishing, copyright 1988) is a small paperback intended to acquaint parents and other interested persons with the benefits of newborn circumcision. There is a good discussion of these (alleged) benefits in the text, but to my mind, the most valuable part of the book is the 75-page annotated bibliography (nearly all the titles are in English). There is only one illustration – a line drawing. I bought my copy direct from the publishers several years ago and I've written to ask them if it is still in print and available.

The other book is Histoire de la circoncision: des Origines a Nos Jours (History of circumcision from its origins to today), by Malek Chebel (Casablanca: Editions Eddif Maroc, c 1992,1993).

This book would be useful to those of your subscribers who can read French. It includes, among other things, a glossary, a list of circumcision in works of art, a 15-page bibliography (mostly titles in French, but some in English and German), and several fascinating photographs (focusing on circumcision in Africa). My copy came from a Dutch penpal who bought it for me in North Africa. Both these books are pro-circumcision in viewpoint. Dr Chebel's book is in fact dedicated 'to the circumcisers: surgeons of enlightenment'.

A question of semantics (or at least, vocabulary). My UK correspondent says that in his experience, 'helmet' is slang for a glans penis or cockhead, especially a circumcised one; whereas in my experience here, 'helmet' is slang for the foreskin on an uncircumcised cock. Do you have any further information on this point?

Infant Physiology

Paraphrasing of a paper issued by Montreal's principle children's hospital

Canada is a country of two halves, in language and in customs. Infant circumcision in Quebec in 1987 was 3% compared to 38% in Ontario. Only those circumcisions which are medically necessary are covered by the Quebec Medicare insurance, those for aesthetic or religious reasons having to be paid for. Medical necessities are acute paraphimosis, or cases of repeated infections of the glans caused by diabetes in adults. Problems can also be acquired by parents forcing the foreskin back in babies causing tearing and subsequent scarring of the foreskin. All other problems can be adequately dealt with by non-invasive solutions.

A Dr Williot gives a run-down on the growth of a penis.

"At birth there are two reasons why the foreskin cannot be manually retracted. The first is that it is too narrow at its extremity, like the collar of a turtle-neck jersey. The other reason is that the glans and the foreskin adhere completely to one another; there is no cleavage, therefore, between the foreskin and the glans. In the majority of cases, infants don't have any cleavage at birth.

Usually, Mother Nature herself takes care of the problem with time. At the base of the glans there is a portion that we call the coronal sulcus. At this point on the glans there are usually no adhesions. Cells from the mucous membrane of the foreskin and the skin of the glans will desquamate, or form flakes if you prefer. These desquamated cells will accumulate at the base of the glans, in the sulcus, and will form a sort of paste called smegma. Smegma will accumulate over the years and the pressure it contributes in creating will result, eventually, in a space between the glans and the foreskin. This, then, is the physiological mechanism of the freeing of the adhesions. Most of the time, this works. Irritated by the smegma, some children will manipulate the glans to find relief, thereby contributing to the disengaging of the foreskin from the glans. Erections, of a mechanical rather than a sexual origin in young children, also play a role. The glans exerts pressure on the foreskin, thereby contributing to dilate the phimotic ring and to free the adhesions."

The doctor points out that when one explains this phenomenon to parents, they generally abandon the idea of exposing the child's glans by circumcision, which requires general anaesthesia and causes pain. Knowing this, parents usually opt for a much gentler method, that's to say, manual retraction done with patience during the child's bath. If at five years of age the desired result is not achieved, parents can, at that point, help the dilation process with a cortisone or steroid cream. One must allow nature the chance to do its work.

[Editor's note:- This for me was very interesting as I have always wondered why, at the age of twelve, after being shown by a boy at school what my glans should look like, I had to break away the last bit of my inner foreskin from my glans, where it was adhering all the way around at the rim. Some harsh masturbatory treatment up to then had not altered it. I didn't do it all at once, but about a quarter of an inch at a time round the rim, as it hurt a bit but didn't leave any scarring. Underneath, it was as clean as a whistle, and after reading the above, it would appear to have been caused because I don't apparently make smegma. I've written before in the magazine that I've never seen it or smelt it, another example of not having experienced everything in life! – D.A.]

Maldives

A recent letter from a friend in the Republic of Maldives runs:- “We are about to start the month of fasting, so people are bingeing beforehand. Also, this is the month of circumcisions. Again, family and friends of the boy collect and there is non-stop, 24-hour-a-day eating and feasting (no drinking of course) for one week until the boy is deemed to have healed up.”

While everyone knows about Ramadan, I did not know about this custom. I did of course know that the family collect and do celebrate, while the poor child cries.

Weighty Matters

As a newish member I've found the newsletter very good and some possible answers to my problem of restoring my foreskin. I try each morning to stretch the skin by hanging 28lb weights on my penis. I do this for about 20 minutes while I am shaving, but after a year I cannot say that the skin has moved very much, although I have put an extra inch on my prick length. This seems to have stretched the skin above the pelvis and moved my balls along the underside as well.

My wife made a career move when she was 40, and went to train as a nursery nurse at college in the mid-eighties. Most evenings I would ask her about the day's lectures and took an interest in the subjects so I could help her revise each exam time. One day, with a gleam in her eye, she told me that one of the lectures had been given over to male circumcision. It was pointed out to the class that, despite a reduced incidence, a few of the students would still find that this operation had been carried out on some of their young charges. The discourse was given by a woman in her fifties with many nursing qualifications and years of experience on the wards. I calculated she would have trained in the fifties when circumcision was frequently routine. She had clearly emerged as a keen advocate as a result of her observations and deplored the emerging trend to avoid the procedure.

One of the more interesting tales she related in support of her view was an incident when she had been nursing a middle-aged man. Together with a colleague they had bathed him very thoroughly several times, but to their dismay he continued to emit a strong cheesy pong. When they reported this to the sister she smiled wisely and directed them to two of his bodily crevices which they had surely neglected; inside his navel and under his foreskin. These were duly investigated and the condition of both found to be rather revolting. In particular, the accumulated smegma and detritus around the glans convinced her there and then that all boys should be circumcised for the good of their own health and that of their partners.

The students, most of whom were sexually active girls in their late teens, were fascinated enough to continue discussing the subject over the following coffee break. One, a Muslim girl, said thankfully that the routine practice of circumcision in her culture would ensure that her future husband would be circumcised. My wife was able to tell them proudly that I was, and likewise, the other mature student in the group confirmed that her husband (born in the forties like me) was a roundhead. The girls were very intrigued because all of their current partners had foreskins, and they yet had to encounter a male who had been cut.

It seems a shame that so many young girls growing up today are going to be denied this experience, and I shudder for the sexual health of some who will end up with males who are less than fastidious about their penile hygiene.

[Surely it was the nurses' fault to let the poor man get in that condition. Are they not taught to wash under the foreskins of helpless men? – D.A.]

Hypospadias

A few boys are born with an unusual condition called hypospadias. This occurs in about 1 in 350 boys and is noticeable from birth. It's a failure of the urethra (the pipe that carries urine from the bladder) to reach the tip of the penis. This means that it stops short and exits the penis usually from underneath the shaft causing problems when urinating. Surgical repair often turns out to be successful, producing a socially acceptable urinary stream whilst standing.

However, it is crucial that the foreskin is conserved so that it may be used in these corrective procedures.

A Lady's Best Friend

Can we ever look forward to seeing Acorn available to the public on the magazine shelves? If you ever got round to it you could make a fortune. I'd be the first in the queue, but at present I have to rely on my best friend whose husband gets it. I find it so much more interesting than the trivial "women's" magazines on the top shelf, even though they sometimes have good pictures, which Acorn sadly lacks! I foresee a rush of those people for whom the cock has a special interest, ie females and gays, lining up to buy it. It may not be of so much interest to the average man in the street who only looks on it as something to pee through – and for a weekly workout on Saturday night as a bonus! I do find the moans in Acorn rather depressing though and, although they mostly have my sympathy, they should stop going on about it and get themselves cut or start restoring. What I really go for are those who rejoice in what they've got and tell us all about it! Particularly those who describe how women react to their offering, whether as mums giving it a wash, or as girl-friends giving it a wank.

If you firmly believe that size doesn't matter, then you should take Acorn's advice of a couple of years ago and buy the video film Dick, although a lot of people might consider it more as a comedy with its hundreds of shots of the most hopeless and inadequate little floppers you could imagine. But if, on the other hand, you are sure that size does matter, you should head straight to see the breathtaking photography of a Robert Maplethorpe exhibition when it next comes to town. My boyfriend took me as a birthday treat and I'm still marvelling. Maplethorpe, being a gay, sadly deceased from Aids, was obsessed with cocks, but only took pictures of those which stood out in a crowd – and his taste was immaculate! A large proportion of his pictures are close-ups of men's pride-and-joys with half of them belonging to whites and the other half to blacks. The whites are stupendously endowed but they all look a little uniform since they are mostly circumcised, with one or two with short foreskins. The blacks on the other hand are quite majestically endowed, and being mostly uncircumcised, show a greater variety, with foreskins ranging from the coy – the pee-hole framed in the taut skin ring, through several lampshades, to one or two which could be used as umbrellas! The exhibition is backed up by a series of picture books featuring his work and giving even more fantastic shots of a girl's favourite vaulting pole. I felt quite flushed at them all, but the one that really caught my attention looked almost as fat as the guy's thighs, bulging slightly over a smallish glans and then tapering further to a tulip head with the end bellling out into a wrinkle of loose skin. I can see why so many white girls go for black boyfriends!

After all this excitement I decided to thank my boyfriend by giving him a special treat and dropped into the Ann Somers sex shop. I asked the advice of the girl behind the counter about sex aids for my boyfriend and she asked me what size, and whether his foreskin was short, long, tight or loose. I said longish and tightish, and she produced a latex rubber ring with smooth knobs all round it, which she suggested I should fit on him before he got erect, by pulling his foreskin back, slipping it into the groove behind the knob, then pulling his foreskin back over it. She said if his foreskin was reasonably tight, it should stay there throughout intercourse – and said she could personally recommend it! She was right. One night I produced the ring and told lover-boy to present arms. Everything went fine, except that the opening at the tip of his foreskin is rather tight and I had a job to pull it over the bulky knobbly ring. But once it was there the fun started. It looked quite spectacular before he got a bone on because the ring bulged his penile cylinder out a lot more than usual, and it had the effect of pulling a lot more skin forward of the knob and extending his spout forward.

The effect was electrifying. The sensation as his inner foreskin moved over the knobs on the ring drove him mad, and the extra diameter, with the feel of the knobbly bits moving to and fro did the same for me. He was so impressed he put the thing on again next morning and went to work with it on. No fear of it falling off since it's trapped firmly in place and is quite difficult to dislodge.

Hope your readership find this helpful. I'd love to read any reactions, but not to me personally.

Cathy

The Cutting Edge (unsigned article from an H&E)

Most circumcised men can't comment on the pros and cons of their state from anything but a subjective view. As they've usually been 'done' at a very young age, they are unlikely to remember anything about life with a foreskin.

There are many cases of adult men who have the operation these days, but again, it is difficult to pin down an average reaction. Many men who are circumcised later in life have it done to relieve a problem such as phimosis. The result is bound to be an improvement, so their judgement is hardly unbiased.

Some men, however, decide to be circumcised purely for reasons of personal preference. There may be no particular discomfort or medical complaints; just the simple belief that it will look nicer. They are probably the most able to make a distinction between the haves and the have-nots. But again, reaction varies. One 27-year-old reported, "There is a bit more sensitivity than before, but not a huge difference. It hasn't really affected my sex life", while another chap, in his early forties, was astounded at the increased sensitivity, and the resulting increase in intensity of his orgasms.

Of course, women are more able to make comparisons, as they have the chance to experiment with a range of penises, rather than being stuck with one for their whole lives. Many of the women I talked to were definitely pro-circumcision, agreeing that, quite apart from the look of the thing, a cut willy was generally a cleaner willy. One said, "I think it's prettier, it's neater, it's easier to handle."

There are, of course, just as many people who find the idea of circumcision unnecessary. Foreskins are natural, they are part of the male body, they exist for a purpose, and there is no logical or practical reason for getting rid of them.

Indeed, they do exist for a good reason – that of protection. The end of the penis is filled with tiny nerve endings which make it extremely sensitive. What's more, the penis has a fairly important role to play in the whole reproductive process, and nature wants to keep the possibility of damage to a minimum. If you are a Western urban animal, this may mean protection from no more than catching your willy in your trouser zip. But if you are an Aborigine, leaping naked through the thorny undergrowth of the Australian outback, you can't rely on your boxers to prevent accidents.

However, most of the reasons for the preservation of the foreskin are to do with morals. It just isn't natural to hack off part of the body, especially for no apparent reason. To perform the operation on babies, who have absolutely no say in the matter, is downright barbaric.

The cleanliness argument doesn't wash either. One guy we talked to reckoned that washing the penis is as easy as washing your hands – though I wouldn't fancy his chances if he were discovered doing it in a public toilet.

The fact that the operation was routinely performed on the sons of middle-class families until the middle of this century gave vent to the criticism that it was simply a way of increasing social status – that a cut cock implied higher standing in society.

But it could be argued that the pro-foreskin feeling is due to deeper worries. Scarification is generally seen as a characteristic of 'primitive' societies, as seen in National Geographic illustrations of African tribes, with skin carved into intricate designs, or pulled into unusual shapes. This body art, obtained in the main without the aid of anaesthetics is, to Western eyes, at once fascinating and horrifying; the thought that someone could do – or allow to have done – such an unnatural, painful and unnecessary thing.

The people of these communities think otherwise, and it is for them an important part of life, whether as a rite of passage at puberty, a mark of tribal status, or as a declaration of religious belief. But it is possible that those who are strongly against the idea of circumcision, see it as another form of primitive – and therefore uncivilised – mutilation.

There are other reasons, say foreskin fans, why it's better to be uncut. The penis loses sensitivity if exposed for long periods, which reduces the man's pleasure during sex, and means he takes longer to orgasm (Although many women would see this as a plus point).

As for the idea that circumcision makes the penis more attractive – it is always possible to pull the foreskin back to get that aesthetic touch without resorting to knife wielding. And if a man is considering the operation as a means of removing the discomfort caused by a too-tight foreskin, he can have a simple procedure which stretches and widens the foreskin, thus relieving the problem without removing part of his pride and joy.

Quick Quotes:-

“I have no regrets – since having the op I've had the wildest orgasms.”

“Several people have said how much better it looks.”

“I know it's supposed to be natural, but I think a foreskin looks weird.”

“Foreskins are for wild sex – circumcised ones are just too polite.”

“A foreskin gives you more to play with.”

Female Quick Quotes:-

“I prefer the feel of a foreskin, but a circumcised penis is more aesthetically pleasing.”

“I've had both kinds of men – there's little difference in my opinion.”

“Why is there so much fuss about it all?”

“They keep telling us that size isn't important, so why should appearance make any difference.”

Rising Damp

The other day I found evidence to back up my feeling that, with the exception of some of our members, the British want to eradicate circumcision as keenly as they protect their shores from the menace of rabies.

We had been lent a video by some ex-pat friends entitled Rising Damp. You are most likely familiar with it as it was a popular UK sitcom some years back. If not, briefly, it revolves around a landlord who is very mean and a bit of a cad.

In this episode, a new lodger, a white art student, ends up sharing a room with a black medical student. After the new arrival has settled in a bit, apropos of nothing, he asks the medical student if he has been circumcised. After initial surprise, he replies, "If you must know, yes." Art student then says, "So am I. Rotten, isn't it?" Black student replies, "You should try it at thirteen years old, in the jungle with a blunt knife!"

What I should like to fathom out is, why didn't the script writer put down, "So am I. Great isn't it!" Why are only blunt instruments referred to when non-hospital circumcisions are discussed, when it is logical to assume that in 99.9% of all cases the sharpest instrument available is used?

Rubber Ring Method

I remember, in my mid to late teens (1974ish) a couple who were friends of my parents had a son of about 4 or 5 who they wished to be circumcised. I don't know whether a doctor or hospital was visited, but the boy was circumcised by means of a rubber ring method. I remember hearing his mum tell mine that his penis had swollen dreadfully and he had cried all night. They were tempted to take it off but had been told to leave it in place as the surplus skin would wither off in a few days, which I assume it did as I never heard any more.

As I was only young at the time, and it is quite a while since, this is all I can remember, although it has puzzled me ever since. Was this method used a lot, and successfully, or was it just a new idea that was being tried at the time. Is the method still used in this country or elsewhere?

Graft Away

I have always taken a pride in my appearance, love the attention, and let's face it, admiration which my figure earns me. I have a full-length back-lit mirror and frequently delight in standing in front of it after a shower and weighing up my physical assets: five ft-8ins tall, slim, well-rounded swelling bust, slim hips and thighs, and a small densely-haired pubic patch. I have long honey-blond hair, and recently, to please my husband, I bleached my pubics straw blonde and trimmed the hair right down to an even quarter of an inch. It now looks really spectacular glinting in the light, and is much paler than my surrounding all-over tan. It also leaves my private parts in full view, to the delight of my husband – and recently to a few selected men in our circle of friends.

We were invited to an evening swimming party at a private club in the area with a dozen other couples. Before long, swim suits were being shed along with inhibitions as the drink flowed, and we were all quickly in a state of glorious nudity. I and my husband, who is also a good-looking specimen, six feet tall, and blessed with a fine male physique, were without doubt the stars of the party. Several of the other guests, women as well, admired my pubic decoration as I laid sprawled in a pool of light on my towel. I saw several willies twitch and thicken as their owners surreptitiously eyed my centrepiece.

Every woman wants to be the centre of attention and none more than me. But what spoilt the evening for me was the constant awareness of how tatty my husband's cock looked compared with the others. He was the only one there with a circumcised penis and it stood out like a sore whatsit with its bare knob and puckered red scar. Frankly, my husband's cock looked about as appetising as a lump of cat's meat! But what really brought my attention to it, and choked me right off, was when one of the girls whispered in my ear, "Dishy bloke – pity about his winkle!" It does seem a rotten shame that his parents had to ruin his masculine beauty, especially since we are both very keen to experience the ultimate ego-trip of a nudist holiday.

But it struck me that in these enlightened days of advanced cosmetic surgery, where nose jobs and tit jobs are commonplace, is there any reason why a penis job should not be possible? I know stretching techniques are available, but frankly, I don't want to wait another five years to achieve what I want. I'd really love to see my husband sporting the smooth uninterrupted lines of a long heavy foreskin, and I'm sure he would too. If such a thing as a foreskin graft is possible, who should we contact? Perhaps one of your readers could advise.

Chris Short

Comments On Past Items

If any information has been forthcoming about the rings referred to in Question Corner 8/96, perhaps E.S. would like to disseminate it.

It is, surely, also a Parental Duty (1/97) to ensure that their children are taught genital hygiene, and that any problems occurring in that area receive medical attention. I seem to come across an increasing number of young, and not so young, men who completely neglect to attend to this necessary cleanliness. Some have very tight foreskins and are totally unaware of the reasons why the foreskin should be fully retractable and kept well cleaned.

Long before Sky TV (1/97) was thought of, the son of two good friends had to be circumcised, for medical reasons, at the age of five. Neither parent was traumatised by the result of the operation. They were just cross. They had wanted the operation done when the boy was born, but the hospital had refused to do it. The boy was more upset at spending his first, ever, night away from home, in hospital, than by the operation. From where do the TV companies get their information?

Various figures have been bandied about for the current circumcision rate in Britain. It no doubt varies widely from area to area, even if the religious and ethnic groups are discounted. I am surprised that Vernon puts it as high as 14%. My interests in steam and transport take me to many rallies, meetings and exhibitions, which appeal, mainly, to the indigenous British people. Making observations at these events, it is now extremely rare to see a circumcised penis on anyone under thirty years old. Most teenagers and younger seem to have volumes of foreskin. Is it possible to separate out the religious and ethnic content from the figures quoted?

More Thoughts On Past Issues

Firstly, in response to 8/96 when David said he'd had a large number of letters following an article in Boyz magazine about circumcision, and how it might be helpful to hear from more men who had had the operation as adults, and can offer a 'before' and 'after' insight.

I'm 29 and got cut six years ago. Each individual has, in deciding whether they want this done, to listen to the evidence, then decide themselves and make up their own mind.

I had a fetish about circumcision since early adolescence. I found the whole idea of being circumcised extremely erotic. I also had a tight foreskin, one I could retract fully but remained tight and at times uncomfortable if not actually painful, a tight band of skin around my glans when I had a hard-on. It also wouldn't slip back of its own accord if I had an erection, and that used to annoy me. Despite good hygiene, I used to get minor infections and frequent soreness and irritability under my foreskin. I also disliked that 'slimy' feeling just before or just after I'd come.

After I was circumcised and it had completely healed, I was interested to discover that my cock didn't actually feel particularly different. A hard-on felt much the same only better since I no longer had a band of tight skin constraining my knob just below the glans. I expected the shaft skin to feel taut and stretched when I had a hard-on but this wasn't really the case, either, although there was considerably less movement and elasticity.

I found this loss of movement really sexy, along with the prominent scar line which encircled my dick. I feel this is almost like some form of sexual negation. I don't know, I've often been of the opinion that only months of Freudian psychoanalysis could satisfactorily explain my circumcision fetish.

For me, it isn't so much about loss of sensation or sensitivity, but about change in sensation, sensitivity. After I was circumcised, the sensations I felt in my dick changed subtly. On one level it didn't feel particularly different, and on another level, when I was sexually aroused, it certainly did. On the whole it's better. I feel an erection more fully, more completely now. Before, I found the foreskin something of a nuisance, an impediment.

There are times when I miss having a foreskin. If I'm being sucked off, I miss the sensation of it slipping back inside someone's mouth. If I'm with another guy who isn't cut, that can be quite strange, the contrast between his cock and mine. And I sometimes think it might be quite nice to have one to wank with.

Most of the sensation is concentrated around the scar line which, as I said earlier, I find really sexy. Being circumcised hasn't altered my fetish at all, still finding the whole subject really erotic.

In response to I.G. of London, who wrote an interesting article about parental rights/duties, and how a father is to decide whether to have his son circumcised. I would say that, on the whole, anyone circumcised as an infant, without their consent, well, their parents presumably believed they were acting in the best interests of the child. To me it really is pointless getting worked up about it. Some of these people are more in need of psychotherapy than foreskin restoration. If it wasn't circumcision they were going on about it would surely be something else. Having said that, I fully accept their feelings of resentment about this being done to them when they were not in a position to object.

But one has to move forward, get on with one's life, and not having a foreskin makes no difference whatsoever to the function of a penis. And if it's any consolation, those circumcised at birth do have a lower incidence of all sorts of diseases.

That said, going back to I.G., I really don't think anyone has the right or duty to impose circumcision on their son. For my part, ideally, I'd like any son of mine to be circumcised. My father is circumcised and as a child I wished I was too. But I wouldn't dream of imposing this on any boy of mine. Besides, his mother might raise objections! I feel the fairest, most sensible course of action would be to offer one's son the opportunity to be circumcised when he's of an age sufficient to make an informed choice, say ten or eleven.

In many cultures, circumcision is carried out at this age as a puberty rite, so to my mind this is entirely appropriate. Conversely, if the boy decides he wants to keep his foreskin intact, then this means he's asserting his wishes as an autonomous, maturing individual. And those wishes ought to be respected.

Ideally, every boy or man should have the dick they want, be it cut or uncut. If everyone was the same, what a boring place the world would be.

Finally, to K.G. of London. I don't think you need worry about compromising the professional integrity of the medical profession. The only integrity you may be in danger of compromising is that of your fantasy life!

T.P.

Reasons

I have been wondering whether any of the circumcised readers who are dissatisfied could shed light on what it is about having an exposed glans they don't like. Is it a feeling of mutilation? Is it the fact that they have no choice as to whether or not to expose part or all of their glans? Do they feel naked because of what is probably one of the most private parts of their body is on display whether they like it or not?

It's interesting that many of those who possess the wherewithal to cover their cockhead enjoy exposing it and show it off, whilst many of those who have no choice in the matter regret not being able to cover it.

I enjoy the feeling of knowing that other people are aware that I am exposing a part of my body which I could easily keep hidden if I so chose.

You Do Have To Be Jewish

Foreskinwatch activated the Acorn grapevine on Wednesday March 12th. when a few members may have tuned in to BBC 2's fly on the wall documentary, 'Jewish Wedding'.

To whet our appetites we had been told in the listings blurb that the tale had a twist; "She's Jewish, he isn't!" As Steve converts to Judaism in order to be allowed to marry his beloved Michaela, he has to forfeit his foreskin, and the cameras had the incident covered.

"Greater love hath no man!" some would say, but bridegroom Steve was calm about it all and only "felt a little prick" at the start of the procedure when the local was administered. What might have been fleetingly glimpsed from the operating theatre footage was shot at a distance, and further obscured with a 'spot the ball' cross. Afterwards, the curious cameraman asked to see the shed element. The surgeon then called into question his dexterity for performing such an operation by dropping the specimen phial on the floor. When it was retrieved, a small bottle of blood was waved at the camera for a split second and repocketed. We were told it would be sent off to the dermatological laboratory for tests. And I always thought they were made into handbags for rich Jewesses.

Why the tests? Had Steve been having some problem with this part of his anatomy? Was this Jewish wedding all a ruse to obtain a circumcision which had hitherto been denied him on request or surgical demand as it invariably is? Was he a secret roundhead wannabe?

Best moment was sometime afterwards when his intended was confiding to her female friend over a cup of coffee. "I probably shouldn't be telling you this", she confessed, "but it does look much better." Thereby she betrayed she had been 'nibbling beforehand'. No doubt she'd harboured a Jewess's curiosity about cavaliers and taken the opportunity to make a comparison. Heartening for us roundheads was her declared preference. But then she would say that, wouldn't she? Their conversation was concluded with a giggling round-up of jokes about him being brave and his friends telling him that he was now only half a dickhead, not a full one etc.

The circumcision aspect was never raised in several interviews with his parents. Surely his mother must have had a view, having preserved his foreskin for him until he reached adulthood, only to see him wantonly abandon it for love of a lady. What do they say? "A standing prick has no conscience."

G.D.

Variety

I am not a member, but through the kindness of a friend I do read all the magazines, which I enjoy. I'm not a member because the controversy between foreskins and circumcision does nothing for me, possibly because I have both worlds anyway.

My fetish, if you can call it that, is awareness of my penis. I retain awareness all the time by ensuring different feelings. Each day I wear a different kind of underpants. There is, unless you wear tight jeans all the time, a different feeling with different styles. Boxer shorts, Y-fronts, tight briefs, pouch briefs, pouch thongs, wearing no underpants at all: they all give your penis a different feel, as well as a marked contrast in how you get it out to pee.

On top of that, I am lucky inasmuch as I have a shortish foreskin which stays back when it's put back (which is my best of both worlds), so I have that choice, and cock rings of either stainless steel or rubber round either both penis and balls or just balls. These can be felt whilst walking but without hurting.

All these items permuted in one way or another ensures that there are different feelings every day and I'm aware of my friend down there, which leaves me with that slight breathlessness all the time.

To finish with I feel I must take up the cudgels with those circumcised naturists who write and denigrate those who wear their foreskins retracted when nude, as if it's only the circumcised who have permission to show their glans. If a foreskin can stay retracted, then it's up to the owner whether to leave it one way or the other, when and where he likes. He is not trying to imitate a circumcised penis, but just being what he is.

Three States

After reading the piece by J.G. of Australia, I imagine he was cut as an infant; hence his question about sensitivity.

I can speak with some experience as I can remember all three states. A long foreskin: partial circumcision: a radical cut.

Intercourse with a foreskin was a disaster for my girlfriend of the time as I came so quickly, being so sensitive. In fact, after I had pulled out and the foreskin was back over the knob, the glans was almost 'vibrating': it was so sensitised I hardly knew what to do with myself.

After partial circumcision I was far less sensitive, and could bring a girl to a climax without trouble as I could last much longer.

When I finally removed the last traces of foreskin (a DIY job) and acquired a radical cut, the sensitivity was definitely reduced. But the gain was in the look, the overall feel, and in sex, the wonderful feeling of being in a vagina when the corona was not obscured by shaft skin. Also noticed by my wife at the time.

Sadly, I am now free and open to offer! Also I will be pleased to enter into any correspondence.

Vacuum Cleaners

Items culled by Private Eye from the British Medical Journal, sent in by several members.

Case 1 – A 60-year-old man said that he was changing the plug of a Hoover Dustette in the nude while his wife was out shopping, and "it turned itself on" and caught his penis, causing tearing around the meatus and deeply lacerating the side of his glans. The external meatus was reconstructed and the multiple lacerations of the glans repaired with catgut.

Case 2 – A 65-year-old railway signalman was in his signal box when he bent down to pick up his tools, slipped on some oil, and "caught his penis in a Hoover Dustette which happened to be switched on". He suffered extensive lacerations to the glans, which were repaired with catgut with a good result.

Case 3 – A 49-year-old man was vacuuming his friend's staircase in a loose-fitting dressing gown, when, intending to switch the machine off, he leaned across to reach the plug: "at that moment his dressing gown became undone and his penis was sucked into the vacuum cleaner". Because he had a phimosis he suffered multiple lacerations to the foreskin as well as lacerations to the distal part of the shaft of the penis, including the external meatus. His wounds were repaired with catgut and the phimosis reduced with a dorsal slit.

[Firstly, always check the suction of the Hoover, and secondly, if you get into trouble, have a much better story than these pathetic three. — D.A.]

The Cost Of Circumcision

I feel I must bring to the notice of all our readers the increased cost of circumcision. It is quite ridiculous the way the cost of getting circumcised has gone up in the last few years. When I was circumcised the cost was £350 at the Surgical Advisory Service. This was increased from £190 a short while before. I was advised a short while ago to have a revision circumcision to remove another 1.5cm of foreskin because too much skin was left on the first time, and it still causes irritation and some soreness at times. My own doctor, who incidentally is a lady, tried to get it done at our local hospital but without success. I have now been going around the private sector again and have been quoted £900, £750, £500. These are the prices that are now being charged in various places in London, Manchester and Rotherham.

Surely there must be a surgeon around who is prepared to circumcise, or do a revision circumcision for a sensible figure that people can afford. I have many friends who would love to be circumcised but cannot afford the high cost. I also know women who would like to have their husbands and boyfriends circumcised but cannot come up with the cash.

It would be helpful if any reader knows where one can go to get a reasonably priced circumcision, especially in the south of the country. A half hour's work surely doesn't warrant these prices. My first circumcision lasted 20 minutes, and for £350 I thought even that was expensive. No one minds paying for the privilege of circumcision, but let's have it at a price we can afford. Please get in touch via Acorn if you have any good ideas, or if you know of a sympathetic surgeon who is in favour of circumcising adults at the right price, or if you would just like a chat about it, male or female. I am always ready to discuss the problem.

C.P. – Wiltshire

[Acorn gets a number of enquiries from members seeking doctors who are willing to perform circumcisions on request. We are therefore compiling a small booklet listing all those of whom we know.

It would be very helpful if any member who has made contact with a doctor or clinic willing to circumcise would send us the details. We would like these even if you decide not to use the doctor on cost or other grounds.

We would like as much as possible of the following information:- Doctor's (or Clinic's) name, address, telephone number. Method(s) of operation offered and type of anaesthesia used. Whether circumcision is available for infants, children and adults or only one or the other. Cost of circumcision (for each age group if possible).

Details will be published in Acorn magazine and added to the list to help other members. — V.Q.]

Juices

I wonder if Dr Hamble could bring us up to date on any research projects into the nature and function of prostate secretions which have appeared in medical literature over the last five or six years? Since retirement I have not had the same access to journals and monographs that I enjoyed while working in the NHS. I note with great personal pleasure that my secretions are as liberal as ever at the age of 66, and my regular daily masturbation (or in warm weather twice daily) can produce up to 10ml at a time, and may be repeated three or four times before orgasm occurs. There appears to be no reduction in sensitivity of my glans (yet), and my urethral meatus is still able to admit the tip of a little finger with ease, which also increases the flow of juices, although these may be in part from urethral glands.

Since we are now public on the Internet, perhaps it would be opportune to comment on my observations on the change I have observed in the state of foreskin presence in the art form of gay videos. I have not so far noticed any mention of them in correspondence, but suspect that some members (!) may have seen these items.

My first opportunity to watch was in Copenhagen in the mid-70s, and it was clear that all models on American videos were circumcised while all models on Continental videos were not, so far as my experiences showed at that time.

Twenty years on and many happy hours after, the picture has changed somewhat. The videos made on the Continent still show models with foreskins – sometimes retracted throughout the performance. Those made in the US however, have now become about 50% circumcised and 50% not, at least in those films I have access to.

One very interesting observation I have made is that the films made by K. Bjorn have the majority of models with foreskin present, and well exercised, since his travels around the world in search of ever more presentable models take him to places where circumcision is not the norm, the exceptions being America, Canada and Australia. But in the films made in these locations one foreskin at least is present.

Make Someone Happy

It was with absolute delight that I came upon an article recently in the EROS magazine, where your details were given as being devoted to penis activity.

I sincerely hope that (a) you do still publish such a magazine.

(b) that you send to 'desperate' overseas subscribers.

(c) that you do in fact cater for all PENIS related items.

There is such a plethora of female and gay orientated literature that I have almost given up hope of finding one kindred spirit in the whole world! Seems silly, doesn't it, but that is how difficult it is to obtain material devoted to the PENIS in all its outstanding glory.

If you want articles from a person with many years of self experimentation and a very fertile mind then I will be only too happy to submit fact and fiction articles if required.

However, my real ambition is to make contact with other men who enjoy using, displaying, playing and experimenting with their penises. Please let me know if you or any other interested soul can help.

Tribal Circumcision

A news item from a magazine.

Bush Surgeons in the Eastern Cape are responsible, it is claimed, for dozens of boys being mutilated during tribal circumcision ceremonies. In fact, many die from their injuries.

These mutilations and deaths have prompted calls for the closure of 'initiation schools', but traditionalists are opposed to such moves. They see the ceremonies as an inalienable African rite of passage.

The initiation is supposed to be a joyous affair for families as the teenager becomes a man.

Talisman

A Girl's Initiation

My first remembered sexual experience was as a nine-year-old schoolgirl when a classmate of mine accepted my exchange offer of "I'll show you mine...etc" and produced his plump little prick for me behind the girls' outside loos. I studied it closely and, being duly impressed, declared it "a smasher" and asked him to do a pee with it. Proud as punch at such praise, he immediately loosed off, and then said with some pride that he would turn his cock inside out if I wanted him to. I told him scornfully he was kidding, whereupon he started pulling back on his skin until the spout on the end was stretched open to reveal his peehole. Having no brothers of my own, he had my undivided attention as he continued sliding his skin back until the whole of his glistening ruby-coloured knob was revealed, steaming slightly in the cold air, with the narrow opening of his foreskin pulled right back behind it, and pinching the shaft of his penis into a wasp-waist.

I had no idea such exciting things could be done and felt sorely deprived in not having anything to compare. But hiding my envy, I asked him if I could have a go with it, whereupon he pulled his foreskin forward over his knob again and generously invited me to help myself. Bending low in concentration, I took it between finger and thumb and gave it a squeeze. He obviously enjoyed this and I was dead flattered when he honoured me with a fierce little erection. In no time at all his little prickle had doubled in size and was sticking straight up, with the skin stretched tight over the swollen knob. The boy answered my query by saying, "no, it didn't hurt", but often went all stiff like that when he was in bed in the morning. I was dead keen to see his purple knob again and started pulling back on his skin. He winced a bit and told me to be careful.

With some effort I succeeded in pulling his skin back until it slipped firmly in place behind his swollen knob, looking like a taut elastic band. He then asked me to pull it forward again as it was a bit tight, which I did, pulling a lot of loose skin beyond his knob before I managed to get the narrow opening back over it again. Some inner feminine instinct then prompted me to go on: this wasn't the end of the story. So I started moving my grip up and down, noting with satisfaction how I could feel the soft swelling of his knob through the foreskin as it slid smoothly to and fro over it. The boy started showing a sense of urgency and encouraged me to speed up until eventually, with a loud yelp, he achieved a dry come, pulling his penis out of my hand and wanking it furiously as he backed off. I have to tell you that I was deeply impressed! But the memory of this introduction to the exciting world of male sexuality stayed with me ever since, and the fantastic buzz I experience when I unhood a guy's foreskin for the first time represents for me a real sexual turn-on.

Consequently, the impression when I encountered my first circumcised penis some six months ago was puzzlement. I do find it difficult to understand why some men are so keen to get rid of such an exciting and fascinating plaything which seems tailor-made for a girl to play with whilst giving and receiving pleasure. The gradual appearance of the moist red knob is for me an important introduction to the sex act. Since I am certain I am not the only female to enjoy a nice foreskin, could it be that circumcision appeals mainly to gay men?

I noticed recently a letter from a gay, complaining that letters from females should not be published, since they mainly support foreskins. I think he ought to read Acorn's terms of reference in the editorial of the same edition, which clearly mentions foreskins as well as circumcision, and remember that females have been asked to write in with their views.

The claim that circumcision is cleaner is plain ridiculous; cleanliness is a personal choice needing soap rather than surgery. As far as urinary infections are concerned, we need to have a sense of proportion since, as reported in the magazine, girls suffer from them far more than boys, circumcised or not, and nobody makes a fuss about it.

To my mind, circumcisers are killjoys, and girls are entitled to the enjoyment of a foreskin on their chosen male partners. This is why most mothers these days wouldn't consider having their kids done.

Sue S. – Islington

Cause Of Impotence

Paraphrased from an article in STYLE magazine

How does an erection fail in the first place? The penis contains two cylinders, known as the corpora cavernosa, which need to fill with blood to produce an erection. The blood then has to remain trapped within them to maintain the erection. Dysfunction can happen for both psychological and physiological reasons. Physiologically, it is usually caused either by a malfunction in the tiny muscular valves within the veins of the penis that should relax to retain blood, or poor circulation, or even a leakage within the veins. A genetically inherited problem, high blood pressure, heart disease, diabetes, some drugs, local nerve damage or scar tissue and smoking are all known contributory factors.

Sometimes it is impossible to discover what is causing the problem, but it's usually a combination of both factors. If an erection fails for any reason, it is very easy for a man to become trapped in the vicious circle of performance anxiety, making the condition worse. Offering medical treatment helps to sort out both the physical and the psychological aspects of the condition in one go. People always feel better if they are actually doing something about their problem.

Erectile dysfunction is not the same thing as infertility – as a rule, the condition does not affect sperm count, and most men with this problem can usually father children perfectly well. What it does mean is that a man can get an erection of sorts, but not one that is rigid or long-lasting enough to have intercourse.

The most popular and effective treatments in the UK at the moment are prostaglandin injections that encourage the valves to relax and retain blood during an erection, or a manually operated vacuum pump that helps to fill the penis with blood and retain it with a small rubber ring at the base. Although neither is a cure, some men find that they quickly regain confidence once they realise that they can achieve and maintain an erection – and their own natural erection eventually starts to return.

But treatment could soon be revolutionised by a new drug due to be launched in 1998. It is being tested on hundreds of men in the US and reports are extremely positive. Known as Sildenafil, the drug appears to block an enzyme that breaks down nitric oxide, the chemical essential for helping the valves to relax and retain blood.

There are also new developments in prostaglandin technology. A waxy pellet that can be massaged down inside the urethra and a new way of injecting the drug into the urethra are both currently being researched.

Boyhood Games

The article 'Medical Fetish' by K.G. – London in 1/97 got me thinking about my early experiences.

The first time I can recall any real sexual pleasure was when I was aged seven and in hospital waiting to have my tonsils removed. As I lay on my back in bed, along came a doctor who pulled the curtain round and proceeded to pull down the bed covering and my pyjama bottoms. He then carried out a very thorough and prolonged examination of my penis and balls. I remember well how he repeatedly pulled my foreskin right back and then as far forward as he could. I have a lot to thank that doctor for, not only the sensational experience to get me started regarding the pleasures of sex, but also a good 'lead in' line to get to see other boys' cocks and play with them in the same way.

A few years later, at junior school, I was invited one lunchtime by another boy to join him and his friends who had started a special club. I went with this boy to the boys' toilets and was taken into a cubicle where there were already three other boys. The boy that took me explained that what happened was that we were all to get our cocks out and were free to look at, play with, whoever we wanted. Needless to say, it was a bit crowded and one boy (named Keith) stood on the toilet seat. When he dropped his pants there was this 'most unusual', but wonderful, looking cock with its head fully exposed – right in front of my face!

It took several club meetings to work out how Keith's cock had got like that. Later this was confirmed, as several other boys disappeared for a few days to have a 'minor operation'. It didn't take me long to work out that that doctor had probably been considering circumcising me.

I became obsessed with circumcision. Once at secondary school, it was easy in the changing room/showers to find out which of my classmates had been done – and, from my point of view, which to make friends with. A group of us, who were none too keen on P.E., took to cross-country running. This meant running around a couple of mile circuits and through a wood. We would slip away into the trees on the first circuit and rejoin on the last. This left us an hour or so when we would strip completely naked and masturbate ourselves and each other.

My first experience of full gay sex was when I was thirteen. During a school holiday a circumcised classmate and I went camping in a field belonging to the parents of another classmate (also circumcised, as if you didn't guess!) The boy whose parents owned the field joined us early one evening and we played with each other as usual. After he had gone, in the dim light of a candle, my friend said there was one thing he would really like to try – that was to fuck me 'properly'. I agreed to give it a go. It took some time, but we eventually made it with liberal applications of butter – the only lube we could think of in the situation. I enjoyed it and so did he. He couldn't stop talking about it the next day, so we did it again that evening.

I eventually had myself circumcised as an adult, and still seek out friends in the same condition. I must say that I wish to this day that the doctor had gone ahead and done it. Adult circumcisions do seem generally to leave a more obvious scar, as those done young often appear totally natural with a smooth and even tone of the shaft skin.

I feel very sorry for some writers to the magazine who regret their parents having them circumcised as youngsters. I understand that they will never be convinced, but it really is better and, despite what some say, from my own experience there is no loss of sensitivity.

gone into hospital to have “that bit of his willy cut off”, and that in future I should wash my willy this way when having a bath so as not to need that very painful operation. Unfortunately, our neighbours moved away shortly after this and I never had the opportunity to view the surgeon’s handiwork. This began my interest in the foreskin and circumcision. But back to the beginning...

Born in 1961, I left the hospital with my foreskin intact. Whether the possibility of being circumcised was ever discussed I do not know as my parents and I have never talked about it.

During my years at a rural primary school, we often had games or swimming lessons with the class above and consequently I regularly had the opportunity to observe the other boys’ penises – this was a mutual interest. It was during one of these periods that I saw my first circumcised penis. Several of the boys regularly retracted their foreskins when urinating, but out of the thirty boys only one was circumcised. From about the age of six I regularly retracted my foreskin, and even tried to keep it retracted, but it would always slip forward again.

On going to the grammar school, out of the thirty or so boys in my year, only two were circumcised. One boy had a circumcision scar so fine that it could hardly be seen, the other having an extensive and disfiguring scar around his penis.

At about the age of twelve, my initial interest in circumcision was renewed, and I began to read any articles that I could find regarding the penis, and circumcision in particular. By the age of fourteen I had developed a deep desire to be circumcised, but at that stage had no way of achieving that desire. At about this time a new boy moved into the area who had, I later discovered, a foreskin with a dorsal slit (scout camps are a wonderful opportunity to get to know each other!) Having found an anaesthetic cream which successfully anaesthetised the foreskin, I cut my foreskin with a pair of sharp scissors on its dorsal side. The cut bled for only a few seconds and healed completely within a few days. The dorsal slit did, however, have a few disadvantages:

- 1) If the foreskin was not retracted during urination there was a tendency to dribble uncontrollably, and the aim was poor.
- 2) When the foreskin was retracted there were two lumps caused by the scar.
- 3) The dorsal slit was not aesthetically pleasing to me.

By the age of eighteen I was fed up with the dorsal slit and its disadvantages, so decided that I would be circumcised within the year. At this stage my foreskin was quite long, extending beyond the glans of my flaccid penis by about an inch, and when my penis was erect the foreskin extended beyond my glans by about half an inch unless manually retracted and kept retracted. The dorsal slit extended about half an inch from the tip of the foreskin so that when the penis was erect the tip of the glans could just be seen at the base of the slit. As my nineteenth birthday approached nothing had been done to fulfil my resolution. I could not discuss the subject with my parents and was too embarrassed to consult the doctor (there was no medical problem with my foreskin – only my conviction that I wanted to be circumcised).

Having read many articles on the subject (my aunt was a nurse), the only answer was to perform my own circumcision. My parents being away during the first weeks of the school summer holidays before I went to university gave me the ideal opportunity to perform my circumcision, as my penis would not be seen by any of my old classmates, and if anything went wrong and I ended up in hospital, I should be discharged by the time my parents returned. So one evening I got to work.

I would not recommend the following surgical technique to others, but fortunately it did work for me without any problems. All tools used were sterilised by being boiled for 15 minutes. Having bathed, a line was drawn around the erect penis indicating the position of the coronal sulcus. The foreskin retracted, a bandage was wrapped tightly around the penis, starting at the tip of the glans, and tied very tightly at the base of the penis to form a tourniquet. After a couple of minutes, the bandage was unwound, again starting at the tip of the glans, and the surplus bandage cut off, leaving the tourniquet at the base. The whole of the penis was liberally covered in anaesthetic cream. Once the skin was anaesthetised (as determined by pricking the skin with a needle), the penis was washed with surgical spirit and the operation proper began.

The foreskin was replaced into its normal position and pulled forward so that the marked line was beyond the tip of the glans, and a clamp was applied to keep the foreskin in this position. The textbooks had indicated that a pair of 'bone cutting forceps' should be used to clamp the foreskin. These looked in the photograph remarkably like a large pair of electricians side-cutters, but previous experimentation had indicated that they would not be large enough (probably OK for an infant, but not an adult), so I used a gas tubing clamp. Using fine, sharp dissection scissors, the foreskin beyond the clamp was cut off. There was no pain felt except when cutting through the skin in the ventral mid-line, which was quite painful, but as the foreskin was attached at this stage by only a small piece of skin there was no option but to cut through. Because the skin was clamped there was no bleeding, but as the clamp was loosened there was a small amount. It had been my intention to trim the skin back close to the coronal sulcus, but it was very sore as I tried to cut the inner skin, and I did not cut any further.

The skin was replaced behind the glans and the cut edges drawn together using 'steri-strip' plasters. The tourniquet was gently released, giving rise to some bleeding from the circumcision, but this soon stopped and my penis was then bandaged up. The operation had taken about fifteen minutes. I then realised what I had done – I was now circumcised.

Two days later the bandage was removed and the plasters gently soaked off. The penis looked a bloody, bruised mess, but didn't bleed as the plasters were removed. Once cleaned up it looked a lot better. There was some bruising where the clamp had crushed the skin, and a large scab at the cut, but otherwise OK. The steri-strips were replaced and another bandage applied, these being removed two days later and not replaced. It took a further week for the bruising to disappear. There was no discomfort the day following the operation, in fact I did my paper round on my bicycle as normal, although I did wrap my penis in cotton wool before putting on my underpants.

The results. The circumcision scar is about an inch from the glans on the ventral side and about one and a half inches from the glans on the dorsal side when erect. The frenulum is intact with the scar at the end of the frenulum. When flaccid, the skin can just cover the coronal sulcus, but the rest of the glans is uncovered. When the penis is erect, there is enough skin left that it is not pulled too tight, and allows some movement of the shaft skin. It took several years for the colour of the scar to fade to that of the surrounding skin. The sensitivity of the glans has changed since the operation. Before being circumcised, my glans was so sensitive that the slightest stimulation was often painful. After the cut these sensations were pleasurable. For some time after being circumcised I was reluctant to let my penis be seen in public. When using a urinal I made sure that the scar could not be seen. After a few years, a friend, who I discovered was circumcised, and I took up swimming, and the communal changing room made me lose my shyness, and now I am proud for others to see my circumcised penis in the changing room or on the nudist beach.

Since being circumcised I have pierced my frenulum and normally wear a ring which encircles the glans just behind the coronal sulcus. Other piercings of the glans have not been successful and have been removed.

I have a few regrets concerning my circumcision. Sometimes I wish I had cut more skin away, giving tighter results, with the scar nearer the sulcus, and I have considered re-operating. But the main regret is that I had not been chopped eighteen years earlier!

Some Thoughts

Today I was reading an article deploring female circumcision. No one would want to promote that if it was a cause of pain. Male circumcision can also be a cause of pain – emotionally if not physically.

I've long sought the answer to 'Is circumcision good for boys?' As I was only five when a doctor decided that I needed trimming, I can't remember what it was like very well. I never saw my glans until the surgeon exposed it.

I think I have been quite neatly trimmed. I'm pleased that I still have my frenulum, so I understand this is like a Jewish cut. A guy that I met reckoned it was done by the 'cuff resection' method – the cut line being about half an inch behind the corona.

It seems generally accepted by the majority of informed opinion that there are benefits from the operation. If these men and women are not too fanatical they may admit disadvantages too. What are the pros and cons, and what is the balance of opinion?

As most Englishmen are uncircumcised it seems our opinion on balance is against. Apparently, in the USA, despite declining percentages, the opposite appears. Over the whole world it seems it is done principally for religious reasons, and secondarily for social reasons.

So the implication is, if you're not Jewish or Moslem and don't yearn to be cut, you won't get circumcised unless you have a foreskin problem.

I haven't liked being cut because I didn't choose it, but I do have an obsession about it. Part of me wants to believe it's great being cut because I don't want to have to try and stretch the skin and admit I think it's wrong to circumcise. The doctor reckoned I needed it because I had a 'pinhole meatus', but surely if a boy has an unretractable foreskin there are other treatments. I don't remember that my foreskin caused me pain, but I remember how tender the glans was to hot bath water after I had been circumcised.

So I will briefly list the pros and cons:-

Pros.

1. People think it generally looks more sexy.
2. Foreskin can't be caught in zip.
3. Easier to keep clean.
4. Less likely to smell.
5. I may be wrong here, but I think that if people have a preference it is often for cut men. Aren't people more fanatically for than against?
6. There must be other reasons but I can't think of them.

Against.

1. There's more to play with, and more to do with the penis.
2. There must be more sensation.
3. Penetration must be easier, with more natural lubrication too.
4. Getting cut costs time and money and may be painful, the circumciser may be over-enthusiastic.
5. It's very difficult to reverse after it's done.

The fact that I haven't given an equal number of pros and cons shouldn't be seen as clear evidence in favour, since 1, 2 and 3 against are very significant.

I guess the greatest blessing, however, is having sex organs, and being able to use them to enjoy ourselves, please others, and possibly generate children. I believe that I can do these.

I suspect that I am cut for various reasons. I believe in reincarnation and think that long ago I may have been a Jew. Secondly, it may be a punishment, especially in view of a time that, as an uncircumcised Greek, I mocked some circumcised Egyptians. Thirdly, it may be relevant to people I will meet in this life and my attitude, especially my opinion regarding circumcision.

Surely no one would say that I'm less of a man (as I tended as a boy to believe) in a moral or social sense? I am the first to declare that physically I'm less than 100% male or man. Am I 99.98% a man – or 99.99%?

More On The Medical

As regards my earlier letter on medical experiences, may I elucidate further? I feel that those doctors who participate regard male patients as fair game, whereas female patients, regardless of how seductively they behave, are forbidden flesh. Moreover, it is now a legal pre-requisite that gynaecological examinations are always performed with the attendance of a female nurse or chaperone, which effectively curtails any wandering hands.

This does not apply to male patients however... I also think it is a long held belief that the slightest signs of tumescence in the patient signals compliance and acts as a trigger to further activities! Fair game. Most of my experiences of this nature have been with the more mature, if not elderly, specialists, who have probably seen and done everything in their forty-year careers, and seem to have the confidence to dive right in. The young medicos, however, seem to lack this assurance and often either get embarrassed, annoyed, or go too far and actively participate or worse.

My most blatant example came (?!!) when I was referred privately for a circumcision. The Harley Street Consultant I saw was in his seventies, but reassured me by saying he no longer operated as he was largely retired, but would perform the necessary examination.

We chatted easily about career plans, hobbies etc. and then asked me about my penis? He told me to strip from the waist down and lie on a couch with my legs apart and my shirt lifted above my nipples. He wanted to look 'knees to nipples' as he quaintly put it.

I was embarrassed, and perched semi-naked on the couch with my genitals covered with my shirt. As an ex-army medic, he told me in a booming voice to lie back, and exposed me completely. He performed a visual examination and then palpated my testes, studying my scrotum, and at one point squeezed my testicle to 'test sensitivity'. I gasped in pain.

He checked the distribution of my pubic hair and began on my appendage. He gently retracted my (long) foreskin and studied the glans, sulcus, etc. I was naturally nervous and felt myself getting a slight erection. He asked me about the irritation and I showed him where the thrush and phimosis were problematical. Again he studied the areas involved, at one point using a magnifying glass. My erection was by then complete.

Mr C. asked about the angle, and pointed out a slight curve; again palpating the by-now engorged shaft. To distract him I asked about the surgery, and he slowly and luxuriously moved my foreskin back and forth to 'show' the effect of circumcision! I asked about scarring, which prompted an even more thorough 'examination' with comments on 'engorgement', 'tumescence', etc.

The good doctor gently opened my meatus and checked my urethra for strictures. I was by now near the point of no return... The consultation came to an abrupt end when the specialist thrust an ungloved and unlubricated finger up my back passage whilst palpating my glans. I told him it was uncomfortable and he went on to ask about 'homosexual tendencies'.

He reassured me about the workings of the organ in question and said I seemed healthy. Sadly, he did not attend me post-operatively as that would be another story to tell...

Australian Story

I came from a South-east Asian country (my mother is a white New Zealander – I'm Eurasian) when I was three. That's when I first noticed that penises came in different forms, and even at such a young age I suspect I wanted to be circumcised. When I first saw a cut penis I didn't find it ugly or threatening – I thought it was quite interesting.

Up until the mid-late 80's Australia was a country with a very high circumcision rate (about 85% in my age group). Consequently I grew up surrounded by 'roundheads' and couldn't help feeling a little strange. Well, more like an alien is more accurate. There were other kids with foreskins – mainly Greek – but, all told, we were a very small minority. It was always a source of insecurity for me that someone should find out – especially girls – as I'd overheard one of them once describing how ugly a foreskin was.

This continued through my teenage years and through university as well. The girlfriends and partners that I did have were pretty much all of the same opinion – foreskinned penises just weren't very desirable, and I have to agree. I don't personally think they add to the aesthetics of a penis.

When I left university I went backpacking through Europe for a year. At the same time I'd been wearing my foreskin pulled back behind the glans (it wasn't long or tight and after a month it would just sit there nicely). Things stayed like this for a while, but deep down inside I still felt different, so I decided to get rid of it.

The surgeon I was referred to all but suggested I see a psychiatrist – he wasn't very warm and had a typical doctor's God complex. To shorten the story he did do the surgery for me but removed next to nothing – just a little spade-shaped piece of foreskin right above the glans. My penis isn't very large, and when it (the remaining skin) retracted, the rolled up tissue caused a rather spectacular fluid build up/oedema, especially on the underside next to my frenulum. Lymph just wasn't circulating. I went back to him and he said that he would have to remove the skin underneath the penis as well. Like I said – I didn't like him – and also didn't want to risk another general anaesthetic, so I asked my referring GP if he'd do it for me instead. He was happy to, but he still didn't remove enough. I don't really have problems with oedema any more (sometimes when it's cold), but my penis looks a little like the hind end of the saggy baggy elephant! I still have enough skin left to pull up onto my glans – at least three-quarters of the way up when erect. I can wear my foreskin pulled forward if I want to. Essentially, there really isn't much difference to how it was before I had the operation.

Am I satisfied? Well – I have to admit, I really seem to enjoy a lot more sensitivity now. I have no explanation for that. I'm not satisfied with the way the first operation was carried out but, yes, I'm glad I was circumcised. I'd still like to have a normal looking penis and am seriously considering another revision (maybe by an aesthetic surgeon? I'm not sure if they'd not be more cosmetically sensitive).

I do like the look of this super-tight 'lubricant only' penis that seems quite common in American porn films, but I'm fairly sure that kind of effect can only be achieved through neonatal circumcision.

And An Australian Lady

I was having lunch with a group of girlfriends recently and put the question of circumcision to them. Interestingly enough, all came to the same conclusion. We were all in our 40's and 50's, and of the generation when boys were circumcised, almost without question, for hygiene reasons. Thus, being used to the circumcised 'look', we all agreed that it does look better done than not done.

As for performance, my personal experience is that in the heat of the moment it doesn't matter a toss either way! There is so much more to it than circumcised or not, if you get my drift.

As for women being very interested in whether their prospective boyfriend has been done or not, they, in my opinion, are more interested in size and performance.

Those Medicals

It occurred to me, after reading of the member who likes to present himself to doctors for intimate medical examinations, of a similarity of experiences as myself. His is not quite my story, but I will explain.

Many years ago whilst in the army overseas, it was the custom, when there was nothing else to do, to have a medical inspection. We would go as a section of about 30 men and, upon arriving, strip down to our trousers and await the doctor (who was probably still drinking). His assistant would call the first one up, the doctor would look you over and might ask a question. Then he would tell you to drop your trousers, have a good look at your equipment, and tell you to turn around and bend down.

Now, believe it or not, some of the boys did not like doing this a bit, but I rather liked the ritual. So, for a drink afterwards, I used to go up twice, once for myself and once for him. I thoroughly enjoyed showing my genitalia to the doctor. Also to the other 29 men present. I did not receive all the other delights though that your other writer mentions, but it is a great experience to see 30 different penises. I would say that  $\frac{2}{3}$  were roundheads.

I never got an erection during these little games, and after all these years, it would seem hard to believe, but I can remember many of the penises as if it were yesterday.

Royal Events

A week or so ago, Princess Margaret briefly hit the headlines after voicing displeasure at the shenanigans of the younger royals. It was pointed out how lucky she was in her time to have been immune to the goldfish bowl treatment – and contempt – with which the Royal family is treated these days. In following up her relationships with Roddy Llewelyn and her ex-husband Lord Snowdon, a farmer was interviewed who lived next to a commune frequented by Princess Margaret. His main recollection was in seeing Margaret welcomed by the inmates – all of whom were bollock-naked!

This reminds me of an article in the French magazine Paris Match, which in those days was always prepared to publish material our own pulp mags shied away from. The article was on the Princess's taste in extra-curriculum entertainment, and showed a full-page picture of her on the French Caribbean island of Guadeloupe in a swimsuit, flanked on either side by a grinning nude male, whose private parts she graciously shielded from view with a top hat held in each hand.

In the next picture the Princess had disappeared, leaving the two men in a disrespectful state of nudity. Both were clearly uncircumcised. Could this be a sign that, despite her disapproval of Di's presence in the Royal family, she nevertheless shares her partiality for foreskins, fuelled possibly by the lack of such a commodity in her own family? We shall probably never know unless someone writes an unapproved biography of her.

The mention of communes rings a bell with me because, as a younger chap, I spent several happy months in one in the Cotswolds. We were a bunch of young idealists of both sexes with an ambition to explore the delights of free love and nudity, with the total abolition of petty jealousy, envy, inhibition and outdated moral constraints. Sadly, the reason for the evolution in civilised societies of the nuclear family gradually became apparent with twinges of jealousy, envy of others' physical attributes, and eventual revulsion at constantly seeing girls getting singly and collectively fucked on the living room carpet.

In fact I met my current girlfriend at the commune, where she arrived with her husband one day, starry-eyed like the rest of us, and keen to get stuck into this new way of life. Her husband lacked her enthusiasm, giving the impression of only coming along to humour her. He was very reluctant to strip off, but had his leg pulled by his wife until he did so. She explained to us that, as the only circumcised man there, he felt rather self-conscious. We, of course, were careful not to say anything to upset him about it, although his wife, who totally lacked inhibitions, twitted him mercilessly about it, making him – and us – feel quite uncomfortable. Later, when the commune broke up in a flash of spontaneous and mutual disillusionment, she left her husband and joined me in a new and more conventional lifestyle in Cheltenham.

Unlike most, she suffered none of the inherent feelings which caused the breakup, and looked back with fondness on the group sex and shared sensuality in which she participated with more zeal than most. She had – and has – an enthusiasm for sexual pleasure which I have not encountered with any other female. To this day she likes to laze in bed on a Sunday morning, gradually and systematically stoking our sexual fires until we finally fuse in a high octane sexual conflagration, before repairing in a haze of contentment to the local for lunch. She starts off by asking me to give her her weekly twatty-shave, which always gets my dander up. She is equipped with a particularly neat-looking vulva with the opening modestly closed up into a thin slit. I never cease to be surprised how it stays closed, even when she spreads her thighs apart to give more access. Meanwhile she gets her own enjoyment from languidly playing with my penis, every so often stretching my foreskin out and twanging it like a piece of elastic. The next step is usually mutual and simultaneous oral sex, which we both dote on, before the finale.

She is a keen reader of Acorn, and spends a lot of time discussing the pros and cons of circumcision, of which she does not approve. She constantly voices her awareness of the fact that her circumcised ex-husband, besides being unhappy about his state, was never able to share the intensity of sexual response she enjoyed. She claimed that not having a foreskin made it difficult for her to fire him up when she needed servicing: he lacked the instant response she obtains when she pulls my foreskin back and forth. His sexual response tended to be a gradual heightening of sexual tension followed by sudden release, but without the pleasurable sensations she experienced. She certainly takes – and gives – a lot of pleasure from manipulating my foreskin and has the view that it is there for a very good reason. One thing she read in Acorn which still makes her laugh is the claim that foreskins are the favourite playthings of little boys and big girls. She goes along with that.

No Hands

The other morning something occurred which has never happened before. I woke up quickly from a dream that I was wanking, and at the moment of waking I orgasmed. The peculiar thing was that my hand was nowhere near my cock and I wasn't even hard. More peculiar was that the orgasm was dry. This surprised me so much that I thought I would try to repeat it again, so I put my hands behind my head, closed my eyes and pretended I was wanking furiously. Sure enough, it happened again, my body involuntarily doubling itself up slightly. Then I did it a third time. I didn't get the feeling of loss of interest that always comes after normal orgasm.

I thought that this was marvellous. I'd heard that some men could get multiple orgasms, but not me, into middle age. What's more it didn't wake my wife up. She doesn't like the thought of me masturbating anyway, thinking that it's something that excludes her. Several tries since have, unfortunately, produced absolutely nothing, but maybe the right circumstances will occur again to make it possible.

This type of thing has been on my mind for a while since I read an article last year by a man in Forum who wrote about 'teaspooning'. In this, you wank until you're just about at the point of no return, then stop. You then don't have the feeling of orgasm, but ooze out some come, although not as much as normal. You do this once or twice more on the trot and then you get a dry run. I tried this a few times. It didn't work at first because I couldn't call up enough willpower to stop at the given time, but I eventually did. Again, one or two comes didn't lead to a loss of interest.

From this I have to gather that the loss of interest one encounters must only occur when the two parts of orgasm happen simultaneously. The writer went on to say how, by stopping wanking a split second before that method, you could have a dry orgasm. But I couldn't make that work.

Maybe other members have some experience of these things. If so, maybe they could let us know.

A Bit About S&CN

Smooth & Cut Naturists (S&CN) is a new venture for naturists (nudists) started at the end of 1996 with the sole aim of joining together for discussion men and women who practise depilation (body hair removal at least of the pubic region, by whatever means), with the men also being fully circumcised.

The idea of an exclusive club for smooth and circumcised naturists/nudists evolved from the Organiser's association with other clubs with allied topics of interest. In particular the Organiser (John) – a dedicated naturist who has a completely shaved body and who was fully circumcised at birth – is an established member of The Smoothie Club which started in 1990, and is a member of The Acorn Society and Smoothie Club Leisure as well as WNN (the Dutch Smoothie Club).

S&CN Members of either sex are of the firm opinion that to be smooth (ie without body hair), and for the male to be circumcised, forms the perfect combination, especially when nude, with so many distinct advantages which set us above other ordinary members of the population. We are unashamedly an elite group.

The many advantages of being smooth and, in the male, circumcised range from being totally open and concealing absolutely nothing when seen nude, to being able to keep scrupulously clean, to being far more appealing to look at when nude, to having unbelievable sensitivity and enjoyment during more intimate times.

It is the intention of the Organiser that, whenever possible, members of S&CN should spread the word about of the distinct advantages of depilation and circumcision of the male, and to recruit others (especially nudists) to join our special club either as Full Members or Associate Members.

Full Members must meet the basic three criteria, namely: a) they are naturists/nudists (or are at least happy about being in socially nude company); b) they must have removed at least their pubic hair totally; c) (for men) they must be fully circumcised.

Associate Membership is a discretionary section into which the Organiser may invite individuals who, while not meeting all the criteria for Full Membership (above), will probably fall into at least one of the above categories and be able to demonstrate their interest and determination to become Full Members by qualifying in more in the future.

Many women are keen on the advantages of male circumcision from the “end user’s” as well as the cleanliness and aesthetic points of view and their contributions to discussions will be extremely valuable. Their enthusiasm for this alone will be enough to qualify them for Associate Membership. However they need only to be smooth naturists/nudists to be Full Members. Qualifying females will be made to feel welcome at meetings and at all times they must be made to feel relaxed about expressing views on club subjects amongst other members, whether men or women.

It is intended that membership of S&CN will be enthusiastic and vibrant with Full Members’ ideas being implemented by the Organiser when practicable. Group meetings will be held for general discussion in convivial (hopefully nude) surroundings. Suggestions for suitable venues are welcomed by the Organiser.

A short – probably two-sided A4 – news sheet Ultimate Nudity (usually in colour) will be sent to all Full Members (and Associate Members upon request) about twice a year. Members’ views, opinions and experiences appertaining to Circumcision, Depilation and Nudity will be welcomed for inclusion. The Organiser/Editor reserves the right to shorten submitted material, which may include line-art or photographic prints. (Enclose SAE for return.) Members will also be given the opportunity to send short contact ads via the Box No to the Organiser/Editor who, at his discretion, will list them in the news sheet. After initial contact has been made through the Box No (SAEs for reply must be enclosed), further correspondence will take place on a person-to-person basis. Members’ first names, town and county only will be published.

The Organiser (John) may at any time use the services of other willing Members to help run our club.

At all times be kind and considerate to all other members and, without being unnecessarily pushy, spread the word that we are a very friendly and exclusive club to non-members who may wish to join us!

SCN, PO Box 164, Northwood, HA6 2QR

Mixed Feelings

Why is it that from almost the beginning of time, man’s most intimate, private and sensitive possession has been the target for modification? For some races, the nominal reason for justifying circumcision is religious, for others it is given as hygiene, for the modern western culture it seems to be a matter of social fashion. However, these ‘reasons’ are but a rationalisation of some deeper motivation to modify the penis and expose that formerly hidden symbol of sexual maturity and prowess. Can anyone bring a deeper enlightenment on what is almost a compulsive tendency of much of the human race to circumcise its males.

Before readers conclude that this is going to be another letter from a disgruntled roundhead, I will state my own feelings; past and present. Circumcised as an infant when it was a fashionable routine in the UK, I was at first shocked as a child to learn that my little willy had been cut and changed permanently without my earlier knowledge. The impact of this enlightenment faded after some months of coming to an acceptance. After all, I was very pleased with the look of it and much preferred my circumcised appearance to those who were intact. I was told boys were better for being cut and looked nicer and more manly. Of course I believed that, coming from the authority of my father who had one just like mine!

Throughout life I have been a great believer in circumcision, although respecting the individual's right of choice where possible. I have always been glad to be a circumcised male; that is, until recent years. I am now finding that my quite generous inner foreskin remnant is shrinking. This does not affect intercourse, but does seriously affect my main technique for masturbation. I am also finding that 'getting started' takes much longer and the buildup to climax is much slower than of earlier years. Of course, I'm getting older, but I do believe that circumcision and the reduced remnant of inner skin is also playing its part in desensitising and prolonging matters.

Have other readers found similar changes with the years, and do those with very little remnant foreskin find problems with sensitivity throughout their lives? Is a decline in loose skin and sensitivity purely a consequence of being circumcised, or do those with foreskins experience a similar reduction in amount of skin and/or sensitivity as the years progress? For some time now I have become less in favour of circumcision and have had great yearnings to have been left intact, although I have to say I still prefer the look of a nicely circumcised penis. Am I alone in feeling this way; what do others think?

Well, I hope that stirs up some worthwhile discussion in the columns. While I ask the questions, I am satisfied in general with my circumcised status and have no major regrets. In the modern world there still seems to be a socio-religious disposition to circumcise males in many countries; is there any information as to exactly which countries and the percentage of males circumcised? Long may there be the variety of circumcised and intact organs. It certainly adds considerable interest, at least to one Acorn member.

Books

Following on from 1/97, there is that classic for all those who eagerly scan the literature for mention of the words foreskin and circumcision – The Hand-Reared Boy by Brian Aldiss, in which he devotes a lot of his character's (ie his own) childhood to his thoughts on his circumcised penis and other boys' foreskins, and later to his seduction by the 29 year-old school matron (wishful thinking?). This book is a must for any new members who may not have come across it before.

Our hero, Horatio, kicks off his sexual career when his big brother aged thirteen initiates him into the joys of masturbation. Sister Ann then gets involved and takes to the exercise like a duck to water, insisting on doing them both at the same time, although neither of them achieve an orgasm. Horatio first realises his altered state when he stops for a pee in a field with two friends and notices that they had 'the other kind of prick – with skin'. Later, one of them lets him have a look at it – it seemed a very strange object to Horatio, long and pale with the skin coming right over the red knob, ending pink and pursed, like a flower bud. His sister Ann, who has also found out about foreskins from other girls, says she would like to manipulate one and gets him to ask his friend if she can 'have a go with it', but to Ann's disappointment he refuses. Horatio then describes how his interest in uncircumcised cocks was renewed when a fat boy his age called William offered to show him his cock, which he discovered was covered by a very thick skin. It became erect in his grasp and he let Horatio draw the skin back to reveal his glistening knob, brightly coloured. He then urged Horatio to wank it up and down, which he did until the boy shuddered and gasped into orgasm. This was an exciting revelation to Horatio who knew nothing about orgasms. When William then tried to return the compliment he found his penis did not respond. He experimented by inserting his knob under William's foreskin, which did give him a charge, but he still could not come, and so contented himself thereafter with manipulating William's foreskin to orgasm whenever the idea entered their heads, but stopped William having any more goes with his.

Later, Horatio goes to boarding school and gets involved in the universal dormitory wank session, which they called insurance clubs. Groups of four boys got together and took it in turns to masturbate the others. Horatio describes in detail how this allowed him to reopen his investigation of uncircumcised penises, since all the other members of his clubs were endowed with foreskins. That extra piece of skin, he said, seemed to him an extraordinary luxury. It drew back so sumptuously and was juicy underneath, not unlike Beatrice's fanny (Beatrice was the family maid who allowed – and took – liberties with her, and his, sexual organ). Smith's foreskin peeled back of its own accord as his penis swelled to erection. Partington had inches of it and could only draw it back with difficulty; he liked it to be manipulated with his foreskin up, and took ages to come (good Acorn material here), whereas Rivers preferred it with his foreskin drawn right back. He then goes on to describe another school friend who had a penis which was 11" long when limp and 13" when erect (wishful thinking again!) The boy never tired of flashing it for the benefit of the other boys, who begged him to let them have a wank at it. One day the boy decided to favour Horatio, took him behind an armchair in the library and produced it – 'It rose before me in all its glory, the foreskin not quite long enough, so that a glimpse of the knob was temptingly revealed. I began to move the flesh reverently up and down'. The boy watched him doing so and then demonstrated how he could put the end in his mouth and suck it, graciously allowing Horatio to finish him off afterwards.

This variety of foreskins fascinated and troubled Horatio. He goes on to say how sister Ann had watched their father changing on the beach once, and discovered that the end of his penis was covered in skin. Horatio wondered why then he had taken his foreskin away, saying that it seemed an unfriendly thing to do. He ends by admitting that he worried about it a lot, and much of his masturbation at this time was directed towards massaging the skin in the hope that it might grow back.

All of these books are classics in their own way, and no keen Acorn member should deprive himself of the pleasure of reading them – they are available in most public libraries, although in some you might have to put in a special order for them.

Editorial

The time is coming along for our next meeting. Brian has asked me to say that it will be either the weekend of October 12th or 19th. He will inform us as soon as he can to be definite, but since members want as long as possible prior notice we thought it best to narrow it down a bit now.

In the meantime I'll have my own piece of 'contact corner' and say that if any member with time to spare wishes to visit for a chat they are quite welcome. Have a day at the seaside and I can accommodate overnight. Just dropping me a telephone number will do.

We are still getting nice reviews for the newsletter, so thank you to all the contributors for their diverse views and opinions. Keep them coming.

Mandella

I was recently staying at a hotel in which were piles of back copies of glossy magazines. In Country Life for Jan 12th 1995 was a book review of Nelson Mandella's autobiography,

Correspondence

Please send all correspondence to:-

THE ACORN SOCIETY
PO BOX 113
WESTON-SUPER-MARE
SOMERSET, BS23 1DJ

Letters for forwarding should be marked in pencil with the recipient's identifier. They should be stamped 1st class and be enclosed in an envelope addressed as above.

Long Walk to Freedom. The review, which was written by Sir Geoffrey Howe, included this sentence:-

“The Africanism of Mr Mandella’s adolescence in Thembuland’s royal household (he was indeed ‘to the manor born’) is underlined by the chilling account of his own circumcision ceremony.”

The book is priced at £25 (published by Little, Brown) and is rather a lot to buy if you are not interested by the rest of Nelson Mandella’s life, but I should think it will be available from public libraries.

It would be interesting to have the extract published in Acorn, but I suspect it would be infringing copyright laws to do so.

Shocking

I hope I have found in you a place for my obsessions. I get aroused merely hearing the word ‘circumcision’.

Let me tell you something about myself. I am a 22-year-old student, cut since I was 18. I never had any problems with my foreskin, I just found that I didn’t deserve it. Nice guys are foreskinned, but as a sign for my evilness I wanted to ‘bear’ the sign of circumcision.

I loved it when other boys pointed at my clipcock, ridiculing me for being cut. I’d love to meet someone who could insult me for being a littly cutboy.

From this point springs another fantasy of mine – I’d love to take revenge on each guy ridiculing me by eventually circumcising him myself. I am mean – I want to show these nice uncut guys.

I hope these fantasies are not too shocking for you – until now I have never even dared to tell anyone about it. What can you make out of it? Do you think I should pursue psychiatric help?

I would love to hear about other boys with equal obsessions – if they exist. I would really appreciate any help from your side.

Prostate Secretions

Edition 3/97 caught up with me yesterday morning and it makes a good read. I see that P.U. from Edinburgh (Juices – page 10) asks me some questions about prostate secretions. I don’t have any especially new research findings to offer him because, like him, I am retired and confess to being rather less than diligent when it comes to keeping up with the latest developments in the field of medicine.

However, I am intrigued by his ability, at 66, to ejaculate as much as “10 ml at a time” and that this may be repeated “three or four times before orgasm occurs”. I do hope he isn’t boasting, tongue in cheek, because those kind of quantities are, quite frankly, enormous. I wonder what he means by three or four times before orgasm? Is he suggesting an overspill of semen on three or four occasions during one masturbatory session before proceeding to full orgasm? The dribbling of quite copious quantities of clear viscous, so-called ‘pre-cum love juice’, during the masturbatory build-up of excitement is common enough, but I have never heard of anyone producing anything like 30-40ml of the stuff. This is produced by the Cowper’s Glands in the urethra and is, essentially, a lubricant.

I am 64, and there are few who can be more dedicated to at least twice-a-day masturbation than I am. During a long session I may overspill a few ml. of genuine semen quite a long time in advance of full orgasm without apparently reducing the final volume of my ejaculate. But even in my younger, and more virile, days I don’t suppose I ever ejaculated more than an occasional 7ml. The average was about 4ml, in line with most guys. 5ml. must be considered a ‘top of the range load’ by virtually anyone. Only once, many years ago, have I been gob-smacked by a truly incredible ejaculation. I was with a guy in the back seat of my car and when he announced his impending climax I handed him a plastic picnic beaker as the nearest available receptacle. He more than half filled it, and the memory of it still utterly amazes me.

Prostatic fluid is alkaline. Its two principal purposes are to provide an activating medium in which sperm can swim, and a means of neutralising the acid secretions of the vagina. In any one ejaculation, as much as 95% of the fluid involved is from the prostate gland. The solid equivalent mass of the sperm cells amounts to a mere 5%.

On another subject. I have recently been seeing a guy from the West Country who maintains that semen is poisonous to the human host in whom it is produced. Only when it is regularly ‘got rid of’ through frequent masturbation/partnered sex can the guy who produced it feel at his peak of health. I must say that this hypothesis is a new one on me, but I confess that I always do feel much fitter, and mentally more content, when I’m in the middle of one of my ‘sexually busy’ periods. I wonder if this is a West Country ‘old wives tale’ or if it is a widely believed concept which has simply passed me by. Do other readers have any comments to make? In particular, what do they personally think of the notion.

Them And Us

In these days of Political Correctness, when the minorities have to be given due deference, would it not be a good idea to form a women’s group – or create a women's section for the newsletter? After all, most men are only concerned with their own penis whereas women take an interest in them all – or at least those of their boyfriends, partners, children and so on. True, they are unlikely to take up entrenched attitudes on the circumcision issue, if only because it cannot happen to English girls. But in this context, the subject of female circumcision is a very highly emotive one for most women, and we have succeeded in getting the practice, associated only with immigrants, outlawed in this country. Those women involved in campaigning against FGM (female genital mutilation) of course will, naturally enough, feel duty bound to oppose male circumcision. However, the majority of us won't have a clue what it's about, since we're unlikely to encounter either male, let alone female, circumcision in today's Britain. Consequently there are probably a lot of women who are likely to be interested in your movement since the subject breaks new ground for the majority of us, and precious little information is available about it elsewhere.

Having established my credentials as a staunch member of the feminist group, I think it might be useful to your members if they knew what makes us tick, and how our thoughts can be relevant to the subject of penises in general. Firstly, there is the matter of penis envy. Imagine the fascination to a young girl of that sprig of flesh which is capable of so many exciting manoeuvres: the sudden appearance of the tiny scarlet cherry when the skin is pulled back, and the amazing ability of the organ to stiffen and lengthen when handled. And then every little girl feels short-changed the first time she sees the pride with which her brother can pee, standing up and aiming a neat little jet with a precision which she cannot hope to match. The feeling is reinforced if the boy then shows off by ballooning his foreskin, which can be startling, and indeed disturbing, to a young girl (and to big girls too on occasion). Consequently, she feels distinctly inferior in having to squat down to pee in an unseemly fashion, and being able to produce only an untidy and haphazard torrent, unstoppable once started. This envy usually lasts a couple of years and then fades away as girls learn to appreciate the very distinct advantages of what they've got, except in the matter of taking a leak.

Feminists on the other hand have not forgotten this area of male domination – and female humiliation – and hate the thought that men can stand proudly peeing with the ability to direct their neat, if puny stream wherever they want. In recent years in the States, prominent feminists have decided to take a stand in this matter – literally. Learned treatises have been published by feminists in various ranking positions in society explaining that women too can be just like men and pee in a standing position.

I shouldn't imagine men are all that interested in the techniques used to achieve this desirable stance, but I'll mention them just the same. Firstly, it is generally recognised that if women stand and pee in the normal male position, quite a lot gets to run down one or both legs. However, if both hands are used to pull the flesh above the privates upwards and outwards, the stream tends to hang together much more, and is directed forward instead of straight down. If directional accuracy is still lacking, another dodge is to fold over the top part of the inner lips so that the bottom part forms a funnel which can give quite good directional accuracy.

In the States, which is famous for its cunning gadgetry, they have devised a plastic funnel which fits snugly inside the inner lips and directs the stream in as neat a jet as any man can achieve, with the added advantage that the inner lips can be kept relatively dry. On this point it is worth noting that American feminists are now not only advocating the standing pee but have also decided that females should no longer use toilet paper after peeing. Why should they have to when men don't? I'm not sure I go along with that because even if you take a daily shower you will still have a minor hygiene problem at the end of the day.

Another thing that feminists find irritating, due not so much to the absence of the male organ as to the presence of the female slot, is the problems which arise when riding a bicycle. Have you men ever wondered why, in the days of women running the marathon and going into space, the Tour de France and similar long-distance cycle events are restricted to the male sex? The reason is simple – the narrow racing saddle necessary for high speed cycling is just not compatible with the female anatomy, and although some girls get sexually aroused by friction against the vulva, over a period of time it becomes very sore and bruised, since it has to bear most of the girl's weight. As a result, long distance cycling is out as far as the cloven sex is concerned. In this case there is virtually nothing feminists can do to balance the discrepancy. They just have to grit their teeth and write it off whilst bemoaning nature's scandalous unfairness.

Finally, one of the triumphs for the feminist cause was the recent all-women expedition to the North Pole – which so many men have failed to achieve in the past. One of the built-in disadvantages that the girls faced was once again the lack of a penis to pee through. You just cannot bare the backside when the temperature is 40 below! Consequently a great deal of thought and planning went into the expedition – and was discussed in fascinating detail – and at considerable length in the media – about how a girl could take a leak in the Arctic. The leader of the expedition explained with satisfaction that their suits were equipped with a zip that went from the navel round to the bottom of the spine. Underwear took the form of late Victorian 'drawers' with an open crutch. Although it makes me proud that we have overcome such problems, I can't help thinking that it's a hell of a palaver just to take a pee. Surely the American plastic funnel would have been easier.

Doing Things

The arrival of the latest newsletter has spurred me into action to write to you again – given me more to write about, even. What a most interesting issue. For example, the advert for the smooth and cut naturists club, although, alas, currently I could only be an associate member – partly due to the cost of circumcision (another important angle raised this time). And I really hope we hear again soon from our new South African friend. He sounds a very interesting individual. I hope to find out what ‘self experiment’ he has performed. It would of course be great if there were ideas I could utilise. I guess this is a part at least of what the Acorn organisation is about, pooling ideas for altering and continually improving the feeling and appearance of one’s cock. The ultimate, naturally, is circumcision, but there are many and various other new sensations we can discover through communication.

Meanwhile, having missed my ‘target’ date for getting cut, I decided to make some dramatic alterations to my foreskin, on the basis that if anything went wrong it wouldn’t matter as I was going to get rid of it eventually anyway. I used to have about half a dozen piercings in it which have lately fallen into ‘disuse’. In a revival of interest I decided to make some more, then joined some of them together, creating three large holes, whilst others I simply cut away with the sharp upward thrust with a scalpel. The rim now has an interesting ‘ragged’ look. Stretching continues on the three main piercings whilst, incidentally, other minor ones are also ‘growing’. The big three are approximately 2 cms across, one slightly more, one slightly less, and all three can be easily slipped over my cockhead to sit nicely in the coronal groove. I find I can only do this with two at a time. I often sit for periods, ie. watching TV, with fingers hooked through, pulling to maintain tension. I have a no limit stretching project here. Helpful suggestions would be gratefully received.

Many years ago I had a persistent urge that I wanted to be able to get a finger into my pisshole, and I wanted the hole to stay open, kind of like the end of a hosepipe, instead of closing ‘flat’ after every piss. Wouldn’t this make it easier to piss, increase the volume of the flow. I imagined a bigger, stronger stream, bladder emptying much faster...in fantasy anyway. I soon learned that I could cut away the thin membrane at the underside end of the slit. A Prince Albert piercing also helped until it too was cut away. Things were opening up at last...I could part my pisslips. Stretching that sensitive inner skin was magic. I wanted more. I had a new P.A., substantially anchored further down – too substantially really, plenty of room to cut a bit more of that piss tube, and exposed a bit more inner skin...brilliant...I can now part my piss lips so that the underside of my cockhead will open out flat! Blood oozing, it is not always easy to immediately see how deep a new incision is...sometimes deeper than originally intended at the time. However, the final split happened of its own accord. Big piss hole...no P.A.

Nowadays my stream is flowing slower than it used to (muscles weakening?), and with an increasingly stretched, loose, wrinkled foreskin collecting more residual drips!

Pulled back, my foreskin will usually stay back these days, in which case residue makes increasingly large, damp, brown patches on underwear. I have been wearing light-coloured slacks recently for work, and consequently had more than one near embarrassing accident. Sometimes, unnoticed, my piss flow splits into two, going in completely separate directions. Obviously, the more alterations you make, the more diligent you must become! Being much more aware of your cock, and the way it performs, is no bad thing. I enjoy the greater awareness that I have to observe, and plan to continue changing my cock for the better, not least by eventual radical circumcision.

Having decided on circumcision, I feel it best to take a very positive stance and have the maximum amount of redundant skin removed. One good reason for this is to reveal to maximum advantage the delightful unique helmet shape of the male cock head, and not spoil the profile by leaving too much skin to roll up under the rim. Another is to achieve, to quote a delighted circumcisee, a permanent 'tingling, stretching sensation' when erect. Skin so tight as to make his cock curve upwards. Sounds good to me.

May I put in here a note, as an Acorn member, of support for your oft repeated request for newsletter contributions from some of our 'silent' friends. I guess in some cases silence may be due to the lack of privacy to compile confidential correspondence, but one reason why we all subscribe to Acorn is surely to read about other guys' experiences appertaining to their cocks. I for one would enjoy reading even quite basic information, so don't feel that you have nothing to say, your cock is totally unique to you – and we'd all love to know about it... How long is it?...How long have you had it(!!?)...What is your 'cut' status?...What else have you done to it?...What would you like to do with it?...Does it come(!!) with any special attachments or ornamentation? There are so many of you out there – so many cocks waiting to be revealed. Everybody would love to hear from you – HONEST.

Simple Procedure

I was intrigued to read in the article quoted from H & E in 2/97, that "if a man has a tight foreskin he can have a simple procedure which widens and stretches it, thus relieving the problem without the necessity of removing part of his pride and joy". What exactly is this simple procedure? If it is so simple, why is it not better known? Why should it not be used on boys of a very early age?

Marjorie Mitchell, also in 2/97, who is a nurse, writes in the same vein, "Nowadays, conservative procedures, such as steroid creams and minor surgery which removes no tissue, are so well understood on the Continent that circumcisions are scarcely ever needed to be done..." Again, what does this minor surgery consist of, and why is it not understood in this country?

On another subject, I agree with your contributor who would like to see more contributions from women. Cannot Tuppy Owens be persuaded to write about her preferences.

I.D. – Herts.

No Hands Comment

The feature by Anonymous in 4/97 under this heading didn't cause me any great surprise. It is traditional in Western culture to consider the male sexual climax as being a single combined event of orgasm and ejaculation. Because we expect things to happen in this way we rarely make any effort to behave differently but, in fact, the two happenings are entirely separate, and Oriental Taoists have recognised this for centuries. They have trained themselves so that it is quite natural for them to reach orgasm without ejaculation. It is ejaculation, not orgasm, which results in the explosive release of body energy leading to the subsequent 'refractory period', during which re-arousal is not possible. By avoiding ejaculation, Taoists can enjoy long sexual sessions with multiple orgasms, all of which are just as fully satisfying as any Western man's single climax after which he is suitably 'knackered'.

Personally, after a period of arousal, I have experienced spontaneous full semen emissions (much to my embarrassment) without any sensation of orgasm and, similarly, in my younger days I trained myself to enjoy the full thrill of orgasm without contracting the muscles leading to ejaculation. I'm afraid I've lost that trick now, which is a pity, because 1) non-ejaculation saves a bomb on paper tissue or stained sheets, and 2) the multiple orgasms referred to in paragraph 1 were a great bonus.

The psychological stimulus to sexual climax is often forgotten in the rush to achieving it through physical means. Both elements are very important. A 'no hands' wet dream can, in fact, be 'wet' or 'dry'. In either event the brain has led the individual to full-scale sexual climax during sleep without any physical stimulus being applied. The thrashing around in bed which accompanies a full ejaculatory dream of this kind can create a degree of apparent wet messiness far in excess of the actual volume of semen produced. But a dry nocturnal sexual climax can often be far more erotic and exciting than the real thing because the brain isn't hampered by any psychological inhibitions.

Your contributor has proved that he is capable of separating orgasm from ejaculation. He should concentrate on repeating the process by thought alone or by holding back upon the completion of manual masturbation. It will give him the opportunity to enjoy a multi-orgasmic sexlife to the full.

I suggest he reads The Multi-Orgasmic Man by Mantak Chia and Douglas Abrams Arava (ISBN 07225 3325 X). I have a 'Soft Back Preview' Book Club edition. It makes both interesting and enjoyable reading.

The Ostrich Man

Why Ostrich Man? Well, man because it is me, with a penis, and ostrich because if you are familiar with the ostrich's ability to get all manner, shapes and sizes of objects down its neck, and then think of my urethra in the same way, you will begin to understand.

I have, for almost the past 40 years or so, inserted things into my penis, and having a vivid imagination as well as being inventive, and having the means to manufacture accordingly, has left me with a lot of 'toys' and mischief. This may not appeal to many people, which I find difficult to understand as the human nature seems to be to investigate all orifices. However, I have seen only three insertions on videos, but feel convinced that there must be more 'ostriches' in the world.

My introduction to this 'hole' delightful sensation is the result of schoolboy inquisitiveness!! A friend and I one day were resting in a field during a cycle ride (aged about 12), when one of us needed a pee. I was chewing the soft end of a grass stalk (when one pulls the centre from the root section the lower bit is quite flexible) and playfully pushed the soft tip into my 'tip'. This was quite intriguing to both of us, and it was not long before both of us were trying it to see who could take the longest straw and how many in a bundle. Well, that was many years ago. Naturally, in all the years I have been an 'ostrich' I have both learned, and stretched, to accommodate surprisingly large, long and sometimes bizarre items down my penis.

Should there be any kindred souls who may wish to correspond further on the subject, I, naturally, would be absolutely delighted.

Ostrich

Woman And Hair

Having been a regular contributor to the naturist magazine H & E for many years, my attention has been drawn to your newsletter No 4/97. Firstly, let me say how pleased I am to see such matters as circumcision and pubic shaving discussed, both of which are of interest to naturists – and so few people are prepared to speak out on sexual matters. After talking to naturist friends of both sexes who agree with my sentiments, I should like to make a comment on two articles given coverage in your newsletter.

The first concerns the new organisation for 'shaved and cut naturists' (S&CN) of both sexes. Now I'm no prude, heaven knows, but for me naturism means being natural in all things. All God's female creatures except human beings walk on all fours and have their parts hidden by two legs and a tail. We who walk on two legs have a pubic bush to achieve the same object. And the reason? To avoid inflaming sexual feelings in the male at inappropriate times. (Men, being mere derivatives from the female, share possession of the pubic bush, although with them it serves no purpose).

Consequently, at the risk of appearing old-fashioned and fuddy-duddy, I can only declare those women who shave their private parts and put them on public show to be shameless and immodest hussies! The only reason a lady nudist can have for removing the hair which nature ordained should conceal her sexual cleft is to attract men by the crudest possible method – giving them an uninterrupted view of Venus' fly-trap! I therefore disapprove of the practice, although I realise that some men, including my husband, do not share my views on this one. As for male shaving, I cannot imagine what is achieved by it.

Another matter requiring comment is the widely held presumption that most nudists prefer men to be circumcised. There is no doubt that a lot of letters to H & E support circumcision, and a lot of their photographs feature circumcised men. This is mainly because the magazine has a wide circulation in the USA, but in this country the idea does not appeal to everyone by any means, and in this matter I am strongly supported by my uncircumcised husband and two uncircumcised sons! My ideal of masculine perfection, both visual and functional, is a medium sized or smallish organ equipped with a nice heavy-duty foreskin which conceals the glans totally and is fully retractile.

Whilst on the subject, I must also comment on the deplorable fact that some men choose to walk about on a nudist beach with their foreskins retracted. Why they should want to do such a thing, heaven only knows! It strikes me that this practice involves a similar degree of exhibitionism with a liberal whiff of masochism: nature intended man's working part to be protected from the outside world of UV rays, thorn bushes, rough towels etc. It should only be revealed when it is to be put to its traditional use. Seeing grown men walking about with their willy shaft strangulated by the drawn foreskin tip is as ridiculous as if they were walking about with their tongues stuck out, and while many women feel affronted by the sight (it is a popular method for young – and not so young – boys to insult and play up females), I don't mind telling you it sets my teeth on edge.

Finally, I must comment on the breathtaking account of self circumcision in the same issue. Assuming that it is a factual story and not someone's pet fantasy, I have to say from my experience as a prison visitor that self mutilation is a manifestation of deep unhappiness and self hatred arising from severe neurosis. If there had been some problem – constant pain or inability to retract – there might be some logic in feeling frantic enough to commit such an act, but from his own account there was nothing wrong with him, and he had a fully functional and mobile foreskin. The poor fellow, in my view, should urgently seek psychiatric help, since a lot can be done for such problems nowadays.

Doreen Chase

[I think this letter will engender some colourful comments on all the issues dwelt upon, so please make them open. — D.A.]

Colonial Cut

Routine circumcision on infants for purely cosmetic reasons can generally be attributed to the Anglo-Saxons. Their migration to the rest of the world created little pockets of predominantly circumcised communities. The USA, Australia, Canada and South Africa were, and still are, the major players in this routine operation. Except for the occasional Euro-Royal, as far as I know, no other European country has the tradition of infant circumcision. Incidentally, the Euro-Royals I mentioned were relations of the British Royal family, hence their puritanical leanings. I say puritanical because one major reason given for circumcision is the cleanliness it provides, and cleanliness is next to godliness. The other major reason for circumcision was the belief that it deterred self-abuse, the Anglo-Saxon fear and snobbery of sex. The chances of a non British born Anglo-Saxon being circumcised must be quite high.

I'm not very well informed about South Africa. I would like to know how common it is for circumcision amongst the white population. Is it only practised by the English speaking community, or do the Boers/Afrikaans practise it as well? I've often heard that Catholics in the USA were less likely to be circumcised. Is this true, and what Catholic community do they refer to, the Irish, Italian or Polish? A lot of Anglo-Saxons worldwide are still circumcised because of their country's colonial history. These traditions, handed down, are part of a heritage that doesn't exist any more. Ironically, in the U.K., the old colonial master has turned its back on this practice and moved on.

Madagascar

The island of Madagascar, 240 miles off the east coast of Africa, is the fourth-largest island in the world. It is geologically part of Africa, but its peoples are of mixed Polynesian, Arab and African origin. Tribal divisions were resolved in the late 19th century. The island was colonised (rather half-heartedly) by the French in 1895, and became independent in 1960. Despite its rich variety of unique flora and fauna, and its potential fertility, it is frequently devastated by major storms and is poor in consequence. The people's religious beliefs are a mixture of Muslim, Christian (as a result of much missionary activity since the 19th century) and ancestral beliefs. Fady is a widespread set of customs, beliefs and superstitions which govern many aspects of life, regardless of adherence to one of the main belief-systems.

In her Madagascar Travels (Hodder & Stoughton, 1995, £16.99, pp 111-113), Christina Dodwell visited much of the island, including Vohipeno on the south-east coast, an area inhabited by the Antaimoro, an old Arab tribe whose few elders have kept up use of the Arabic script and a written history. Of the local customs, the most important one for the young men was the circumcision ceremony that only happens once every seven years.

"We slaughter an ox and the feast goes on for several days. We all dance, and every day more boys are circumcised in public by various skilled elders, and then they become men. Boys long to be circumcised. Their friends tease those who are not, and make them ashamed. You tell your parents that if they don't get you cut you no longer want to be their son.

Fady has a lot to do with this. Uncircumcised boys are not permitted to eat legs of chicken, which are reserved for men, nor wear a hat, nor handle sharp iron instruments. This latter at least seems sensible for children, though the logical extension is a bit extreme. Because you are not allowed to cut an uncircumcised infant boy's fingernails with metal, the mother must bite his nails short with her teeth. Until you are circumcised, you are not of course allowed to marry. And if you die, you do not have the right to be laid in the family tomb.

The ancestors have to attend the ceremony to prevent accidental bleeding complications, to stop any squabbling between participants, and keep things correct. The prayers are in Arabic, and with the songs and felicitations, they stress the importance of sexual fertility and procreation. In fact, almost the whole of Madagascar practices circumcision as a fertility rite. It is an order from the ancestors."

This account seems to indicate that circumcision, while probably inescapable, may be done at any time from infancy to near marriageable age.

Maurice Bloch has studied circumcision among the Merina of Madagascar, laying great stress on the very little change in the rituals over almost two centuries, 1780-1970. His accounts emphasize the customary and anthropological aspects, and give little detail of the procedure itself, which is done with great ceremony for infant boys. Unambiguously non-Christian, circumcision of boys of the royal family became a large-scale state ritual and an act of allegiance, important to the nationalist movement as a way of showing resistance to the foreign intrusion represented by Christianity.

Pro-Masturbation Doctor

I was very interested to read Marjorie Mitchell's letter (2/97) about the GUM practice in UK and the fact that tight foreskins should now be treated by steroid creams and non-destructive surgery. Consequently, I was doubly interested when browsing through the Internet to come across a thesis by Michel Beauge, a French doctor with considerable experience in treating tight foreskins among older children and young adults at university, entitled Conservative Treatment of Primary Phimosis in Adolescents.

Unlike the British approach, this doctor, who claims that his treatment of 30 to 40 boys has resulted in no known failures, firmly believes that dilatation is the natural and effective method of treating a tight foreskin, and that all forms of surgery are damaging, unnecessary and psychologically traumatic. His observations are most interesting. Firstly, he declares that, whilst most infants have a tight foreskin, 10% of 18 to 22 year-olds have varying degrees of tightness, from inability to expose, to a tight ring that tends to stick in the groove after retraction. He goes on to say that most of these young men are virgins and that their masturbation methods differ from those with no problems: whereas most boys masturbate by sliding the skin back and forth, uncovering the glans in a simulation of intercourse, the boys with tight foreskins stroke the glans through the foreskin, but pulling it forward instead of back; rolling the penis between the palms; rubbing the penis against bedding without using the hand; rubbing it between the thighs; using a vibrator or shower; occasionally practising self-fellation (by the very supple); or who do not masturbate at all (very few).

Dr. Beauge argues that conventional masturbation is a natural and desirable preparation of the penis for normal sex with a female, with the ring of the prepuce and the fingers simulating the effect of the vagina in pushing the foreskin back off the glans. Those who masturbate in such a way as not to uncover the glans tend to suffer from phimosis since the foreskin orifice does not experience the expanding pressure of retraction but remains in its naturally tight infantile condition. The main problem this causes is the possibility of paraphimosis (ring sticks in the groove) on first intercourse when the boy has little control over the degree of retractile force applied, especially if the girl is too eager. This does not apply, though, to boys with very long and tight foreskins where penile penetration can be achieved satisfactorily with the glans covered.

Now the controversial bit. Dr Beauge consequently analyses his patients' methods of masturbation and instructs them in the masturbatory technique of pulling the foreskin back initially to uncover the tip of the glans. This can be a problem with boys who are used only to gain stimulation from the non-retractile methods and who find the normal method unrewarding, and perseverance is required. Thus the opening of the foreskin is 'moulded' under pressure against the erect tip of the penis, although in some cases the prepuce opening can be stretched with two fingers. The treatment is usually successful after four weeks, and Dr Beauge claims that in 15 years he has never had to refer a boy for surgery ie. circumcision.

All this sounds very reasonable and logical, but can you imagine any British doctor asking young boys about their method of masturbation and prescribing proper wanking procedures to relieve tight foreskins? The tabloids would have a field day and the doctor would probably face disciplinary action by the BMA.

Dr Beauge goes on to roundly condemn the practice of circumcision as a partial castration for which the ulterior motive is prevention of masturbation based on a religious fear that sexual enjoyment is basically sinful. He makes the point that a circumcised man in European society feels disgusted – and his girlfriend or sister disturbed – by a permanently exposed glans. The raw appearance makes those who see it feel uncomfortable at the sight. This can lead to psychological damage of varying severity.

He goes on to deplore the loss of sensitivity from the amputation of part of the erogenous zone which is the trigger for creating an erection, and which has more sensitivity than the glans itself. The only frictional contact that the glans appreciates, savours and tolerates, is the moist and padded vaginal (or oral) mucous membrane. The rough dry friction of the hand or fingers would soon become unbearable if mother nature had not interposed the foreskin as a screen. Above all, though, the loss of skin damages the process of coitus since the primary function of the foreskin is to allow vaginal intercourse under ideal conditions without friction. Dr Beauge illustrates what he has to say by suggesting an experiment. Try holding the tip of the erect penis of an uncircumcised boy and you can find you can move your fingers to the base of the penis without the fingertips moving from their point of contact with the skin. The foreskin unrolls and slides on the penis. There is no other part of the body capable of such skin mobility. Consequently, intercourse can be prolonged indefinitely without the friction, and thus irritation, which can and does arise after circumcision (as I know to my cost!)

My view on all this is that if the doctor is to be believed, and he should be, there is absolutely no excuse for cutting off a boy's foreskin merely because it is too tight. Just teach him how to wank properly and his problem is at an end.

Twice Under The Knife

My first circumcision was when I was 6 months old. I had to be 'done' as my mother said that I couldn't wee. In those days, the 1930s, one had to pay. I was taken to the local hospital where the operation was performed while my mother waited. She had had a hard time delivering me and subsequently suffered with phlebitis. On boarding the bus after leaving the hospital, the bus jolted and she fell with me in her arms. On arrival home she found that some of the stitches had come away. Being on a small income she could not afford to take me back for the operation to be repaired.

In later life when I began to masturbate, I was able, with plenty of lubrication, to pull the foreskin back. It hurt like hell at first, and with the friction I discovered that the skin within the foreskin tore on many occasions, especially if I was very vigorous with my wanking. This went on for some years, and many were the times when just as I was enjoying myself with another person I had to give up through sheer soreness.

Finally, at the age of 31 I got married. Not from choice, but for respectability. Living in a village it was considered that there was something wrong if you didn't marry.

Intercourse had always been a problem and it became worse once it was a regular thing. At times I was so sore that I could not perform to order. Two daughters later, my wife decided that she didn't want any more children and the subject of a vasectomy arose. I visited the surgeon who agreed to perform the operation, and I spoke to him about the tearing of my skin when having sex. He said that he would repair it, doing the vasectomy privately and the repair on the NHS. About two weeks later I received the summons to go into hospital and was duly operated on.

The day after the op, when the male nurse came to change the dressing, rather than being sore, it tickled, and I did nothing else but laugh. He was getting very annoyed, but as he had never experienced it, finally saw the funny side of things and finished up laughing himself. A week later I was discharged from hospital with dissolvable stitches in, and told to take frequent salt baths until the stitches came out themselves, which they did after about a week.

I returned to work with the stitches in, and as I was working at the time as a telephonist in a large London hotel I was able to sit down all the day during my shift. It was in the very hot summer of 1976 and I found the most discomfort travelling on the underground system, where one was jammed against other people, and being knocked with bags etc. The funniest thing was that I had lots of padding in my trousers, and the looks I got! Well, some of the faces were a sight to behold. 'If only', I thought.

The final outcome was that two weeks later I was to take a sample of my sperm to the path. lab. It was painful to wank into a small jar, but I managed it and took it along. The lady promptly held it up to the light in full view of the other people in the waiting room and said, "There's not much here". I told her that that was all she was getting.

I am very pleased that I was 'repaired', as I found that my penis had grown at least half an inch in length and the same in girth. I spoke to someone years later about this, who had been circumcised later in life, and he confirmed that the same had happened to him. The surgeon had left quite a bit of skin for me to get a full erection, and I think that this was the cause of the growth, so I feel that if this had been done in the first place properly, I might have had a bigger penis than I have now.

It would be interesting to know if there are others out there who have experienced the same.

Editorial

Brian has asked me to urge everyone who can, to make the meeting on October 18th. weekend. You can generally book right up to the last minute. And, of course, everyone always enjoys it. Also, would those attending please bring along any penis gadgets or paraphernalia that you use or have used in the past.

I've been asked to say that if you put an advert in 'Contact Corner' and receive a reply, please reply to that in turn, even if it's in the negative, as it is very frustrating to await a reply that never comes.

Joke

Two five-year-olds were talking at school:-

Boy 1: I'm going into hospital next week for an operation.

Boy 2: Oh Yeah. What for?

Boy 1: I'm going to get circumcised.

Boy 2: Boy! I wouldn't want to have to do that again.

Boy 1: Why not?

Reply To Ms S.W. (5/97)

I admired your article in our mag. which is mostly about circumcision of adults and sometimes of young lads. You are obviously very interested in the subject. I fully agree with you that a woman's page would be ideal, as, after all, women and young girls are usually on the receiving end of the penis, circumcised or not, so it would be nice that they should have their say.

I was circumcised as an adult about four years ago and I watched the operation being done. It was nice to see that foreskin being cut off as it had caused me lots of problems. It was about two and a half inches long but the opening in the end was very small and made it difficult to pull the skin right back. Since I have written articles for Acorn I have had many requests to show my scar to quite a few women in person who have been interested in having their husbands, and even boyfriends, circumcised. Being a naturist, one sees many men and young lads and women naked, but the circumcised ones are generally the older people rather than the young ones.

I was also very interested in your article regarding the way we pee and that unfortunately how women have to squat to pee. Men are interested in the way that women pee, and we men are fortunate to be able to pee anywhere quickly without having to pull our pants down. As you say, it is possible for women to pee standing up if they pull their labia open and up. This is what I have always wanted to see but have never been fortunate enough. I think it would be a great turn-on to watch. I remember before I was circumcised that if I didn't pull the skin back to pee I would get the same problem as a woman, with pee trickling down everywhere. As kids we used to pull our foreskins back just to see how far we could pee and how high. I should have been in the fire brigade.

I have had shaven pubes ever since the nurse shaved me to be circumcised. I'm sure a woman would find it easier to pee without hair to get in the way. I am not familiar with female circumcision and what they do. I can only suppose they cut away the clitoris area. As you say, cycling could be very painful and sore with those saddles up in the slit. I loved your article, so keep sending them in as we need the women's comments.

Response To Peter's 'Thoughts'

In his article 'Some Thoughts' published in Issue 4/97, Peter – London makes some sweeping generalisations which appear to be totally without foundation and cannot go without challenge.

He is right in stating that the majority of informed opinion accepts that there are benefits from circumcision. His conclusion that opinion in England is against circumcision fails to take into account the fact that this is not informed opinion. The benefits, and the few potential disadvantages, are never spelt out to parents nor are they taught to teenagers during their sex education lessons. If the facts were made properly available, and doctors accepted their responsibilities to circumcise when requested by patients or their parents, then the rate in Britain would be much higher – approaching that of the more enlightened USA.

The list of Pros totally ignores the medical research findings which show:-

1. 10-fold reduction in infant UTIs.
2. Total elimination of phimosis, paraphimosis, balanitis and frenulum breve.
3. Reduced rates of penile and cervical cancer.
4. Elimination of the potentially very serious bladder and liver damage caused by back pressure and reflux due to infant phimosis.
5. Reduction in some STDs and a possible reduced susceptibility to HIV/AIDS.

In the Against list he say there's more to play with and more to do with the penis. This is true in a sense, but the foreskin can also inhibit sexual activity. A recent survey showed that circumcised men enjoyed a much more varied sexual repertoire than uncut men.

He sweepingly states "there must be more sensation" without any facts to back it up. Masters and Johnston found there was no difference in overall sensation between circumcised and uncircumcised men. What one loses from the foreskin, one gains from direct stimulation of the coronal ridge and other parts of the glans.

Penetration is not necessarily easier or harder with a foreskin. The majority of the natural lubrication which aids penetration comes from the woman not the man. Men who have a long or tight foreskin can find that it actually hinders penetration, particularly of a small vagina, because it doesn't retract out of the way and the floppy end cannot be guided in so easily.

Circumcision costs time and money – but these are greatly reduced when done in infancy. One Canadian cost/benefit study concluded that the net national benefit in financial terms was to be obtained from routine infant circumcision. Although not everyone would need it if deferred to adulthood, the extra costs – for those who did need it – necessarily involved in hospitalisation and loss of working time for convalescence decidedly outweighed the costs of circumcising every baby boy.

Peter states that his doctor had diagnosed him as having a pinhole meatus. He suggests there must have been treatments other than circumcision. There are, but these are mostly ineffective in the long term and both painful and embarrassing to the boy in the short term. It is possible to attempt to stretch the foreskin to enlarge the meatus. Firstly, if the meatus of the foreskin is 'pinhole' it will be very difficult to insert a dilator into the foreskin to start stretching it.

Secondly, the act of stretching the foreskin enough to overcome the problem almost inevitably introduces minute tears into the tight tip. These heal with scar tissue which is even less flexible than the original tip. Stretching attempts can thus do more harm than good.

Thirdly, stretching takes many weeks of treatment before any noticeable result can possibly be achieved. During this time the urine flow remains obstructed by the pinhole meatus. This puts a strain on the bladder which can often cause reflux to the kidneys and long term damage to these vital organs.

Removal of the foreskin makes one no less of a man than removal of a tooth. Indeed, for millions of men all around the world, circumcision improves virility and the sexual pleasure for both partners.

Vernon – London

Sensitivity

There have been a number of articles recently by members interested in the difference in sensitivity between the circumcised and non-circumcised penis, and asking why members who have been circumcised as adults do not write to give their experiences.

Well, here is my experience! I am a recently circumcised man and am able to tell you all exactly what changes in sensitivity occur after this operation.

I was circumcised as a baby, so that I spent my adolescence and adult life with my foreskin cut but covering half of the glans when my penis was flaccid; the glans was totally exposed when my penis was erect, as with many uncircumcised penises. I had a very strong sex drive and extreme sensitivity in both my remaining foreskin and the glans.

Three years ago, 4th July '94, I had a revision circumcision where absolutely all foreskin, inner and outer, was removed, along with the frenulum and part of the shaft skin under the shaft. The edges of the incisions were not stitched, but left to heal naturally, forming scar tissue. Naturally enough, the pain from the operation was very considerable, and I was not able to have an orgasm until three months after, and even after that, only infrequently, because of the pain from the scarred area. However, after about a year and a half, the pain diminished.

Initially, the sensitivity in the glans, particularly around the corona, was greatly increased and was very intense (almost too intense). However, after a year this sensitivity declined and then ceased. So, during that period, I suffered pain and extreme sensitivity simultaneously; for me, a very unpleasant experience as I'm not a masochist. There was no sensitivity from any other part of my penis. It was only then that I realised that the major part of the extreme sensitivity I had formerly enjoyed had come from the inner foreskin (even though already partially cut away) rubbing against the corona. The inter-connecting messages between the brain and the foreskin, which encourage erections, had gone, and stimulation became extremely difficult. Erections now are difficult to achieve and maintain (due, I think, to the absence of messages from the foreskin to the brain), and because of this intercourse is a thing of the past. The glans is still sensitive to a certain extent, but now needs extreme stimulation for a long time – several hours of vacuum pumping, stimulants and/or drugs – before orgasm is possible. For me the situation is far less satisfactory than before (it would not necessarily be unsatisfactory for everyone of course). Some readers will say that gradual loss of sensitivity is normal as one gets older, and I agree with this. However, I am talking about a change from extreme sensitivity to zero sensitivity in approximately six months.

The sensitivity question, of course, depends entirely on what is meant by 'circumcision'. The more inner skin that is left, whether inside or outside, the more stimulating an orgasm can be, although, as R.R. notes in 4/97, inner foreskin exposed on the shaft, as in some circumcisions, inevitably retracts and loses sensitivity with time and/or age. We should really not talk about 'circumcision' at all, but of the various types of circumcision. An extreme type of circumcision like mine is very different from a circumcision where only the tip of the foreskin is removed.

From a personal point of view, what I miss most from not having a foreskin and frenulum is the lack of sensuality (a word we do not often see in Acorn) – the slow build up to orgasm as you or your partner play with the various parts of the foreskin. Or the quiet pleasure that comes (came) from feeling the penis nestling between the thighs; this sensation does not exist with a severe circumcision, and so must come from the slowly moving foreskin: this is sensuality. It is totally different from the feeling of orgasm. I think it is possible that many circumcised men have never experienced this wonderful sensation, which is accompanied by marvellous feelings of love and happiness. I think it may be one reason why American men (circumcised) are such notoriously bad lovers and continental men (uncircumcised) such notoriously good ones. Without a foreskin an orgasm is purely sexual – a striving towards the climax, which suddenly appears and is gone. For this reason, advocates of circumcision are frequently single men into masturbation. For loving couples into sensuality, circumcision is often a disaster.

It needs only a little reflection to see that man is born with a foreskin designed to give maximum pleasure in order to maximise sperm dissemination in a species. The penis is very ingeniously designed with the inner surface of the foreskin packed with sensitive nerve endings to maximise pleasure, and this foreskin covers, protects and lubricates the glans to keep it sensitive, so that during intercourse a female is inseminated as rapidly as possible. Circumcised men who experience pleasure from their frenulums do so because that is a sensitive part of their missing foreskins. Seen in this light, circumcision, in all cultures where it is ritually practised, can be seen:- a) as an unconscious attempt to inhibit sexuality in a society, and b) as a system of sexual control of young men.

For those of you who are thinking of having a circumcision, think about this: my adult circumcision has left me with a hard callous on my circumcision scar (a constant irritation), and a permanent blister on my glans around the urethra. What is more, the operation has reduced the length of my penis by three quarters of an inch! Hey you guys, are you worried about being conspicuous because your dick is too long? Would you really like it to be an inch shorter? Don't bother with expensive and uncertain plastic surgery! Have a circumcision!

Stiffener

I wonder if any of your cock-curious (like me) readers saw the recent article in the press about a possible new method of cock stiffening? Alas I didn't note it down at the time, and the man in my life has been having a few problems in recent years (he's 55). He's also a bit shy about going for advice, and anyway doesn't need the psychological therapy approach, so maybe a medical reader or someone who has had experience of a cure could advise us.

He's tried a vacuum pump, but he reckons it affects his bladder control so he's not too keen on that. Pity - I liked the idea of enlargement! Speaking of which, a girl at work says she had a fellow once that she couldn't get her finger and thumb round. Now my guy seems OK to me, and maybe I haven't been around enough, but that sounds...well (shiver shiver).

Anyway, sex is great in all the other ways, and it's not that he can't get it in at all, but as your other female readers will know, there's nothing like a delicious male pole deep inside you. A cucumber just isn't the same, even though it looks wicked and really turns him on.

So...hoping to hear some advice. Meanwhile I'll keep on getting into those wonderfully undignified positions that are all part of a woman's life (and fun).

Glans Sensitivity

There have been letters to Acorn complaining about loss of sensation etc in the circumcised penis head. I have found that a daily massage with Boots A&E cream does wonders and leaves the glans as soft and as sensitive as a baby's bum. I would suggest any member who is troubled with this problem give it a try. Get your partner to do it for you and lie back to enjoy the pleasure. It seems to be more effective if done after a hot bath or shower as the cream is absorbed more easily. This cream is a moisturiser and the ladies will tell you that a good moisturiser is a godsend.

For those of you who are into massage using oils, and also use condoms, it means you have to break off and 'clean up' before using the condom. Well, there's no need to do this any more. Try the new Avanti condom from the USA. It is made of polythene, it is thinner, and more sensitive than the latex condom, and is not affected by oil, vaseline or any other lubricant. Having tried them, I can report very favourably on them, and would recommend them to anyone who likes to use oil. Ideal for gay members, as you can use vaseline instead of the messy water-based lubes.

Growing Pains

The desire by a circumcised male for a restored foreskin has its roots in antiquity. Both surgical techniques and instruments were devised to achieve an artificial foreskin, though the process was often bloody and painful. Arelius Cornelius Celsus (55BC–7AD) introduced a technique for uncircumcision in which the penis could be peeled back and stripped, with the peeled tissue bound to the glans. (Polish doctors used a modified Celsus method to save circumcised males from execution at the hands of the Nazis.) During the persecution of Jews by Antiochus Epiphanes through to the reigns of Kings Achau and Jojakim, artificial foreskins were formed by drawing out with blisters, a process called epispasmus, using a 'spadister'. The spadister drew the skin forward so that it could be sewn to the glans. Such was the popularity of artificial foreskin renewal by the Jews that a second stage was added to ritual circumcision in the year 140AD, the Peri'ah. It involved tearing the exposed mucous membrane, and skinning the glans with the sole intention of preventing foreskin renewal at a later date.

This century, the USA has developed most of the modern circumcision instruments and pioneered novel circumcision techniques. With not all of the 80% of American males trimmed neonatally deliriously happy with their inflicted status, foreskin clamps and the PUD (penile uncircumcising device) were developed. Not only can the PUD be conspicuous, but there has to be a sufficiency of foreskin present to grasp, stretch forward, and tape to the device. Those close-cropped, like myself, would hardly be helped by the PUD (costing about £80 made in America, or a UK made alternative at £40).

I came across an alternative technique from NORM, devised especially for those with insufficient skin to grasp at the scar line, using Micropore tape. Paraphrasing the method described in the newsletter:-

With the flaccid penis on the stretch, it is encircled with 12.5mm Micropore surgical tape about half an inch below the scar line, running approximately parallel with it. When the glans is released, 'waisting' occurs at the tape line. The shaft skin is pushed forward from the abdominal side of the tape to enclose the glans where the tape 'waisting' holds it in place.

I found the arrangement short-lived, rarely surviving a nocturnal erection. With the application of Friars Balsam recommended to increase adhesion, I sought a less messy solution. I reinforced the micropore taping with the use of three strips of 12.5mm zinc oxide plaster, two about 6cm in length, and one of 12cm. With the glans skin enclosed using Micropore tape, I applied the two short strips either side of the meatal slit and parallel with it, half covering the 'foreskin' edge and the other half on exposed Micropore tape and glans tip. The 12cm length was run around the 'foreskin', half covering the two small strips and forming a secure cap which resisted nocturnal erections, and even careful masturbation, for up to two days.

Nine months taping has resulted in significant changes. On release of the tape 'cap' the shaft skin slowly curls back over the glans, pausing for some time at the corona. The original scar is less visible as it is partly concealed by the bulking, almost duplicature of skin at the base of the glans.

Whether flaccid or erect, the glans rim is less pronounced than previously. All the glans area has greater sensitivity and has become much smoother to the touch. During masturbation, the shaft is no longer tight and chafed by friction, since the skin has greater mobility even to easily covering the glans when drawn forward. A further nine months' treatment should lead to an untaped Jewish appearance, with the unsightly scar concealed from view when flaccid, and partial glans cover.

I recommend the process to those wishing to conceal an untidy scarline, make their circumcision less radical, or restore some glans cover in due course. With sufficient dedication and about £8 of materials, some change can be assured. If the circumcision debate can be described as 'Scar Wars', then "may the 'fore be with you!" I hope after over 50 years of being burdened by the shame and disfigurement of circumcision that the 'fore' will be truly with me.

Anthony

[There are accompanying drawings covering Anthony's method, and are available for anyone with a consuming interest. — D.A.]

Naval Circs

I was circumcised on a hospital ship of the US Navy at the tender age of 19, so as to be permitted to assist at the circumcision of sailors and do their post-operative care. The mythology at the time was such that my circumcision was a pre-requisite – it would never have done to have an orderly handling the boys who had never been through the experience himself. Most of the sailors we did were US Blacks who had been born at home to mothers without health insurance. The circs were a rather cheap shot compared to what we did most of the time. The station I did duty on performed mostly reconstructive urological surgery to soldiers who had stepped on mines.

Circum-sceptic

I have seriously considered having a circumcision for many years, partly because of recurring foreskin infections and, I imagine, partly because of cosmetics and a background of boarding school where we cavaliers were in a minority.

The infections have all cleared up eventually and I now find that, with proper lubrication, sex is much better and my somewhat tender foreskin is protected.

My original idea in joining Acorn was to find out the experiences of those cavaliers who had gone for the chop, and I have gathered interesting information both from the newsletter and from meeting some members circumcised as adults.

To me, the ideal roundheaded cock is one with no loose skin up against the knob, but most that I have observed seem to have this loose skin as well as a fairly untidy cut with odd bits of skin left behind.

Of course, a tight circumcision leads to other problems, as I have discovered – a loss of sensitivity during sex because there is no loose skin to move back and forth. I can simulate this by holding my foreskin back tightly when wanking, and I obtain much less of a sensation than if I have some of the loose skin moving up and down with each stroke (I always wank as a roundhead would, with knob totally exposed and direct stimulation).

My fear of being circumcised is that it may result in a botched job and I would regret it with the loss of sensitivity. So, in the end, I think I will remain intact unless I have any serious foreskin problems in the future.

In current society, the cavalier is far more acceptable than 35 years ago and, in fact, more the norm, so I don't feel self-conscious exposing a foreskin.

I still find the long tapering foreskin visually unattractive, hence my system of folding the skin under itself so some of the knob is exposed. The resultant 'stubby' end looks more purposeful, as well as making peeing easier, not having to retract the skin each time, and I also find it far more comfortable than having this long piece of skin hanging over the end of my knob.

I suppose my ideal would be a tightish foreskin which came half over the knob when flaccid, or a knob large enough so that I could retract the skin and hitch it behind the rim to enjoy the best of both worlds.

It would be interesting to hear from any other cavaliers within Acorn (there aren't many, are there?) and exchange views on the merits of remaining intact.

Anon

Family Divisions

My interest in circumcision began early in my life. I'm of the generation (born early 60's) and class where my father is circumcised and I'm not. I'm grateful to my father for explaining to me how he was circumcised and why, saying it was a common practice in those days. I'm also grateful that he gave me the choice to make up my own mind on the subject. This must be quite a common occurrence for people of my generation. I would like to hear from others.

I remember the first time I saw another boy of my age circumcised. I was about ten and my next door neighbours were American who had two sons I used to play with. One day, we were out having a walk when we stopped for a pee. I couldn't help but notice how their urine shot out into a perfect straight line, and I couldn't take my eyes off their penises. Up until then I had assumed that all boys my age were uncircumcised. At public school about an eighth of the boys were circumcised. The Australians, Americans and South Africans were circumcised automatically at birth. The English boys that were cut came from lower middle class families with social climbing aspirations. The upper classes were always comfortable with what they'd got and did not aspire to anything.

Anon – London

To Be Radical

In September 1986 I finally achieved one of my greatest desires: to be circumcised! I'd seen an ad in Forum magazine and eventually plucked up courage to ring and make the appointment. The operation took place at the Marie Stopes Hospital and the surgeon who performed the op was called Mr Hasan.

Although very pleased with the neat result, I have, ever since, regretted not having asked Mr Hasan to do as radical circumcision as possible, with the scar line well up the shaft. Shortly after the op I got in touch with 'Tony Acorn' (After joining Acorn at that time I wrote an article about my 'circumcision experiences', and about my fantasy to be radically circumcised in a sort of tribal ritual – such was and still is my strong desire for such a 'cut'!) On inspection, Tony thought that more skin could be removed as there was still a little loose skin even when my penis was erect. It was then that I got in touch with Dr Sifman, known to some of your readers, for a 'tightening up' op. Unfortunately it didn't seem to make much difference, so I went to see Mr Hasan again who managed to take some more skin off.

There is now hardly any loose skin when erect, but still quite a lot when my penis is flaccid. Tony had told me that if there is quite a difference in penis size when comparing flaccid and erect states, as is the case with me, then it is not possible to remove so much foreskin. The problem/worry I have is that by achieving a well-cut look for my penis in its flaccid state, I might have too much skin removed, resulting in painful erections.

For several years I have been trying to forget about having more skin removed, telling myself that it couldn't be done without the problems just mentioned. Unfortunately, the thought of having a 'radical cut' wouldn't go away so, three years ago, I contacted Mr Hasan who, on inspection, said that he could remove another quarter of an inch. The op would have been about £500 at the time (well, he is a Harley St. man) so I didn't have it done, telling myself that £500 was a lot of money for a small cut!

Recently I went back to Dr Sifman who was reluctant to do any more work on it since, admittedly, it does look very neat with the corona exposed. However, he did have some magazines for me to look at in order to show him the sort of effect I wanted. (Incidentally, it's the circumcisions I'm interested in, not the blokes who have them!!) One man had the sort of cut I could only dream about, completely unwrinkled with the scar line about one and three-quarters of an inch behind the corona. Dr Sifman said that he could cut and scrape away more skin in order to achieve this result, but was very reluctant to do so because of the potential problems about being too tight when erect, as mentioned earlier.

He did give me some recent copies of Acorn to read, and I have decided to write and rejoin. I don't have those back numbers now, but there was an article in one of them by, I believe, 'John of London', who told of his radical circumcision while in a Middle East country (all of the frenulum removed, hardly any loose skin at all, etc.). In the article he also said that he would like to meet anybody interested in the type of op he'd had (or words along those lines), and I would certainly like to meet him if possible. Also, in a slightly later edition, somebody else, in commenting on and praising John's article, also, I believe, welcomed correspondence. (He was the man whose article also contained something about having a meeting at a jacuzzi, or somewhere similar, and starting off the proceedings with an examination to prove that all present were actually circumcised!) Was he the one who was also into body shaving (another subject I've become interested in in recent months), or was that yet another article? Anyway, I'd like to get in touch with this person as well.

I'm sorry to have rambled on for so long, but since everybody's interested in circumcision someone might be able to help me achieve a well-circumcised penis or accept that it is not possible for any more skin to be removed. It's not knowing one way or the other which probably causes my frustration, hence my request to rejoin.

At The Swimming Pool

Recent reports of an 11-year-old boy fathering a child brings to mind an event in the ladies' changing room at our local swimming pool. I was drying myself when the hubbub of conversation dried up, and all the women grabbed their towels as a tarty looking woman marched in with an 11-year-old boy, and proceeded to undress him totally in front of us, before stripping herself and putting on a costume. She let the boy put his own swimsuit on. I politely asked her if she didn't think the boy a bit old to bring into the ladies' changing room. She replied that he was only a kid and she "wasn't leaving him in the men's locker room to be touched up by perverts."

I felt very sorry for the boy who was obviously very embarrassed to be naked in the presence of unclothed mature women, and to make matters worse the poor kid developed an impressive five and a half inch hard-on which was so erect it was pressed against his tummy. It looked like a small adult's penis to me.

Since I was only a few feet away I couldn't help noticing it and was impressed by its appearance. His foreskin was very thin and was stretched so tightly that the darker shade of the swollen glans showed through it. It terminated in a narrow tube of surplus skin extending just beyond the tip. It looked like a smooth baton of polished ivory, and I couldn't help contrasting it with my husband, who is circumcised. Unlike some women who prefer the circumcised appearance, I have always felt uneasy at the unnatural whitish grey and grainy appearance of his exposed knob which always reminds me of a toadstool (or Toad's tool?), and the ring of scar tissue round it I find off-putting. It also has a bend to the left as a memento to the circumciser's lack of skill and, all in all, I think he was shortchanged by his parents in comparison with the elegant perfection of the boy's penis in its natural state.

It made me thankful that I had resisted the efforts of our GP who had tried to have our son circumcised. He claimed that at three years old he was suffering from phimosis, since his penis wouldn't unskin. Both his father and I were dismayed and went to see the nurse at the clinic. When she heard what the doctor had said she gave an exasperated sigh, said not to worry and gave us a leaflet to read, highlighting a passage which said that most small children have a degree of phimosis present which automatically corrects itself as the child reaches puberty. It goes on to say that circumcision need hardly ever be performed for medical reasons. We breathed a sigh of relief and changed our GP. Needless to say, our son has grown up with a perfectly normal functioning penis. I wonder how many poor kids are needlessly circumcised because of a GP's ignorance? The leaflet is called Advice to Parents of Baby Boys and is available at hospital outpatients' departments and some surgery waiting rooms. Other parents in our predicament ought to read it before unquestioning acceptance of their GP's advice.

Richard Branson

The New York Post carried this story: Richard Branson likes Jane Fonda so much it hurts. The Virgin Records founder was compelled to tell her and hubby Ted Turner about it during a recent dinner party, he told New York Magazine.

"I was circumcised quite old, at 18, rather than, whatever it is, one," the randy Brit recounts. "The only problem was that the day after I was circumcised, I watched the film, Barbarella, and I split all my stitches." Branson said Jane seemed more amused by the tale than her spouse.

How I Found Out I Was Circumcised

I recall reading somewhere that circumcision was one of the subjects the British Board of Censors would not allow to be mentioned in movies. Now, there were lots of boys being circumcised in England at the time. The practice had probably been introduced into the royal family in the nineteenth century and was then imitated by the middle classes. It may have been an adaptation of 'homo europus' to the colonial environment, and it is easy to see how convenient it must have proved in the bush before British engineers brought the advantages of civilised plumbing to those regions. The British predilection for Moslems under the Raj must be either the cause or the consequence of this practice. So, the question was not whether or not it was alright to cut off a baby's foreskin, but rather whether it was in order to talk about it once you had.

Thus it was quite possible to be circumcised without knowing it, and to find out only when someone else passes a remark, which will remain in the memory with a clarity that will not fade with the passage of time. The penis, insofar as the circumcised thinks about it, appears to the imagination as being circumcised.

Towards the end of the 1940's we had some wonderful summers; endless fine days almost too hot to bear; our parents had too much to do to take us to the seaside. My mother used to help me make tents from old curtains that she would hang over the clothes line, and we would keep the ends of the curtains taut by weighting them down with bricks from a bomb site. I spent happy hours playing in these home-made hideaways with a little neighbour who, as I was later to learn, was what is called a 'Jew'. One day, when we were wearing bathing trunks, he asked me to show him my penis. I firmly refused. So he got his out, and I was gratified to see it was much the same as mine. This seemed to overcome my reticence, and I was then happy to show him what he wanted to see. I hope that in the respectable life he probably now leads, he has not repressed this memory. The joy of recognition, of being the same, got me no nearer to understanding why this was the case. I cannot understand why I might have thought at this early stage that some boys might not be like us, but I think I must have had a vague suspicion.

It was years later, in Chalky White's woodwork class that this suspicion was confirmed. As Chalky never turned up, it was inevitable that the subject of dicks should arise – as did the dicks themselves soon after. The workshop was at the end of a long corridor which it took five minutes to walk down, so we could be fairly certain of remaining undiscovered. JW and S had a little pink mushroom at the end like me, while McB had a bright purple knob inside a skin that went on for ever, would not come all the way back, and that I found as unattractive then as I do now.

As in many English schools at the time, our house used to go on an annual camp. We slept in huts where order was occasionally restored with a gym shoe or padda-bat. I wasn't really cut out for this kind of togetherness, so I chose the bed next to the wall by the door. I therefore only had one neighbour, G. One night, a boy who wasn't in our year, and whose bed was – doubtless for that reason – at the other end of the hut – said, as a lull came in the chatter, "David P and G are circumcised." The word wasn't totally unknown to me. I had heard it in Bible texts where it seemed to mean 'what you were supposed to be', and hence 'pure', 'good' etc. I couldn't quite understand what I might have done to deserve such praise, so I kept quiet. However, G, who also didn't understand, wanted to know more. "It means you haven't got a foreskin. You don't have any skin around the end of your cock: you had it cut off." I fell onto the bed with amazement: so that was it! The others were paying no attention to me because G, who was a born clown, had leapt under his covers to have a look. Having examined it attentively, he emerged and said, "It's true." I might have felt very alone at that moment. I was lucky G was by my side. I have always been grateful to him for it. Later on, when we were towards the end of our teens, he would come and squeeze me in his arms till I thought my ribs would break. I never knew whether it was a gesture of affection or aggression. I never begged for mercy. I do not think I would, even if he really had broken my ribs. I felt – however briefly – at home.

These are fond memories. Of course, once I had realised I was circumcised, I came to understand just how lucky I was.

Acorn Weekend At Hayes, 18/20 April 1997

This was my first 'Acorn weekend', as in the past, family commitments had prevented me from attending previous meetings. Imagine the excitement with which I checked the venue and prepared for the weekend and AGM.

The venue was easily located near Heathrow airport, and I was made very welcome by David and Brian. My only regret was that an old and close friend was unable to be present.

During the evening several other members booked in, and we all enjoyed a drink and well-cooked dinner, chatting of course continuing late into the night. Saturday morning was similarly relaxing as we explored the local area.

Business commenced at two sharp with the AGM, conducted with good-humoured formality by the officers of Acorn, various problems were discussed and appointments made. Refreshments were served and the rest of the afternoon spent in general conversation and chit-chat.

A very good dinner was served and the food was good. In all, we had a most interesting and enjoyable weekend, and I shall certainly try to attend future meetings of the Society.

Editorial

Tomorrow is the Meeting and having finished this edition it will go with me for processing. It looks like we will have around 25 come to the Meeting with several new faces. I'm sure we'll all enjoy it again.

I get many letters asking many questions, and I'm sorry to say that I cannot answer them all. Perhaps, if you have a question regarding any of our subjects, you could make it as an open question. We do have a question corner, which isn't used as much as it should be. With regard to back numbers, Brian tells me that virtually all the reprinting has been finished and everyone should be happy.

long-standing desire based solely on personal aesthetics. I preferred the look and sensation of the exposed glans, and wished to make it permanent, and, as such, I think that my desire was no more based on self hatred or neurosis than a woman wishing to alter the shape and size of her breasts or nose. I agree that it is unusual to perform the operation on oneself, but this was simply because at the time I knew of no way of contacting a surgeon to perform the operation. Had I known of a surgeon I would have had a "professional cut". Clinics performing circumcisions, unlike breast and nose jobs, do not advertise in the weekend magazines and supplements.

My experience dealing with students is that self-mutilation is usually an impulsive action without prior preparation or consideration. My self-circumcision was long thought out, planned and prepared for, and I cannot consider it to be a self-mutilation, nor do I need the help of a psychiatrist.

Another Reply to Doreen Chase

I would like to start by saying how much I enjoyed 5/97. Perhaps not surprisingly, I would particularly like to make comment on Doreen Chase's letter.

Interesting that she should choose to start by telling us she's no prude, and then proceeding to produce a series of evidence demonstrating that's exactly what she is. With the type of repressed and rather puritanical attitudes she adopts, I would suggest that she is very hypocritical to recommend psychiatric help for others.

I find it extraordinary that someone who appears to be a practising naturist should hold such extreme views regarding the exposure of genitalia, whether it be the vulva or the glans. I find such a contradiction in terms hard to reconcile.

Whilst I am quite happy to accede to her preference for a fully concealed glans, she might like to consider that not everyone shares her point of view. A great many of us uncircumcised men are able to remain retracted without our "willy shaft strangulated by the drawn foreskin tip" and maintain the appearance of a circumcised penis. I have been mistaken for, and mistaken others for being circumcised on numerous occasions.

Why on earth she should think that having one's foreskin retracted involves a "liberal whiff of masochism" I do not know. Whilst I would agree that we were provided with a foreskin for protection purposes, I find that most of the time I am unable to tell (without looking) whether or not my foreskin is retracted, there being no difference in sensation. I would not wish to tackle a thorn bush, whether retracted or not!

I can only assume that her opinion is based on information from her husband or possibly her two sons, who I would guess possess long tight foreskins which they rarely retract and probably suffer with ultra-sensitive glans as a result.

I would strongly support the right of uncircumcised men to display as much or as little of their glans as they choose. Similarly, why should women be reviled for revealing their vulva. I would imagine it is rather difficult not to display at least part of it during the course of a day, it being impossible to remain with legs firmly clamped together indefinitely.

Nature does not allow all of us to have our glans completely hidden (perhaps Doreen would be happier if I took to wearing a clothes peg to hold the opening of my foreskin together just in case someone got a glimpse of the glans lurking beneath!), nor indeed does it enable all women to have their labia neatly tucked away.

I believe we should be proud, not ashamed, of our genitalia. It does after all form part of the overall beauty of our bodies. I feel privileged when someone is willing to share the most intimate parts of their anatomy with me, and I hope they feel the same when I do likewise.

I expect Doreen's letter will have produced a great deal of reaction, and I feel better for having expressed my views, whether they make it into print or not!

Third Reply to Doreen Chase

I read Doreen Chase's views on circumcision and depilation with interest, and agreed with some of what she says.

My wife and I are naturist/nudist club members, and love to play tennis, volleyball, badminton and swim in the nude. We are happily married with no interest in relationships with third parties, but are both (mildly) exhibitionists.

I had myself circumcised as an adult around ten years ago because I wanted to maximise the enjoyment of social nudity at clubs and beaches by having a permanently exposed glans. I took advantage of a series of visits to Saudi Arabia and had myself expertly and irrevocably done by a Muslim surgeon. I say irrevocably because the surgeon I chose has a radical procedure which removes both foreskin and frenulum, leaving just enough loose skin to allow a full but straining erection. It has left me with a prominent, bulbous glans which there is no possibility of ever re-covering using the stretching techniques recommended by organisations such as NORM.

I freely admit that I love the feeling of being able to show it off at clubs and beaches without ever allowing myself to appear that I am sexually stimulated.

My wife is a tall attractive blonde who is always immaculately shaven. In a way, this is really the female equivalent of male circumcision. It specifically invites attention to a particular part of the body. The difference is that it is a clearly personal and even a provocative decision by the female to shave, whereas male circumcision can be excused as being outside the circumcisee's control (done in infancy or to relieve a medical condition).

This is presumably why Doreen uses words like shameless and hussy. My wife is usually in a minority of one in most naturist venues we go to, although a few other women remove a large part, but not all, of their pubic hair. She is shaven because she likes the extra discreet attention it brings her. I say discreet, because naturists are almost all paranoid about making any remarks with sexual undertones, let alone making a pass. In short, she can enjoy displaying herself in the knowledge that, while everyone can see her, nobody has ever commented, and this is all part of the attraction for her.

She is quite often asked to pose, and occasionally does so. We have a nice collection of nude photographs taken by me and other club members which we would be happy to exchange (but not sell) with other Acorn readers. We also keep an album of her in our clubhouse 'library', which is very popular on wet days! The album includes some (very tasteful) shots of her dressed only in long dark stockings and suspender belt (hardly naturist material), but not one comment has been passed....

One thing Doreen did not mention, and presumably cannot comment upon, is the sexual eroticism of circumcision and depilation. For a circumcised male (especially with a radical cut) the sensation of a taut penis and hot dry glans entering a moist, smoothly shaven vagina is out of this world. Yes, it is true that it facilitates repeat performance because there is no foreskin to become sore. In fact, the only negative aspect in my case, is that masturbation is difficult without a lubricating jelly to compensate for the lack of foreskin movement.

We are both proud to be members of what H & E used to call the 'circumcised and shaven brigade', and our only regret is that both practices are becoming so relatively rare in naturist circles.

Cavalier Questions

As a cavalier member of Acorn (an endangered species?), I am interested in how other cavaliers live with their foreskins.

My long overhanging foreskin was never retracted until I was 17, which meant that I had a very tender knob for a long time and, in order to toughen it, tried to keep it retracted as much as possible. Not easy with a long overhang and small knob.

However, I gradually developed a way of pulling the skin back, pinching it at the frenulum then rolling it forwards again in on itself. This gave the result of some exposed knob, varying accordingly to how tightly I pinched the skin, a stubby appearance and more prominent knob than with the long, tapering foreskin, and made peeing easier, not having to skin back to do this. (Incidentally, do most cavaliers retract their foreskin to pee?)

Nowadays, if I wear my foreskin in its fully forward natural state, it feels very strange, as if something extra has been added to the end of my cock. So I suppose I am experiencing in a minor way the difference between a cut and uncut cock.

Years ago, when I got a hard-on, the skin stayed almost completely forwards with only a small amount of knob showing. Now, if I go hard from a fully forward state, the skin exposes at least two-thirds of my knob, so it has become much more flexible over time. I am interested in how far back other cavaliers' skins go on erection.

My foreskin will stay retracted in a flaccid state only if it is fairly restricted, as it is when I swim in a tight Speedo type costume or wear a jockstrap.

As my knob has become tougher and less sensitive I have always wanked with it fully retracted, not using the foreskin back and forth, and using lubrication. I find wanking the foreskin most unpleasant and irritating, and there is not much sensation without direct stimulation. However, I do think that the foreskin helps improve my orgasms. If I hold the skin back tightly, although the initial effect is tremendous, at the point of coming the sensation is much better if there is a little foreskin movement.

Your correspondent Doreen Chase's comments about men appearing on nudist beaches with retracted foreskins amuses me. What's the problem? One of the joys of having a foreskin is being able to wear it in different ways. I often shower in public changing rooms after sport, and after retracting my foreskin to wash it (which most men do very furtively with their backs turned. Are they shy or afraid of developing a hard-on with the skin back?) I always keep it back. I've noticed only a few other men do this, but I don't think it bothers anyone! All men are basically exhibitionists and want to show the world their manhood (small though mine is!).

Another phenomenon which other cavaliers may care to comment on is whether with age (45+) the knob becomes less sensitive. I certainly have found this, and it needs much more stimulation than before – both in wanking and in foreplay. I have heard of roundheads experiencing this.

Having seriously considered circumcision for a long time, I think now that I have finally decided to stay intact, unless anything serious goes wrong. I enjoy the best of both worlds and it must be very dull with just a bare knob to play with. Sex is more fun with a foreskin.

Anon

My Life

Thank you for letting me join The Acorn Society. I have dreamed for years of finding people or individuals who, like me, have had so many thoughts and ideas, whether negative or positive, about their cock.

I have been circumcised since birth, so really I cannot even remember actually what it would be like to have a foreskin. All I know, and can vividly remember, that when I was seven I knew that my cock was different from other boys my age. And even at that age I knew that I was drawn to other boys' cocks, and used to daydream and fantasise about them. I have a brother two years younger than me who is more fortunate than me in possessing his foreskin. My father on the other hand is, like me, circumcised. I expect this was done again at birth for hygiene reasons or because of a medical problem, but I have never asked him why his parents had him circumcised.

I do know that when I asked my mother why I was done she said it was because I was unable to pass urine as the foreskin was so tight it was restricting the flow. But because I was a baby I never knew any different.

I went through puberty afraid of showing my cock to other boys because I felt that I was not normal and I thought that all boys had a foreskin. It was not until I was about eleven years old that I eventually saw my first adult circumcised cock. It was when I had been at the swimming baths with the school and a teacher had taken his swimming trunks off. I was really fascinated to see his cock and I never after that felt afraid to show mine.

It was not until I really got started into the gay scene that I realised that I was not the only person on the planet with my cock cut. Over the years I have seen so many individual men and can only say that they all have very different cocks.

My anger at not having a foreskin has at long last subsided over the years and I feel at last a sense of ease with my cock. Over the last three years I have been heavily into the body piercing scene and I can honestly say that since I have had a Prince Albert and Apadravya piercing I feel a lot of sensitivity has come back to the head of my cock, which I had lost over the years.

When I was younger, even though I used to use a good lubricant to wank with, baby oil, I never used to be able to come for ages, and even then sometimes, because of lack of sensation, I used to have a problem in keeping my erection. But since I have had my piercings I have actually found that my cock is too sensitive at times – my erections, though, stay much longer, and when I am wanking I have such a lot of pre-cum flooding out you could swear I have actually come.

I have a substantial amount of skin that I seem to have acquired over the years just behind the ridge of the glans. It resembles a rolled up bit of foreskin, and sometimes when I have a flaccid cock it actually covers the ridge. I would love to be able to see if I could find out from the Society if there are exercises to stretch this skin further. I suppose you can say that I still feel indignant about not having a foreskin. I know there are people, after reading the leaflets that you sent me, who say that those who are circumcised should not moan about their cocks. But if people who have never experienced a foreskin cannot think or fantasise about it then it isn't worth a person living.

I would have never dreamt years ago about modifying my cock with piercings, but until a person does, he cannot realise what there is in life to achieve. As I have already stated, that through my piercings, I have at long last found that I can have tremendous sensations and pleasure from my cock. Also, while looking in the mirror, I can see a really nice looking cock because the jewellery makes it look more attractive and pleasing to my eyes. If people do not like the look of genital piercings, it is their hang-up, not mine. And I hope now that I have become a member, other people who have had genital piercings are also going to enter into my life. If you have had communications from others about this subject, then what I have written may be of interest to them. Please see Contact Corner for my advert.

General Medical Council Guidelines

I have been sent cuttings from the broadsheet press from members, for which I thank you, (and please don't stop sending them because your particular item from a newspaper doesn't get published. It just might be the only one that arrives) regarding a recent item in the General Medical Council News, Ethical Guidance Section, dealing with child circumcision. As I received the actual page of the GMC News, I thought it best to publish that, and here it is.

Doctors circumcising male children must have the necessary skills and experience, must keep up to date with developments, and must discuss the issues carefully with those who have responsibility for the child. These are the central messages prepared in response to a number of complaints about doctors' standards, and letters questioning the ethics of male circumcision.

Circumcision raises difficult questions about rights and freedoms. Many would argue that the right to practise a religion includes a right to have male children circumcised. Others feel it cannot be right to undertake a surgical procedure for religious reasons alone on an infant who cannot consent.

In 1996, the GMC invited comments from religious organisations, anti-circumcision groups, professional and patients' organisations and civil rights and children's organisations. Some strong views were expressed, though many acknowledged the difficulty of balancing the rights of the child with the rights of individuals to practise their religion.

These are not primarily medical questions. They must be resolved by society as a whole. At present, though, the law gives no definitive guidance on the matter. The Standards Committee considered the views as objectively as possible and prepared guidance to help doctors provide a good standard of care. The guidance draws on the principles in the booklet Good Medical Practice. A leaflet setting out the full guidance is now available from the GMC and the essential principles are set out below.

Standards of practice for doctors asked to circumcise

Doctors who decide to circumcise male children must:

- have the necessary skills and experience both to perform the operation and use appropriate measures, including anaesthesia, to minimise the pain and discomfort.
- keep up to date with developments in the practice of male circumcision, including when the procedure is, and is not, necessary for medical reasons.
- explain objectively to those with parental responsibility for the child any benefits or risks of the procedure, taking into account the age of the child.
- explain to those with parental responsibility that they may invite their religious adviser to be present at the circumcision to give advice on how the procedure should be performed to meet the requirements of their faith.
- listen to those with parental responsibility and give careful consideration to their views. Doctors are not obliged to act on a request to circumcise a child, but explain if they are opposed to circumcision other than for therapeutic reasons. They should also tell those with parental responsibility that they have a right to see another doctor.
- obtain the permission of both parents whenever possible, but in all cases obtain valid consent, in writing, from a person with parental responsibility before performing the procedure.
- provide appropriate aftercare.

Acorn Policy Statement

Members are reminded that the Acorn membership list is regarded as strictly confidential and is used only on a 'need to know' basis even amongst the Officers. It will never be supplied to third parties.

The Editor will normally forward stamped letters to members on request. If you do not wish to receive any mail from other members please write via the PO Box number and nothing will be forwarded to you.

An area I am particularly interested in with regard to circumcision is the extent to which it is practised across cultures. So the article 'Colonial Cut' by Anon – London in 5/97 grabbed my attention. I too would love to know how widely circumcision is practised in South Africa amongst the white population, and hope that our new South African friend finds some time to write soon.

Most of the statistics that researchers produce suggest that circumcision is almost non-existent (outside the Jewish and Islamic communities) in continental Europe. My personal experience seems to challenge this notion however. I was in a relationship for quite some time with a beautiful Swedish girl. She was quite sexually experienced and she assured me that the majority of her partners in Europe had been circumcised. These included most of her Scandinavian boyfriends, two French, an Italian and a Scotsman. I know that one circumcised Italian and a Scotsman are hardly representative of their entire populations, but you have to admit, the odds of her meeting a circumcised partner, according to the statistics, would have been quite low. She very much preferred the clean-cut look, as does my current partner, a German girl.

I also find it very interesting to see that many ex-patriot Europeans here in Australia have chosen to have their children circumcised. I had many friends with English parents at school and all were clean-cut, as were the children of Italian, Irish, Dutch and Swiss parents. I wonder if it was because Australian doctors at the time were recommending the operation, or whether cultural aesthetics had an influence?

In his letter, 'Anon' mentioned that some Euro-Royals traditionally practised circumcision. Who would these be? I'd like to know. I'd be interested to find out whether Princess Grace, an American, had any influence in this matter with Monaco's Grimaldi family, and Prince Albert especially. I recently saw a photo of English rocker Rod Stewart and his model wife Rachel Hunter on holiday with their infant son, and it was clear that they'd had their little boy circumcised. Does any one know of any other celebrity circumcision practices?

On a different note, there is an Internet site that would be of great interest to Acorn members. It's a sexual questions forum devoted entirely to people talking about their attitudes to circumcision. I accessed it through the popular "Bianca's Smut Shack" site (the sexual Q. & A. section) but I'm unsure of its official title. I think it's called "Uncut Guy's Circumcision Forum". Unfortunately I don't have a computer of my own so I can't be more specific. Hopefully, one of the other members will have some luck tracking it down and relay the correct address in a future edition.

Contentment

It never ceases to amaze me just how self-conscious many men are about their genitalia, ie. they worry about the size, shape, colour?, a too long foreskin or, conversely, a too drastic circumcision! Some fret about too little or too much pubic hair and the colour of their pubes seems to worry others.

Perhaps they should all either go to their local turkish baths or join a naturist group where they will see at close range a tremendous variety of contented male parts with their proud owners.

Disaster

Some of our members won't want to read this, but, anyway, let me tell you about my friend Peter. Peter was circumcised in infancy and grew up in the knowledge that his penis had been damaged, the severity of which did not become apparent until he reached puberty. The problem was that so much skin had been removed that in places his scar was only an inch or so away from his scrotum ('drumskin-tight', as your more eager contributors would have it), making it impossible for him to masturbate. Any attempt to do so resulted in severe pain and swelling which took up to three hours to subside. As he grew older he found too that he was unable to have a sexual relationship with a girlfriend for the same reason.

When he was 23 he went in desperation to his GP, told him that the medical profession had fucked up his penis and wanted the medical profession to put the matter right and create a new foreskin for him by plastic surgery. The doctor took the old fashioned (some might say arrogant) attitude that it was insolent of him to complain, that circumcision was a wholly beneficial procedure, whatever the circumstances, and anyone who was daft enough to question it needed psychiatric treatment.

So Peter reluctantly agreed to see the shrink as a condition for referral to a plastic surgeon, and was enraged to be treated like a hopeless nut-case for not wanting to be circumcised. He refused to answer a lot of totally irrelevant questions about his sexual orientation and habits, and marched out in high dudgeon. His GP took the hint and, realising that Peter really could not continue in his state of distress, finally and contemptuously referred him to the surgeon.

If you accept that Peter's biggest mistake was to be born into a family which allowed the doctor to circumcise him, his second was to try to get the problem put right by the profession which caused it in the first place. The plastic surgeon severed the skin around the base of the penis at the scrotum line, pulled it forward to cover as much of the glans as it would, and re-covered the denuded area with a skin graft taken from his thigh.

Total disaster: the skin graft failed to take properly, and a large area of skin sloughed away from the top. When it did finally heal, Peter found that the much thicker skin graft was attached to the shaft and was totally immobile, making masturbation even more impossible than it was before. Instead of re-creating a natural looking penis, the wretched surgeon had destroyed what was left of his badly damaged organ so that it finished up, not only dysfunctional, but looking like something that ought to be hanging on a hook in a butcher's shop.

Peter is now in his late forties. He has never been able to have a sexual relationship and lives in a state of continuous and unrelenting depression. His only reason for living is to try and stop the same thing happening to other people. He has consequently joined NORM UK and campaigns vigorously with the rest of us to short circuit the dinosaurs in the medical profession who try to perpetuate the discredited practice of circumcision, and to get it banned from all British hospitals and clinics.

It would be bad enough if Peter was a one off. But he's not. Every week at NORM HQ we hear from a similar sad case where men, young and old, have been condemned by their parents to ridicule at school followed by severe sexual problems at puberty. Feelings of bitterness against parents and doctors are constantly expressed, but the problem is to get them to listen. The medical profession has traditionally treated their customers as inferior beings with no mind of their own, whose views count for nothing. The progress NORM is thankfully making is due purely to the fact that doctors themselves are not immune to the ravages of unconsidered circumcision, and several have enlisted enthusiastically in the ranks of NORM, firstly to reconstruct their foreskins by the only successful method, skin stretching, and secondly to make their less enlightened colleagues aware of the damage they do to innocent children by advocating this insult to the human body.

The message of hope for those who are damaged in body and mind by the rite of circumcision is that help and/or comfort is available from: NORM UK, PO Box 71, Stone, Staffs, ST15 0SF.

My Circumcision

As a new member, and having read some of the back numbers of the newsletter, I wondered whether my own personal experience would be of any help or interest to other members.

I was circumcised in 1973 whilst in my twenties. I had had a strong desire to be circumcised since my boarding school days. There were plenty of opportunities to see other boys' penises, and I became intensely interested in noting that some were like me, with the penis head covered by foreskins, whereas there were quite a few whose glans were permanently exposed. There were opportunities (as is fairly common) for mutual examination of each other's penises. There was one boy in particular whose exposed glans looked particularly fine, and I much admired it. I began to feel that I wanted to be like him. I used to roll back my foreskin as often as I could, exposing my glans to try to look like him. This was not a tremendous success as, very readily, my foreskin covered the glans again. I nevertheless was very keen to be able to look like him.

From school I went into the army and again it became possible to observe other men's penises, and again I noticed that some had been circumcised, as I now knew it to be, whereas others had not. Even amongst those who had foreskins there was a wide variety of different looks. (The usual observations which we have all made.) I was determined that I would be circumcised. I even contemplated self-circumcision, but decided against it. So it all had to be put on hold.

I married, and my wife and I developed a mutual interest in learning as much as we could about sexual matters.

At about that time, there was a magazine called Forum. This had quite a significant correspondence section. We got copies on a fairly regular basis and noticed that there was quite a lot on the subject of circumcision, and I told her of my desire to have it done. She was very supportive of this and we decided to write to the editorial department of the magazine. It turned out that they had had many inquiries about getting a circumcision, and in fact, one of their staff had recently been done. They had, as a result, the address of a doctor who was quite happy to offer circumcision to men.

I contacted this doctor and had a very positive and helpful reply. I cannot now remember exactly where he lived, but it was in a small town somewhere in Hertfordshire I seem to remember. As I lived in Dorset at that time, it was no great distance to travel. I therefore decided to make an appointment to see him.

Prior to the date of my appointment, he sent me a prescription for some tablets which were mainly for post operational benefits, tending to reduce the tendency to have erections until the circumcision scar had had a chance to heal. I took these tablets for a couple of days before, as instructed, and then drove to see him one Saturday morning.

He turned out to be a most pleasant man with a very relaxing attitude. We discussed what he was going to do, and he observed, on looking at my penis, there was a tendency for it to have a slight tilt to one side. This he said he would correct whilst doing the circumcision. It would then be quite straight.

The circumcision was done using a local anaesthetic, and I felt nothing as a result, apart from the initial prick of the needle. He explained to me that as I was paying him money for him to circumcise me (in those days, £20) he would be giving me my money's worth. He said there was nothing more disappointing for someone who wanted a circumcision to find, after it was all over, that there was still some foreskin left, and that the lower part of the glans was still covered when the penis was relaxed. He, therefore, would be giving me a tight circumcision so that I was permanently fully circumcised and would have no need to feel that I needed to be redone.

He pulled my foreskin forward and made several marks with a pen. Then he rolled it back and made a few more marks again. Finally he was satisfied and began to actually cut away the foreskin. In effect, he was turning my foreskin inside out and removing the outer skin to leave the inner skin of my foreskin down my shaft. This, he explained, would allow me to have the sensitivity of that part of my foreskin.

The operation took a good half hour to perform. At the end he put insoluble stitches in as he claimed that soluble stitches tended to leave scars. The stitches would have to come out in 7-10 days time. He carefully bandaged me up, I got dressed and drove home.

Duly, in about a week, my wife and I started to remove the stitches as instructed. Quite frankly, this was more painful than the operation. However, all was eventually revealed and I could begin to look at my 'new' penis. It looked lovely even then, although there was still some signs of bruising and swelling. There was evidence also of dried blood. After several days of careful bathing my penis began to take shape.

There was no doubt that I had been given a fairly radical circumcision. The shaft had developed a smooth texture, with only marginal movement of the skin over the shaft. When erect the skin was stretched, but not painfully so. The glans appeared to have a markedly flared appearance (as I think others have observed).

As far as my wife was concerned, she was delighted with the result, claiming that she could feel my penis inside her as I entered her during lovemaking. Previously she maintained that she was not aware of the whole shaft slipping in and out of her, as my penis was merely moving in and out of the loose skin of my penis.

My scar is about 2.5 to 3 cms from the base of the glans on the top, and about 4cms on the underside. Nowadays this scar is barely visible, only being noticed by the difference in skin texture. I have no lumps or unevenness around the scar and overall I am extremely pleased with my permanent state of nakedness. I would have it no other way and have no regrets at having it done.

It seems to me that it could be a very useful service to members if there was a suitable address base held by the Society that could be available to those who were looking to have a circumcision at a reasonable price. I must confess to being somewhat horrified at the figures quoted for the cost of circumcision by some people in the newsletter. I cannot quite relate the £20 cost of my circumcision to present day prices. I would add perhaps that in 1973 I did think that £20 was enough to pay.

If anyone would like to have more information I would be happy to correspond on the subject as far as I am able. Unfortunately, I can no longer remember the name of the doctor I used. In any case I feel that he is either retired by now or may not even be alive, as he was not a young man when I saw him.

Light Hearted Dictionary of Dick

From HONCHO Magazine

Codpiece – Though the original idea was modesty, the codpiece of 15th and 16th century Europe soon became sexually explicit. Codpieces featured stiffened and embroidered material, bows and sometimes jewels. The modern double stitched trouser fly and elaborate buttoned fly are obvious vestiges of the codpiece. In New York, a team of young Puerto Rican softball players are famous for the decorative and macho way they wear their jockstraps – outside their pants.

Condom – The first one was invented by a English doctor named Colonel Condom, for the use of King Charles II. Early condoms were made from animal guts until the 1840s, when Mr Goodyear invented rubbers!

Cream with That? – The average amount of cum produced by one male ejaculation is from a half to one full teaspoon.

Cum Contention – Frequency of orgasm aside, the amount of sperm produced can be traced to the size of the balls in relation to one's overall size.

Danglers – The Bushmen of Kalahari reportedly sport half hard-ons all the time.

Double Phalluses – The rare occurrence of a male born with two penises was first reported by a Dr Wecker in Bologna, Italy in 1609. In modern times, almost nothing is said publicly of such births, but there have been reports of babies with two working penises – which surgeons resolve, with parents' permission.

Fat Free Entree – The skin of the scrotum is the only part of the body, except for the eyelid, with little or no subcutaneous fat.

Four Percent – That's about the percentage of men who could never, under any circumstances, have sex with another male, according to the Kinsey studies. This tiny minority can be identified by their low sloping foreheads, their knuckles dragging on the pavement, their extra chromosome, and their long criminal record.

Height and Heredity – Many tall and lanky men have large cocks – but some don't. Many short men have oversized thumpers – but don't count on it. When it comes to cock size, heredity is the most consistent 'measure'.

Hello There – When men of the Walibri tribe in Central Australia meet for ceremonial occasions, they shake penises, not hands.

Libber – The Ancient Romans devoted a whole month of celebration every year to the god Libber, who was really a huge phallic symbol, promising luck, wealth and happiness.

Noble Nuts – In 14th century Europe, high ranking noblemen were permitted to display their naked genitals below a short tunic – their tight-fitting thighs hose were not joined at the crotch. A law passed by Edward VI in 1548, forbade "Any knight under the rank of Lord, or any other person...any gowne or jaket or clok unless it be of sufficient length on a man standing upright to cover his privy member and buttockes" However, if the noble nuts and dick of a man permitted this exhibitionist honour were not large enough to be impressive, a baquette was worn. This was a form-hugging padded falsie made of skin coloured leather.

Skin Flute – The fellatio-suggestive term 'skin flute' of course refers to the cock, and it is traced back to an old Chinese expression for blow jobs, 'playing the flute'.

Spurts – Male ejaculation is made up of three distinct spurts, and the last one is by far the most potent. (In certain, overly ambitious porn stories and videos, add a dozen or so extra spurts for effect.)

Teen Throbber – Generally speaking, a boy's cock grows to its full adult length and thickness at about the age of seventeen.

Hindu Festival

I have been sent a picture from Maxim magazine of a Hindu Holy man. The text says that the great Hindu festival of Kumbh Mela is held every three years, with millions assembling to wash away their sins. The naga sadhus, or holy men, ingest first milk and then kerosene into their bladders through the penis and then urinate the contents. When lit the regurgitated kerosene explodes into a ball of fire. The picture shows a holy man squatting down peeing the white liquid into a pint glass. He doesn't retract his foreskin when peeing.

Editorial

Well, another year has nearly come and gone, and it seems to me that we've packed quite a lot into it. Our two meetings were both outstanding successes according to those who have kindly written to me afterwards. This last one at High Wycombe attracted around 30 members, with a good number of first-timers, and it didn't take long for most everybody to be at ease with the rest. You'd think that the intimacy of our subject would make people tongue-tied, but once started it's difficult to stop 'em. Mind you, I heard a lot of other subjects discussed as well, and I got a lovely foot massage!

We've at last got our treasury difficulties resolved, and I know that Douglas is going to be the ideal treasurer, with a meticulous attitude to the job. Our thanks go to him.

Next I must thank all those contributors throughout the year, without which we would not be able to exist. Also all those who sent me cuttings and photographs from magazines, newspapers, Internet etc. knowing that they would interest me but couldn't be published. I do appreciate them. Not very many issues go by without a contribution from 'ladies', who seem to stir up more controversy than normal. They are not 'members' in the full sense and always give fictitious addresses, so all replies to them must be open and published, which is what we are all about anyway. To them I say thank you and keep them coming. On this same subject, I must remind all members that they may write to contributors, as well as contact corner adverts, privately, for personal reasons, but we would prefer open replies otherwise.

Since Vernon put us on the Internet we have had so many people from abroad showing interest in the Society. In fact it won't be long before we have as many members from overseas as we have from the UK. A good place here for me to say thank you, on your behalf, to the rest of the publishing team, Brian and Vernon. Some of the tasks are boring and onerous, so although they're unpaid, they shouldn't be unsung heroes.

That remains for us, the team, to wish all members and theirs, a very merry Xmas and a happy penile New Year. I've no doubt that Brian will be putting in the 1998 subscription forms with this edition, so we hope to hear from you all in the new year.

Shame?

Yesterday I received my 6 back copies of Acorn just two weeks after I'd sent off my check. I am impressed! It was just what I've been seeking for nearly four years. The fact that circumcision is an obsession, fetish and, yes, in the case of self circumcision, a compulsion for many others, is reassuring. Circumcision was an operation which interested me, but didn't obsess me, before I underwent the procedure in January 1994 at the age of 49. Since then, I've worked hard to metabolize the altered appearance of my penis, new sensations and the emotional impact of circumcision, especially its 'shame'.

Why shame? The fact that I allowed another man to cut my pride and joy made me feel especially powerless and small. After all, for the most part, powerless baby boys are circumcised, not adult men. Later, when I explored the various websites which focus on circumcision, I discovered that the majority of them are squarely against the procedure. Based on the lack of hard medical research in favour of the procedure, most medical books and doctors' organizations nowadays say that circumcision is unnecessary. (I suspect that the unresolved anger and pain experienced by men who were circumcised as babies figure very little in this new viewpoint. Feelings usually mean very little in the medical decision-making process.) In response to this change in opinion, even in the USA – homeland of the clipcock – the circumcision rate has fallen to 50-60% of newborn males, depending on the region. Personally, I agree that circumcision is both unnecessary and abusive for both boys and girls. However, some doctors and anti-circumcisionists also contend that adult circumcision is likewise unnecessary and abusive. Here I part company with them. I firmly believe that the procedure is entirely appropriate in at least three cases: to treat recurring urinary tract infections and balanitis (especially in the case of diabetic men), for religious conversions, and aesthetic reasons. In each of these cases, circumcision is a choice, not a power issue. Adults have choices, infants and children do not.

For anti-circumcisionists to devalue this adult choice is unfair and dangerous, especially in the case of medical decisions. In fact, they use shame as a means of controlling the decision making process. They refer to the operation as mutilation – an emotionally charged word. Is an appendectomy mutilation? Why is a medically prescribed operation any different. I recently wrote to a certain Dr. Dennison of Seattle, Washington, head of the D.O.C.'s (DOCTORS OPPOSED TO CIRCUMCISION) about my decision to be circumcised. His reply seemed quite angry. My reasons for the decision – to avoid infection and return to my sex-life – were tossed aside. He questioned my ability to understand the issues, as if I had somehow confused infant circumcision with the adult procedure. If your foreskin itches, hurts and occasionally swells to three times its size, in spite of prescribed anti-fungal creams, and if you have urinary tract infections every month, you understand the issues. Circumcision is necessary, and no-one has the right to question your motives or the motives of the physician who is recommending the operation. As for the remaining two motives, religion and self-perception, again, they are the choices which can possibly change the lives of the men who make them. Why should these choices be shameful?

In any case, I am convinced that the association of shame and sexual excitement is involved in the conversion of circumcision into a fetish. Sexual excitement enters the picture as attention is paid to the penis, a private part. It is handled and examined. It becomes the focus of a quasi-ritual, since there is pain and blood, as well as secrecy. In the midst of this ritual a piece of flesh is sacrificed, and the patient experiences fear and loss of control of a part which has symbolized his manhood from his earliest recollections. A man doesn't usually brag about his circumcision. He can't show off his circumcision scar to the admiration of his buddies. In fact, his friends might very well wince or blush if the subject, let alone the organ, is raised. This is fertile ground for shame. In the case of religious circumcision, the ritual is public, and a sense of manhood is gained. Shame isn't associated with the cutting, unless someone makes a point of it.

Many of the contributors in the five issues you sent me, clearly demonstrate the sexual excitement and shame that have become associated with their fetish. I don't say this with an air of superiority since I experience the same emotions each time I hear or see the word 'circumcision'. It is a potent combination. Although I've worked a long time to desensitise myself to it, I don't really believe the day when circumcision will be simply a word or an operation is close at hand. In the meantime, I feel I've made a positive step by sharing my thoughts with like-minded fetishists.

I hope that others will comment on my theory, that the circumcision fetish is an outgrowth of an association of secrecy, shame, fear and sexual excitement. Do your personal experiences support my belief?

D.P.R. – New Jersey, USA

Early Experiences

I can remember as a boy of about the age of 7 the enjoyable feeling of pulling back my foreskin (my sister first started to stretch and pull it back at the age of 4). As the foreskin rolled back over the head it was still quite tight and gave a stimulating feeling. I experienced quite a few bouts of balanitis as a child but my mother refused to have me circumcised. My father was circumcised. On one occasion I was at the doctor for balanitis, he told me to pull down my pants to my knees and lie down. He then pulled down my underpants to expose my penis. My mother was watching next to me. When he pulled back my foreskin, he exposed a red and inflamed glans. I immediately got a hard erection with my glans now exposed. He showed my mother how the infection had affected the head and discussed having the foreskin cut off, no way... My father was also called from his chair to look also – very humiliating, I was very hard.

I was prescribed a powder to put on the head daily, which gave a pleasant warm tingling feeling until it healed. When I went to school in my seventh year I saw a penis for the first time that did not have a skin covering it. I loved the look of an exposed glans.

When I was 9, after a bath one day, while drying my cock (I had been instructed always to pull the foreskin back, wash then dry, and don't forget to pull it back over the head again), I tried pulling the foreskin back and forward over the glans repeatedly. This felt wonderful, and next moment I experienced my first orgasm. Masturbation started – and never stopped again. At that time also, I tried to keep my foreskin pulled back to simulate circumcision, using sticky tape, elastobands, glue, etc.

At about this time of life, exploring your sex organs with friends started to take place, and circumcision was central to the exploration. The circumcised guys were always more superior in attitude. I was actually encouraged by my circumcised friends to keep my foreskin retracted. One friend, whose father was a doctor, was later to make circumcision his major topic, and actively encouraged me to have it cut off. I was circumcised seven years ago at the age of 30.

I am very interested in women's views and thoughts on circumcision. Can you help? Also, female clitoral hood circumcision by adult women on request – nothing to do with female genital mutilation.

L. – South Africa

Circumdecision

Article in Daily Telegraph magazine – 2.11.97, sent in by D.E.

According to a 1965 Jewish encyclopaedia, baby boys are circumcised for one or more or all of the following reasons:

1. as a blood offering to the gods.
2. as a substitute for sacrifice – purely symbolic.
3. atonement.
4. fertility.
5. hygiene.

The encyclopaedia then goes on to say that circumcision “is today routinely performed on non-Jewish boys as a matter of course for reasons of hygiene and appearance”.

The encyclopaedia is showing its age. It may have been fashionable in the sixties – burn your bra, go on the pill and interfere with your son's physiognomy – but in the nineties only between 5% and 10% of boys in Britain have lost their foreskin by the age of 16. My 6-month-old son is still intact. My husband is a non-practising Jew and I am a Gentile (a shiksa in Yiddish). Two things preyed constantly on my mind throughout the pregnancy. One was, “How am I to get this thing out of me without embarrassing myself in front of the midwife?”, and the other was, “What if it's a boy?”

My Jewish mother-in-law has told me 32,500 times how, when she gave birth, she was desperately, desperately ill, and how, while she lay wan and barely alive in her bed, her in-laws kidnapped the baby, performed the evil deed and then returned him, minus foreskin, to his oh-so-brave mummy, who continued to be desperately, desperately ill for many weeks. This tale has two points – one is that, like all Jewish mother-in-laws, she would like me to know that she suffered in order that her son/my husband should walk this earth. The second is that, despite being Jewish herself, she really does not want me to think she had anything to do with the mutilation of a newborn infant, the son she nurtured for nine months in the womb, and is still nurturing as I write.

My husband's family's observation of Jewish laws and rituals diminishes with each generation: the grandparents are strict – but Friday nights are Friday nights, and my husband likes chopped liver.

I have not discussed the circumcision issue with his family, which says as much about their kindness to me in not bringing the subject up as about my lack of courage in not confronting it. They may well be appalled, but they are too nice to say so. Our choice not to have Tom circumcised has, as it turns out, not become a major issue. It could have caused what in Yiddish is termed a broyges – otherwise known as the mother of all family rows. Anecdote has it that one grandfather “sat shivah” (to observe a period of formal mourning during seven days after a funeral) for an uncircumcised grandson. Armed with this knowledge, we still decided against circumcision.

Tradition dictates that a baby boy should be circumcised within eight days of birth. I knew this because two years ago I watched a television documentary on the subject. The programme was biased, setting out to show that circumcision was bad and barbaric – and even I, with all my squeamish “How could they do that to a little baby?” sentiments, could see that this was propaganda. What I remember of it now is an exaggerated version. My mind's eye has taken a controversial documentary and turned it into something resembling The Exorcist, so please take the following recollections with a pinch of salt.

In the programme, a baby was circumcised without anaesthetic by a moyle (foreskin remover), in this case a scary Uriah Heep-ish looking man with a long, rancid, yellowing thumbnail. The thumbnail played some part in the circumcising – I have obviously blanked out the bad bits, so whether it was actually used to cut the skin or not I can't remember. It may well have been. This particular circumcision went very wrong. The penis became infected, the baby ran a massive temperature and the parents were distraught.

When I became pregnant I consulted my GP about circumcision, knowing that, like me, she is a non-Jew married to a Jew, and that she had just had a baby boy. She was very convincing and, given the fact that she is an excellent GP, her reassurance that circumcision is not a dangerous operation, when performed by a qualified doctor in proper conditions, was to be wholly believed.

But when it came to it, when I gave birth six months ago to a perfect baby boy, I could not bring myself to do it. In my heart I wanted Tom to be circumcised. I wanted him to be like his father and, I have to admit, I had had the odd girly discussion with friends, in which we coyly admitted that foreskins were pretty ugly. But I could not allow anyone to lay a finger on this perfect child. He was mine, he was the most precious thing in the world and I would die for him (I am actually so pathetic that I ask the nanny to take him for his jabs – and heaven forbid he ever catches cold or scrapes a knee). And so, since my husband appeared not to be bothered either way, the circumcision debate could hardly be said to have raged. Tom escaped the knife.

I am not triumphant about it. There is a bit of guilt sediment clogging my conscience. Do I regret it? Yes, I do. Would I have it done now? No, I would not. Two people have recently asked me if I am worried that Tom will wonder why he is not like his father. My somewhat glib and guilty answer is that I do not imagine that he will spend much of his childhood staring at his father's genitals. But, in truth, I do worry a bit. I also believe that, yes, women do find circumcised men more attractive. There is, as well, a tiny nagging worry that Tom may grow up and really want to be Jewish and he'll hate me for not being brave enough to have him circumcised. But I can counter that argument too. If he had been done, he might have grown up and joined the Foreskin Reclamation Society in America – I believe they hang weights from strategic bits.

A Jewish friend of mine, whose son is 15, says she still remembers the misery of the circumcision decision. "I thought it was something that Jewish peasants – my distant and dim ancestors – would have done. I thought it was barbaric, butchery. But there was a part of me that desperately wanted Josh to be done. I was clinging to my roots for dear life and protecting my baby at the same time. In the end we compromised and he was circumcised by a paediatrician – there was absolutely no religious element to it at all." Josh has thanked his mother for having him circumcised. He believes that he and his best friend (also Jewish), the only ones in his class at school who have been 'done', look better than the rest of the boys.

Who knows what Tom will think? Whatever, I will have to live with it – and, at least until he is old enough to reverse our decision, so will he. I still wouldn't let anyone touch him and, whatever they may say, it must really hurt – so I believe I made the right decision. Or did I?

Reply to C.P.

I am replying to C.P.'s letter (6/97) showing interest in my attitudes to circumcision, and in particular his interest which, as he says, is shared by lots of men, in seeing women peeing standing up. Although I'm not about to give him a personal demonstration, because that's not my style, I can point him and others who share his curiosity in the right direction. My male contact who pointed out the relevance of some of my feminist views to Acorn, suggests you get onto the Internet and dial up patches/ws/atwood.txt, which will show an unusual picture of a smartly dressed young lady standing with her skirts up and knickers aside, pissing daintily into the Thames from the footbridge. It is accompanied by text explaining in greater detail the philosophy behind the feminist aspiration for women to pee erect which you so kindly allowed me to air in your issue of 5/97.

I realise of course that peeing and women's attitudes to peeing are very much a sideline to your main interest, and no doubt you do not want to be thought of as catering to piss-freaks to any great extent, but I do in fact have further points to make which are much more relevant to your subject.

I spent many years in a partnership with a nice man who in most respects was ideal husband fodder. The fact that he was 15 years older than me didn't seem to matter at first, but what was missing was the dynamic sexual response from him which I had enjoyed with his predecessor, and which I put mainly down to our age difference. Another factor was that he was circumcised, and I am quite convinced that this made a considerable difference to his ability to get the most out of sex. Let me explain.

I am unable, possibly due to a deeply buried clitoris, to get an orgasm from normal missionary style sex, although I get wildly and frustratingly excited. Oral sex on the other hand sends me absolutely frantic (as it does most women if they are honest), especially when the guy ferrets with his tongue under my skin hood, and I always get a marvellous climax. My enjoyment is doubled if I know he is getting as much excitement as I am. With my previous lover, who was uncircumcised, I used to mimic his tongue exercises by burrowing under his foreskin and lapping his tip, with the result that he went just as wild as I did, ie. his equipment was equally as sensitive as mine. My last lover was the opposite: he got no enjoyment at all from oral sex, his bell-end being totally insensitive to gentle touches, and preferred me not to try – result: second-rate sex! I am now a confirmed and happily matched lesbian, although I might be interested in the unlikely event of finding another male lover with the skill of the first guy.

[Ms S.W. also sent a photocopy of pages of the British Journal Of Urology of November 1997 (current), which she paraphrased also in her letter. But the contents will be such a shock to most members that I thought I would copy excerpts in greater detail. So here goes.]

Variability in Penile Appearance and Penile Findings: a Prospective Study

By R.S. Van Howe, Department of Pediatrics, Marshfield Clinic, Minocqua, Wisconsin, USA.

[Note. In this context, the word 'findings' means problems.]

Introduction.

One of the most frequently cited reasons for neonatal circumcision in the USA is for a boy to 'look like his father'. According to past studies, between 1% and 9.5% will have the procedure revised or redone, and 2.8% of parents will complain of the cosmetic appearance. Although the natural progression of the appearance of the normal penis has been well documented to date, no study has documented penile appearance beyond the first year of life in a mostly circumcised population. This study examines prospectively the prevalence and kinds of penile variation and clinical findings in a general paediatric practice.

Patients and Methods.

The study population consisted of a consecutive sample of 468 males up to 18 years old who had their genitalia examined by the author in the clinic between June 1995 and April 1997. These examinations included sports, physical and well-child examinations as well as sick visits where a genital assessment was part of a physical examination for a specific problem. 822 such genital examinations were performed. Sexual maturity ratings were documented for all patients and the penis categorised as 'glans fully exposed', 'corona covered', 'glans partially covered', and 'glans completely covered'.

Among the 238 boys under three years old, those circumcised were significantly more likely to have more non-cosmetic problems, including coronal adhesions, trapped debris (lint, dirt, talc, stool and smegma), a reddened meatus, phimosis and balanitis than were boys with a foreskin. In the foreskinned penis, muscle fibres are arranged in a whorl to form a sphincter that keeps unwanted contaminants out. Urine swirling under the foreskin in the normal infant male before expulsion flushes any contaminants from the subpreputial space, and may explain the paucity of findings in this population.

Found in the circumcised group under 3 years were:- glans fully exposed - 35.6%, glans partially covered - 30.6%, glans completely covered - 20.1%, entrapped debris - 24.7%, reddened meatus - 19.1%, balanitis - 15.5%, phimosis - 0.9%. Coronal adhesions develop in circumcised boys at 2-6 months of age and usually resolve by 24 months.

The high degree of variability in appearance could not be related to the technique used or the physician using it. When operating on the infantile penis, the surgeon cannot adequately judge the appropriate amount of tissue to remove because the penis will change considerably as the child ages, such that a small difference at the time of surgery may translate into a large difference in the adult circumcised penis. To date, there are no published studies showing the ability of a circumciser to predict the later appearance of the penis.

Of the one-fifth of the above group with glans fully covered, it is unclear how many had a buried penis, as this was not specifically investigated. Buried penis is a congenital deformity that is often not recognised in the neonatal period: circumcision of these boys can result in serious complications. If the penis is small, any surgery should be deferred until it can be clearly shown that it is not a buried penis. Additionally, several boys presenting for 'recircumcision' may have a buried penis. Attempts to recircumcise these boys often makes the condition worse and reconstruction more problematic. When parents request revisional surgery, the surgeon confronts four dilemmas; first, it is impossible to predict how the penis will look after puberty in a prepubescent child: second, once skin is taken off, it is hard to replace. If too much skin is taken off, there may not be enough skin for the penis to become erect in adulthood without pain, skin tears, or pubic hair being pulled onto the base of the penis: third, an infant's circumcised penis that is covered in skin may represent a hidden penis, in which case, standard circumcision revision techniques could make the situation worse: and, finally, it is not clear whether a surgeon can obtain informed consent, parental assent, or informed parental permission for cosmetic surgery in a pre-verbal child.

If, after circumcision, the raw areas of the penile skin or remaining preputial tissue are in contact with the denuded glans, adhesions occur. The 29.7% of boys up to three with adhesions or skin bridges emphasises the importance of continuing penile care in the circumcised infant. While the infant with a normal foreskin requires no special care, the circumcised boy needs to have any skin overlying the glans pulled back and cleaned regularly until 15-18 months of age, to prevent adhesions to the glans from reforming and debris from accumulating.

In a prospective study in Japan, 1.6% of 565 Japanese foreskinned boys up to ten years old had balanitis. In this present study, 5.6% of 357 circumcised boys up to ten had balanitis. Although the value of comparing prospective data from different studies is limited, it appears that circumcised boys up to ten years of age are more likely to develop balanitis than are normal boys. While inflammation of the penis may occur more frequently in circumcised boys, balanoposthitis (inflammation of both glans and foreskin) in the normal penis may be more painful because of the nerve endings sensitive to fine touch in the foreskin. Most of these cases, regardless of circumcision status, can be successfully treated with topical therapy.

The present findings highlight the importance of reassuring parents about their child's penile appearance. Parents who have their child circumcised for cosmetic reasons may be disappointed by the wide variability documented here. As physicians, we may have a moral obligation to steer parents away from unnecessary and costly circumcision revisions until the child is old enough to consent to the procedure.

One of the weaknesses of previous studies was their reliance on parental comment as the sole inclusion criterion. It is difficult to measure the prevalence of parental dissatisfaction. The scarcity of comments may reflect the lack of a clear notion of how the circumcised penis should appear. In the USA, there is general ignorance among parents and physicians about the appearance and function of the normal penis, let alone that surgically altered. The lack of comment may also reflect a society that is accustomed to seeing a wide variety of surgically altered penises. The great weakness of the present study was the relatively few boys with foreskins, which limited the power of the statistical analysis.

In conclusion, there is a wide penile variation in young circumcised boys: penile findings among these boys are much more common than previously reported in retrospective studies. Practitioners need to be familiar with the prevalences of these findings to give accurate information to parents. When discussing the advantages and disadvantages of neonatal circumcision, parents need to know that the circumcised infant requires more attention and penile hygiene than the uncircumcised infant: circumcised boys are more likely to develop balanitis, meatitis, coronal adhesions and meatal stenosis.

'Nudist' Holiday!

On holiday last month, my wife and I and another couple in their 60s (we're in our 50s) spent two weeks visiting the Greek Islands. Whilst the holiday was a complete disaster, which I shall not bore you with, our friends turned out to be nudists (unknown to us, not having been on holiday with them before), and headed, at every opportunity (with us in tow) for the nudist beaches.

Having read 'Women and Hair' in issue 5 by Doreen Chase, I will let you have a note of my 'findings' if such will be of interest. Apart from 'ogling' the female form, I didn't notice any ladies who'd shaved. I was also able to observe some male appendages in quantities I'd not seen since the changing rooms at school some 40 odd years ago! Whilst admitting to keeping my shorts on, I didn't notice any men, uncircumcised, walking around with their foreskins retracted. I can only wonder where Doreen has been to witness such things! The beaches we visited were at Noussa on the little island of Paros.

It's certainly not my 'cup of tea' and, needless to say, we shall not be repeating such a holiday with this couple.

Doreen does have some strong reasons for the pubic hair on both females and males. I, being innocent, thought it was to prevent chafing of the pubic area during natural intercourse in the 'missionary' position. Do correct me if I'm on the wrong track!

C.B. – Cheshire

[I've been told that the last thing that the 'missionary' position is, is the natural way, and was called so because us few westerners went round the world arrogantly telling everyone else that they were doing it wrongly. — D.A.]

My Circumcision Story

My first time in noticing that some boys were different came when I was about 8 or 9. Not all boys born in 1942 in the U.S. were circumcised, not in the rural part of Indiana where I was born. In fact, of the 44 boys I graduated from high school with, only 7 were circumcised. As I said, when I was 8 or 9 years old, a friend and I were in the school bathroom taking a leak when a boy about three years older than us, and very big for his age, came in and stood between us and pulled out what I thought was the largest penis I had ever seen. It stood straight out and he was very tightly circumcised, although I didn't know then why he looked different. My friend, who lived next door to him, said he had asked him why he was always exposed. He said his mother told him that he was born without skin! So I asked my dad about it and he said some people have it cut off when they are a baby because the mothers are too lazy to keep it clean, but it was cruel and did not need to be done.

Thus started my fascination with circumcision. I made a special effort to check, without being obvious, if and who of the others had been circumcised. I thought they looked neater, and tried to keep mine skinned back, but when this didn't work I tried scotch tape, but this was uncomfortable. By the age of 12 I had trained my skin to remain retracted, but it would swell and I would have to bring it forward again. The glans adapted very quickly and it felt better exposed. I wanted to be circumcised very badly.

At the age of 18, after high school, I started looking for a doctor who would do me in his office. I was called foolish by some, some only wanted to do a partial circ, and the rest said it could only be done in a hospital, which I didn't want. When I was 25 my long time dream came true. I found a urologist who would do me in his office under a local and remove all my foreskin. The stitches were the worst, but only for about 2 weeks, and I was totally healed in 4 weeks. My only regret – I wish it could have been done sooner. I still love being circumcised.

Cuts at Christmas — A Seasonal Tail!

Early afternoon two weeks before Christmas found the classroom filled with an air of expectancy. All desks were occupied, the pupils eagerly awaiting sex education and an opportunity to embarrass their teacher. Though you could hear a pin drop, the heavy atmosphere was of mischievous anticipation. Outside in the corridor, Mr Hewison was endeavouring to summon up composure, at least a facade on the outside. Despite having completed the syllabus, there were uncertain times of revision when the demons of 2C could raise any subject, and he knew they were ready for him!

"What will they come up with today?" he mused, blanching at past subjects like masturbation, homosexuality and AIDS, "what on earth will they add to that heady cocktail?" Biting his lower lip and nervously pinching his nose with a finger and thumb, he straightened up and turned towards the door. "Here goes, Hewie, sock it to them!"

As he strutted into the room like a military caricature, a murmur went through the class. The spontaneous "Good afternoon, Sir" sounded more of a threat than a greeting, what with the smirking on so many faces. Hewie stood at his desk, left hand grasping the back of his chair to steady himself. "Good afternoon, class."

As he arranged his books on the desk, he continued, "This is another open session. You have a chance to bring up questions covering the completed syllabus so far. Who'll start off?" Little did he realise that the 'heady cocktail' was to become a cocktail itself!!

"Sir, Sir", uttered Mary, normally a shy girl who had coloured somewhat when menstruation had been discussed previously, "what's circumcision?"

"It's an operation on the penis which initiates Jewish babies." The words of the textbook origin came out mechanically. The teacher's face twitched, as did an old lumpy circumcision scar in trousered concealment, protesting in the only way it could!

"There's cutting, isn't there, Sir?", added a freckled faced boy at the front called Robert, "it must hurt."

"Yes", responded Mr Hewison, "the loose skin on the end of the baby's penis is cut off with a sharp knife. Pain would be short-lived and not remembered."

"Do they do it to all Jewish boys?", questioned a pigtailed Katy, glancing at Jonathan Cohen, the only Jewish scholar of 2C, "all of them?"

"Yes. As far as I know." Seeing Jonathan colour slightly and lower his eyes to the desk, the master began to generalise: "and to Moslem boys, too, and even to those who are neither Moslem or Jewish. Some need the operation, and a few have it done at their parents' requests."

Sitting next to Jonathan, his friend, Mike, entered into the discussion. "Well, Sir, I think if it had to be done for religion, I'd be proud of it", said Mike firmly, "and as for me, I'm not sure if anything was done to me as a baby. I may have been clipped." (Mike possessed a short foreskin, and had seen his friend's almost fully exposed glans beside him in the playground urinal.)

By now, there were quieter remarks between pairs not meant for the class discussion at all, both risqué and precocious. Colin Bates, 'Master' Bates to his friends, whispered to Len James, another reprobate at the back of the room, "There's only one good thing about circumcision."

"What's that", asked Len softly, "no drawback?"

"Don't spoil the joke. It's because you'll never feel a complete prick."

"You would with me", quipped Len, sniggering.

Aware of the muttering, not the words, Mr Hewison snapped at the class, "Boys! This is a serious subject! Cut it out!"

"Or off, Sir!", joked Colin, whose younger brother had been circumcised two years ago. (Seeing the result on his brother's penis, he had covered his genital area with both hands, telling his mother that he wouldn't like that done to him.)

Not only the boys found amusement in the subject. Some girls had begun to dabble with foreskin humour too, but not openly. The olive skinned and rather petite Estelle whispered to her companion Clarissa that plumbers were afraid to work in a synagogue because they got their tools 'nicked'. That hardly impressed the impish Clarissa. With her mother a passionate advocate of male circumcision and her younger brothers thoroughly clipped, she had seen them bathed before and after their inevitable circumcisions. She raised her hand intent on joining the discussion with her expert knowledge.

"Sir, there's a twiddly bit of skin at the end of a boy's willy. When it's cut off there's a plump red cherry at the end like my brothers. Mother says it's the mark of a little gentleman, and cleaner, and prettier, and..."

"Thank you, Clarissa", interrupted Mr Hewison, a bulge in his trousers concealed by his desk, "that is a point of view, but hardly popular these days. To be correct, the cherry you mention is the glans. All girls have a smaller one called the clitoris which, like the male glans, is skin covered too".

Clarissa felt aggrieved at being cut off in verbal flight, albeit prejudiced from her mother's influence. She was determined to finish, blurting out, "...and they had stitches all round! Mother says all boys should be done."

"That's enough, young lady!" Hewie could be quite stern when he had to be. "Now let me show you what all the fuss is about", he said, mopping his brow and running that same sweaty palm downwards in a continuous arc to control his trouser bulge. He switched on a television monitor and video recorder. Part of the educational film clearly showed an infant penis with foreskin, followed by one without. Though most eyes were looking at the screen, Jonathan felt they were all peering at him. Patrick, a surly boy who had taunted Jonathan mercilessly for months, finally had the opportunity to maximise his victim's distress. Pointing at the freshly healed circumcision on the screen, he called out, "Another roundhead? We're cavaliers! Up the cavaliers! Down with roundheads!"

"Order, order", boomed the master, "that's not nice, Patrick. Judging one by an operation in babyhood that he had nothing to do with is most distasteful. You can write one hundred lines on tolerance, boy!"

As the punishment was levied, Clarissa was whispering to Estelle, "Do you know how to circumcise a whale? Send down fore skin divers!"

"How corny, one of yours?"

"No, my mother's."

A week later the class assembled for their final class before the end of term. By then, some of the children had spoken to parents and relatives about what was a taboo subject. They discovered that circumcision generated passion in families, within and between generations, causing division, dissimilarity, and even break-up. Lives could be scarred as well as penes, though some could be enhanced, even restored! Patrick suffered a torn foreskin whilst tree climbing the day after his classroom outburst. His "Up the cavaliers!" cry was stilled with an emergency circumcision at the local hospital. Radically shorn, stitched and bandaged, he returned in time for Mr Hewison's final session. His parents had found out all the circumstances and insisted he attend. Placing his imposition on the master's desk, he walked cautiously in a straddling gait, sitting down carefully at his desk.

There had been rumours about the boy's absence. Being away for a minor operation in boyhood usually meant only one thing, and rarely happened at the school. "Could he be...?" many wondered. "Circumcised?" added Katy, "like Jonathan?" Heads turned in Patrick's direction causing him to blush as reddily as his bandaged scar. He felt utterly exposed, his penis throbbing and twingeing mercilessly.

"Poor Patrick", thought Mary, Robert, Mike, and even Jonathan, "if that's what's happened to him at thirteen, having the skin on the end clipped back."

Mr Hewison walked into the classroom, and a more subdued atmosphere. The air of mischievousness was somewhat absent, replaced by the rare presence of sympathetic curiosity. "Good afternoon, class", he said, amazed at the change. "So you are back with us, Patrick!"

"Yes, Sir", replied the boy self-consciously, "the lines are on your desk." Picking up the imposition, Hewie suggested the class quietly revise, compiling questions for later. Reading the boy's handwriting was a revelation for him, even sweeping aside some of his own anger and resentment of many years' standing. Immediately after finishing the final paragraph, he suggested that the whole class would benefit from Patrick's words.

"Well", he began, a lump in his throat, "for a long time I thought tolerance strange and unusual, even unnatural. Those with tolerance were weak. Being strong meant more to me, and by not thinking about others, I could do more, be more, and live life my way. Being spiteful to those who are different gave me strength and confidence. Strength meant being above, bossing, or ridiculing others. So I thought until last week.

“Quite a lot can happen in six days. I suppose that accident and operation put me back on the right track. I feel sorry that I teased Jonathan about being different. Father told me that was prejudice, a bad thing. It should be what people are inside that is the main consideration, their real nature, and not a physical feature, however imposed on them. Here I score badly, but I hope to learn through what has happened. I am now what I ridiculed before you, circumcised, which I do not like and cannot help. A roundhead without the benefit of religion. Here, Jonathan is certainly one up on me. I am very sorry for the way I behaved, for the selfish way of thinking, the childish, cruel taunts. Perhaps I deserve ridicule for being different from most, but can do nothing about that at all. I only know that in the future I will look beyond the physical in those around me, and try not to judge.”

The sound of enthusiastic clapping resounded around the classroom, seeped out into the corridor and, lessening in volume all the time, advanced to the wakeful ear of the headmaster. Jonathan looked at Patrick and smiled. That day Mr Hewison, the teacher, had been taught as well as teaching. His flaccid penis, though scar-ringed and stumpy, had ceased to shame him in that moment of revelation. As the children filed out of the room for the Christmas break, he relaxed in his chair, smiling contentedly. It was a time of peace, the approach of the Christ, His birthday and, days later, the Feast of His circumcision.

Anthony wishes a very happy Christmas to all Acorn members of whatever status, and a personal ‘thank you’ to those who have corresponded with him, bestowing on him the intimacy of the written word. A HAPPY NEW YEAR TO YOU ALL.

Strange Radio Show Name

In his article ‘The Spoken Foreskin’ (Issue 8/95), R.B.W. commented that the pop scene seems to be highly foreskin orientated, with at least two groups alluding to it in their names.

Imagine my surprise when doing a search through the Internet for articles on circumcision to be presented with a page entitled: High Voltage Circumcision Show – DJ Defily D.

Apparently this DJ runs a radio show by that name on WJUL in Lowell, Massachusetts. It specialises in industrial/ambient/experimental rave/noise and uncategorizable music – nothing whatsoever to do with our subject!

Editorial

Hello for the first edition of the year, and it promises to be a busy and exciting one. 1997 saw a sharp upturn in inquiries about the Society with a good uptake of members. Each year sees the membership grow, mostly from kind ads in associated catalogues and magazines like Body Jewellery, Boyz, Foreskin Quarterly, NORM UK, Starkers, S&CN, not forgetting Tuppy Owens and the Internet notice of Vernon's. Our thanks to them all and everyone else who broadcasts our being.

In the last few months we have also at last been able to get in contact with Chuck Thompson. Well, to be honest, he got in touch with us, which was great. As some members know, Chuck lives in Hollywood and has for many years issued newsletters on cock matters, very much like ourselves. He has kindly agreed to a swap of our materials, a process that is already under way. His speciality has been to compile a list of famous people's status, circumcised or intact. This list is now about 2,300 names long, most of whom we all know, although there are of course some names we don't know such as internal American sports stars and TV personalities. Chuck has helped by signifying in which field they are celebrities. I know from all the letters I get that this subject is of great interest to the majority of our members so, to keep the appetite going and cut down on postage, we are sending a page at a time with each newsletter, and you should have the entire list by the end of the year. I have a lot of other material from Chuck, but I've yet to think of the best means of distribution.

Our AGM meeting has been put in hand by Brian and there should be a flier with this newsletter giving details. It's at High Wycombe again, which has proved a central and popular venue. Brian has already contacted many of the regulars, but for those who have never come before, you won't be disappointed. The numbers grow every time.

Finally, the only thing that keeps us going are the letters of opinions and experiences from you, the members. As you will have seen, we have some members who are continually contributing (for which I can't thank them enough) but almost everyone should have something to say, as this is a society of obsession mainly, and most joined because of it. If you have a hobby or fetish such as genital tattooing, piercing, manipulation, mild mutilation etc., no matter how bizarre, why not tell us the details, and you'll find there's always some members into whatever it is, too.

I'm also glad to see that this issue's Contact Corner is more than usual. Don't forget that we also have a Question Corner, so that if anything is puzzling you, just ask, and someone might know. If it's embarrassing use the anonymity. Anyway, I hope you all enjoy another year's reading.

Finding Out

I am extremely pleased to be able to join The Acorn Society as, for as long as I can remember, I have been fascinated by the penis, both my own and that of other people.

The first thing I can remember took place in the garden shed as a very small boy, perhaps 7 or 8, playing with a little girl who lived nearby. How it happened I don't know, but I took off my trousers and she removed her knickers. We felt each other's genitals – and I remember that my cock became hard, though I didn't know why!

At boarding school we swam in the nude, both boys and teachers. So the sight of cocks was normal. Amongst boys growing up, erections were common, and it didn't take long to find out about the pleasures of masturbation and ejaculation. But that's another story. I have been interested in genitals ever since.

Circumcision and Shame

A Response to D.P.R. in Issue 8/97

A comment by D.P.R. was that “the circumcision fetish is an outgrowth of an association of secrecy, shame, fear and sexual excitement”. Maybe he is right in some cases, but it is never wise to make a wide generalisation and then assume that it is a universal truth.

I was circumcised in infancy before any question of being afraid of an impending operation could have arisen, so I am not impressed by the idea that fear has much to do with the procedure or its acceptance. At 64, I estimate that my twice-daily orgasms, through masturbation or partnered sex, since my 9th birthday, have resulted in some 40,000+ sexual climaxes in my lifetime. Whether or not the enjoyment factor of these instances of sexual excitement would have been any better (or worse) had I been uncircumcised can only be a matter of conjecture. I can only say that, though I haven't a particularly large or pretty cock, I've had a wonderful sex life and I wouldn't have changed a moment of it. I don't feel the slightest shame. My penis is “in the public domain” if anyone expresses sufficient interest to have a look at it. It's no more secret than the end of my nose, apart from the clothing conventions of the society in which we live, and I don't give a toss about what other men think of it. I enjoy the fact that I am circumcised, but agree with D.P.R. that it is a matter of personal choice once adulthood is reached. I suppose that if men didn't have fetishes about their penises then there would hardly be a need for a society like Acorn, but frankly, cut or uncut, I see the average penis as being an object of incomparable beauty. I'm more than happy with what I've got and, until D.P.R.'s article, I had never thought of being circumcised as being in any way associated with secrecy, shame or fear. Sexual excitement? Well, yes, he may have a point there. Whether it be tattoos, piercings, circumcision, pubic shaving, wearing cockstraps, or whatever, there are lots of us who get a kick out of “doing something” with our dick. If it's a “turn-on”, where's the harm in that? It's certainly nothing to be ashamed, frightened or secretive about.

Doreen Chase Answers

I was quite flattered by all the comments in issue 7/97 on my letter disapproving of female pubic shaving and men pulling their foreskins back on nudist beaches. They do seem unnecessarily defensive though, and their logic a bit strange in places. For instance, D.T. accuses me of being prudish and hypocritical – do prudes join nudist clubs and enjoy parading around naked, and seeing others naked? I am certainly not hypocritical either, but I will admit to being a naturist in the full sense of the word and, although I can be outspoken at times, my opinion is shared by others, and deserves to be heard. Furthermore, I would not dream of trying to force my opinions on others, unlike your supporters of infant circumcision.

Then the guy who gave us the eye-watering story of self circumcision: although he assures us that he doesn't need the help of a psychiatrist, does he really think that self-amputation of a perfectly healthy part of the body, for no more than a whim, is a normal thing to do?

J.F. tells us that he had himself circumcised in adulthood "to maximise enjoyment of social nudity at clubs and beaches". I've spoken to some of my nudist friends about this and we are all puzzled that anyone should feel proud of having part of their penis amputated, while on the nudist beaches of Europe like Agde, it is considered at the least rather odd and even slightly shameful. Likewise the guy who was dragged unknowingly to a nudist beach in Greece. He says that he never saw anyone walking about with their foreskin worn back. Of course not! The only places you will see such things is on British beaches like Studland Bay, where a number of the older men are circumcised, and some of the younger generation, who are not, try to ape them God knows why! The thought of sunburn on a sensitive glans makes most normal people's eyes water.

J.T. from Australia assures us that his Swedish girlfriend claims that most of her partners from Europe had been circumcised, including most of her Scandinavian boyfriends! All the Scandinavian nudists I know (I lived in Denmark for two years) are horrified by circumcision and look upon it as child abuse. I can only think she was telling him a little white porky so as not to hurt his feelings. Of course, if they were second generation Australians it might be feasible. But even the Aussies these days are giving it up, and according to a recent documentary (see below), Australian women who enjoy their sex seem to appreciate a bit of foreskin. An interesting point J.F. raises is about whether Princess Grace brought any American pro-circ influence to bear on the Grimaldi family. The answer is no – I saw a picture in Paris Match last year showing one of Grace's daughters with her child waiting to board a gin-palace in the harbour. The photographer caught a poignant moment in the scene, since the boy is shown with his willy out having a piddle in the dock – and he is most definitely not circumcised. I should be amazed if he were!

My husband tells me that there is a US website which you can find by setting your browser on "Maggimagoo", in which foreskin and circumcision problems are discussed at length. In answer to a new mother's understandable ignorance (since most Americans are circumcised), the problem of the ballooning foreskin on urination in boys is discussed by several doctors and mothers of intact boys. They all assure her that circumcision is not necessary: ballooning does no harm and will go away in time. If not, they recommend a cream that will loosen up the orifice. They emphasise that no attempt should be made to pull the foreskin back. Another mother says that her boy has the same problem and has developed the obviously enjoyable habit of pulling his foreskin downward to relieve it. She and another young mum were tickled pink to see that their kids could stretch their foreskins down as far as their knees. The doctor confirmed that this did no harm and their foreskins were loosening nicely. Another young man, fearful of the fanatical urge some U.S. doctors have for circumcising, recommends by name hospitals or doctors known to be sympathetic to foreskins, where mothers can have their babies without worrying about them being taken away and done “by mistake”.

Finally a tale to make your unhappier members eat their hearts out – and wow the others. BBC 2 broadcast a documentary about a hetero male prostitute in Melbourne the other night – and guess what? Those raunchy red-blooded Australian women who know what they like and aren't afraid to ask, prefer it long, thick and uncircumcised! His wife Catherine, who acts as Secretary (or “Madam”), answered a query from a potential customer: “Joel is blond, blue-eyed, 5'10" tall, nine and a quarter inches long, uncut and thick.” The lady gasped and licked her lips: “...uncut too – great, just right for me!” Then a number of ecstatic clients were interviewed, all glowing with satisfied lust, paying tribute to his impressive equipment, fantastic technique, (including cunnilingus), enormous staying power and permanent erection. As the wife of a struggling furniture maker, Catherine originally recognised his special talent in the pork department and his ability to keep a woman on the crest of orgasm, and comparing his equipment favourably with other men, jokingly suggested he hire it out. He now has a clientele of 1200 adoring women, and earns 85K a year.

The moral, if that's the right word, is: if you're an Acorn reader who is big, uncut and thick, don't listen to the advice of the circumcisers. Don't cut your foreskin off. Go to Australia and earn a fortune with it. Better read the Kama Sutra first though.

Around the World

The Acorn newsletter continues to be a useful forum for various opinions and a clearing house for members' experiences, opinions, questions and bits of information. And this is as it should be, rather than becoming a pulpit for anti-cut or pro-cut views, or any particular agenda.

The remarkable letter from Doreen Chase has been amply (if not fully or completely) replied to by writers in 7/97, so I won't add more fuel to that fire.

Re charges for circumcision: a Muslim penpal in Dhaka, Bangladesh reported that his American born nephew was circumcised by a native practitioner during a visit to Bangladesh, at a cost of about $70 US. My friend further reported that the operation (on a young boy) would have cost about $1500 in the States. This is out of most people's price range if not covered by health insurance. However, if circumcision is done 'neonatally' (shortly after birth), the charges are much less, and neonatal circumcision is still covered by most health insurance plans and HMO's in the U.S. One large hospital here, wherein circumcisions are typically done in the Pediatrics Clinic (rather than by the obstetricians and midwives who deliver the babies), quoted me an average cost of about $140 for an uncomplicated newborn circ. I passed this information on to my friend in Dhaka. Another friend of mine, in the States, recently paid more than $3000 for an adult circumcision. This included charges for anesthesiologist, pathologist, etc; and this friend further had the (for him) indignity of being attended by female nurses!!

Re circumcision among European royalty: wouldn't this be more likely among the British royal family (the Windsors) than among the Grimaldis of Monaco (though it cannot be ruled out in the latter case)? Also, are any of your readers able to confirm or refute anecdotal material about circumcision in the Spanish and Scandinavian royalty? It's frequently alleged that King Louis XVI of France was circumcised as an adult. However, it is also reported (and this certainly seems more probable) that the king was given merely a dorsal slit, not a 'full' circumcision, to relieve a very troublesome phimosis. The king's 'condition' was not only affecting marital relations with his queen, Marie Antoinette, but also (these things cannot be kept secret) making the royal couple the laughing stock of Paris at the time.

Clipping Parties in Schools? Another Muslim friend, in Malaysia, reported on khenduris (circumcision feasts) held there. He says, sometimes, schools, with the help of the PTA, will organise mass circumcision ceremonies for groups of boys. The favourite times for circumcision, he reports, are during school holidays. Clinics do a brisk clipping business at such times.

Of three correspondents I wrote to recently, via Acorn, only one has replied.

French Pop Group

The very last comment in 8/97 about pop groups being into foreskins and circumcision rang a bell. Here in France, some years ago, the Gay Pied published a game featuring a five-man pop group (unfortunately I have forgotten their name and they are probably quite forgotten by now), who had dropped their pants to be photographed, but the middle section had been cut out and shifted around, and the object of the game was to match the penis with the singer. Of the five, two had ample foreskins, one a typical half-master, but two heads were bared and certainly appeared to be circumcised. Funny how non-pornographic photos are often the most sexy!.

Passions

As a relative newcomer to Acorn, who enjoys other members' letters and articles in the newsletter, I would like to share my thoughts, and indeed passions, with you.

As I had been circumcised at birth, very neatly and expertly performed I must add, I grew up knowing no other status. I never felt 'different' or ridiculed as circumcision seemed to be the norm in my immediate family and friends. I have now put that down to being Yorkshire by birth, post war, when all things American were in vogue, and the start of the NHS when, if it was free a Yorkshire man was all for it! It was only on reaching that magic age when realising that a willy came in useful for other things than peeing that I discovered what a foreskin was, and that there were other varieties of willies. And I haven't looked back since.

Even though I don't belong to any camp, for or against circumcision, and would never enter the arguments surrounding circumcision, the discovery of the joys that a foreskin can bring to its owner makes me wish that things had been different. That said, I enjoy my circumcised status and live in harmony with it, but I know that if I had a son, then he would have been left uncircumcised and educated to make his own penile decision.

Which brings me to my passion – foreskins, foreskins and more foreskins. I love the sight of willies encased in foreskins. I love the movement of the penile skin and foreskin when it is being wanked, or the willy used for fucking; the mystique of not knowing what is hidden behind that foreskin; the textures, taste and aroma both outside and inside the foreskin. Guys with foreskins can 'dock' with other glans, foreskins can be clamped closed when pissing to create balloons. Even sewn closed or pierced for extra fun if the owner is into that kind of fun, plus countless other ways the foreskin can be used for sexual pleasure. I love to watch men with foreskins having a shower at the gym just to see them pulling it back to wash the glans, so I can't fully appreciate why anyone would want to part company with such an enjoyable part of the willy. However, even with a foreskin fetish, I do have favourites, and go weak at the knees over tight and very tight fitting foreskins, especially with no 'tassel' over the end of the glans. Another favourite foreskin type is where the foreskin opening is totally covering the glans, but clearly open and angled away from the frenulum side (as in the style of certain newer Mercedes car headlights).

So, in finishing this short piece, you guys with a foreskin, remember you have the best of both worlds and your foreskins give pleasure to me, you lucky sods!

Self Circ

I have been meaning to comment about something printed around the middle of last year. Annoyingly, I can't find the relevant article, but no doubt you can locate it. [Yes. 6/97, page 4, entitled 'Sensitivity'. – D.A.]. He was bemoaning the fact of being cut and left without stitches, and how sore and miserable he was as a result.

Well, he was talking a lot of nonsense as, in my own DIY circ. I left the severed edges to heal naturally without stitches. This you will recollect was written up fully in 1/93. Not only did the cut heal perfectly, but the result looks like a neo-natal circ, as it is difficult to detect a scar line even. Also around the frenulum a large amount of skin was snipped away leaving a quite raw area. This initially healed by scar tissue, but some months later this dissolved away to leave soft pliable tissue which looks and feels exactly like inner foreskin (mucosa). This can be verified by those who inspected me at the Heathrow meeting last year.

Redundancy

I have a very old book about circumcision, published in 1891, in which reference is made to a French family whose male offspring are always born without a foreskin. Maybe one day the circumcision debate will be a thing of the past as genetics takes the matter out of our hands, perhaps sooner than we think with scientific intervention.

Thoughts

I recently joined a gym and now feel that the phrase 'appearances can be deceptive' holds true, especially in the areas of locker rooms and showers. Those dark and hirsute gentlemen of swarthy middle Eastern appearance seem to have conspicuously long foreskins, whilst the blue eyed, freckled 'Celts' have surgically pared genitalia with prominent glans proudly on show.

Amongst my late mother's personal effects I found a solid silver acorn. I now wear this on a chain round my neck.

A Geography of Circumcision

Anyone who has travelled the world and visited saunas, swimming pools or gym showers has certainly noticed differences in the rates of circumcision, going from nearly 100% cut in the USA to 100% uncut in Eastern Europe, through roughly half and half places like Montreal. The countries of Western Europe though are very much more difficult to categorise. While a big majority of men are uncut, there is a significant proportion of circumcised men, which would seem to vary greatly, not only from one country to another, but also between different areas in various countries, and possibly between different classes and age groups.

To take France for example, there seems to be a much higher rate of circumcision in Paris than the rest of the country. I have been a member of several swimming and waterpolo clubs in Paris and one in Nancy. In Paris, there have always been cut men in the club, something like one in five. In Nancy however, of the thirty or so members I saw nude, not one was cut. Whenever I've been in Lyon, on the other hand, I've always seen a good number of cut men, as many as in Paris, but of course my sample is very biased – two or three cut men out of a dozen sightings each time. I am told there are more cut men in the south of France on the Cote d'azur. During European swimming championships, there is a chance to see members of other European teams under the showers, and there too are always cut men, especially among Belgian, German and Swiss swimmers, but in insufficient numbers to make any generalisation, except that the French proportions are probably common to neighbouring countries. There has been mention made in Chuck Thompson's newsletter of a relatively high proportion in Spain, but there are too few Spanish contestants at these competitions to gain any idea of this.

Age can be a determining factor too, as it is very clearly in Britain, though it is difficult to see just how. One of Chuck Thompson's correspondents in Germany reported that German national service intakes have 8% circumcised men joining the forces for national service, but casual observation in Gyms show a higher percentage, suggesting that a significant number of men are circumcised as adults. This could be the case in France too.

What people estimate to be the percentage varies too, especially as no-one really has access to a representative section of the male population. Whenever I get the opportunity I ask men what they think the percentage is, and the answer is often biased in favour of the status of the respondent, so uncut men think the percentage is very small, and cut men much larger. The most extreme case was a cut man from Brittany, who said he thought it was about fifty-fifty, though anyone walking along any Breton naturist beach would be hard pressed to find more than 10%. I've also asked the question to members of the swimming club, and the uncut members often fail to notice who is cut, perhaps because cut men cover up more than uncut. Perhaps as they are in a minority, cut men tend to be more observant, and note who else is cut in a given group. It's quite common to hear from men who had a hangup about being cut until they did their military service and found that they weren't the only one in the dormitory. I've heard from several sources that career military men are more often cut than not.

Can anyone contribute to a more accurate geography of circumcision rates in Europe?

J.H. – Paris

Size

A part from being somewhat obsessed during my boarding school days of being a cavalier and in a distinct minority in a world of roundheads, I have always been conscious of my small cock size – pushing 5" in length erect and with a base circumference of about 4.5" (perhaps it's time to have a size survey again and I can claim the smallest dimensions award). [From what I get from other members you wouldn't win by a long way. – D.A.]

My flaccid size doesn't generally worry me too much, as I see other guys in the locker rooms or showers with reasonably comparable cocks and, in any case, as soon as it gets warm it expands slightly (as I notice with others, too), and when I skin back to wash also helps.

However, the question of girth was brought home to me the other day when I bought a rubber sex aid, meant to fit around the base of the cock. It's much too large for me! When, many years ago, I used condoms (we've now resorted to other birth control methods) they were often fairly loose fitting, and I wonder whether such items shouldn't be made in different sizes. I know that cock size is a sensitive issue, but to me the criterion is how stiff it is and not the length or girth, and I've not had any complaints about my bedroom size!

The other thing I've been aware of is hairiness. Again, I would associate a macho image of a guy with a large roundheaded cock and hairy chest. I have always had some hair around the nipples, but have noticed in recent years, of late 40's and early 50's, that this has spread to an area between the nipples, albeit with a light covering, but still looking better than a completely smooth chest. More recently, I've noticed that my pubic hairs are starting to whiten, but only those on my ballbag directly under my cock.

I'm pleased up till now that I've decided to remain a cavalier and extra lubrication during sex (KY jelly or Boots baby oil) has improved a sore foreskin and sex in general immeasurably. I often think I would feel quite naked without a foreskin to play with, or have fondled, and it does add an extra dimension to sex, as well as being quite acceptable these days, unlike my schooldays of 35 or so years ago.

My knob now shows a faint difference in colour on the top third where I have managed to keep it exposed. Whereas I would prefer to be able to keep the skin back all the way if I wished, this is not possible because of a long and loose foreskin and small knob – but it's next best and is comfortable, and it means I don't have to pull the skin back to pee (question: do cavaliers generally retract their foreskins to pee? I never look, so I don't know!)

These ramblings may be of interest to others and possibly generate some comment or discussion.

Eat Your Cornflakes

In conversation, I was presented with a reworking of a quip about a person who had been accidentally locked in a synagogue overnight. Rescued the next afternoon, he was asked how he fared. "I found a silver dish on the table but didn't like the cornflakes!" The comic idea of a foreskin bowl being mistaken for cornflakes has a curious connection with that breakfast cereal.

John Harvey Kellogg made much money in the America of the 1880's writing books condemning masturbation, and describing 'diseases' attributed to it. He produced cornflakes and advocated circumcision as a cure!! At that time in America only 10% of males were circumcised, so the circumcision of infants was suggested to prevent masturbation rather than cure it. Just as one can conjure images in smoke coiling from an open fire, I can almost sense the 3,500 American infants circumcised each day in my bowl of cereal, with one flake symbolical of my own long lost foreskin.

The cornflake imagery is only relevant in Britain with very small helpings! I had calculated that the total UK circumcision rate amounted to 80 operations each day (or 8.6%). Recent NHS figures have made that earlier figure short of the mark. The total number of hospital boyhood circumcisions were 30,750 for 1985, and 36,000 this year. (In 1985 the NHS paid £390 for each circumcision, the cost rising to £694 in 1997).

Adding the ritual component of 10,000 circumcisions each year, 1,700 Jewish, and 8,300 Moslem, with a 350,000 male birthrate, the current overall circumcision rate is 13.1%. That's nearly one in seven which certainly confounds the 1% (or low) figure quoted in contemporary literature.

It looks as if the embarrassing curiosity of a solitary circumcised boy in an otherwise intact class of 30 or so has come to an end. The realistic component of 2 or 3 roundheads in a class seems possible now – thanks not to crank moral ideals or parental preference, but mainly to illogical thinking and wrong diagnosis by the medical profession, mainly of fictitious phimosis.

Smooth, Nude and Cut — The Perfect Combination

Foolish indeed was the first person who said about the male genitals, “If you’ve seen one, you’ve seen them all”. Nothing could be further from the truth. Our male sex organs are as different from each other’s as women’s breasts or any of our faces. They are all part of our personalities and make-up – and to be hairless in nude surroundings lets all those present see without hindrance the full value of our different types and styles with glorious openness. Those special additions to our personalities are enriched and made even more interesting when the owner also has a fully circumcised cock for all to see.

As the Organiser and original conceiver of the group for “Smooth and Cut Naturists” (S&CN), I feel I must respond to various points made by your contributor Doreen Chase in her article ‘Woman and Hair’ (5/97). I am, like she says she is, a regular contributor (of Feature articles) to the naturist magazine H & E, and have many contacts in the world of naturism, most of whom have views which concur with my own.

Ms Chase, in her article, makes some factual errors and unsupportable suppositions about the unquestionable preference of many women and men who increasingly like to remove their body hair – especially pubic hair and underarm hair – and who like to be (or like their male partners to be) fully circumcised also.

Almost every recently pubescent teenager questions why they start to grow body hair between their legs and under their arms. Then they find out the simple truth: it is nature’s way, rather crudely by modern standards, of providing lubrication at friction spots on the body. Of course, reproduction being nature’s most important bodily function, one must assume the mating act between the male and female to be a fairly frequent occurrence and, with the essential, sometimes vigorous, rubbing together of the genitals and pubic regions, to be a place where lubrication is essential. With modern lubricants, oils and natural secretions, this crude ‘hair lubricant’ may now be considered obsolete. What pubic hair is definitely not, as Ms Chase incorrectly states, is for ‘modesty’ reasons to cover the vaginal opening. On the contrary, nature does not recognise modesty and, given a free hand, would obviously encourage the opening to be displayed fully in order to attract the male and increase the chance of penetration, fertilisation and procreation. Forget your ‘covering the Venus flytrap’ nonsense, Ms Chase, body hair is for lubrication and warmth.

Body hair removal, from both the female and the male, is the modern way for anyone – especially naturists/nudists – to present their bodies in the cleanest best looking way. Without doubt, there can be unquestionable enjoyment in seeing skin (the largest organ of our body) which has an overall tan possessed by someone who takes pride in depilating regularly. The openness this brings – highlighted if the male is also circumcised – engenders friendliness and confidence from the owner, especially in a socially nude environment. Shaving the body can be just as much part of the daily routine as the accepted practice of women putting on make-up to beautify themselves. Our whole bodies are wonderful things – we should display them in the best way for others to see and enjoy by means of hair removal. Who can deny the beauty of the male or female body, unimpaired by ugly body hair, with the fully displayed sex organs available for all to see and admire? Come on – admit it – we all (men and women alike) take interest in the wide variety of sex organs which we all possess and which are normally, as society unfortunately dictates, not able to be seen. The genitals are as individual as our faces – and they are not covered up.

As Ms Chase concedes, many letters to H & E support circumcision (not all are from members of S&CN either), but she is wrong in concluding that the number of pictures of circumcised men in the magazine is directed at the American market. All pictures are chosen on overall merit – I should know as I regularly contribute photographs to the magazine also.

Why should it be a “deplorable fact that some men choose to walk about on a naturist beach with their foreskins retracted”? Good heavens, we are all individuals with freedom of choice, so why shouldn’t we do as we wish? Most of these guys would probably wish to be circumcised in order, amongst other advantages, to show their attractive glans rather than hide it under an elephant’s trunk of ugly foreskin they probably possess. Good luck to them, and how much nicer for the rest of us to see – but why not make it permanent and be circumcised? And what is this load of garbage about UV rays, thorn bushes and rough towels? We cut men take care of ourselves and, thanks to clever body design, suffer none of these alleged drawbacks and can fully empathise with the self-circumciser whom Ms Chase mentions. He should be applauded for the courage and conviction he shows, and not castigated or recommended for psychiatric help as Doreen Chase states. Ms Chase (assuming you are a ‘real’ person), you are entitled to your views like the rest of us, but your accusations such as these are unwelcome, unhelpful and unjustified.

I originally conceived the idea for a mixed group of naturists who were both smooth (pubically at least – hopefully more) with the male members also being circumcised, towards the end of 1996 and have since been amazed and encouraged by the keenness of qualifying naturists to take up membership. Of all the initial inquiries for information made to our box number, well over 50% have resulted in membership. The interest shown has largely been as a result of the article and advert featured in previous issues of this magazine as well as other journals relating to naturism. Such has been the enthusiasm for membership (which is free) that S&CN not only is progressing in terms of numbers, but is vibrant with ideas from those members who meet in a socially nude environment from time to time. S&CN is a club for members to get to know each other and to talk openly and ‘compare notes’ with other members who share a mutual interest in being smooth and circumcised. It is not a correspondence club.

We should very much like to hear from men and women over 18 who are pubically smooth (at least) and happy about being nude in a socially nude environment. The men MUST also be circumcised. Interested? Send a first class stamp or large SAE for a free information pack to SCN, PO Box 164, Northwood, Middx, HA6 2QR.

Circumcision — An Englishman's Experience

I was circumcised – very tightly – as an infant in the early 1960's. To this day I do not know precisely why, but my mother used to talk about cleanliness. Was it assumed that I was born with a dirty streak?

I very quickly understood what it meant to be circumcised and that, as a pure Englishman, I was among a very small minority. I have never been afraid to be different in most respects, but for some reason being 'cut' bothered me from about the age of eight. At junior school, I would often go to the toilet at break time with a friend who lived just a few doors away. As we stood in front of the urinal, I could not help noticing his very elongated foreskin and feeling extremely envious of him. With hindsight, I reckoned that my mother must have experienced some guilt over the operation, because she once asked me whether a classmate of mine with whom I had attended swimming lessons during an Easter holiday had been circumcised. In the most matter-of-fact manner I could muster, I replied that he had not, although I cannot deny the emotional discomfort which I felt at having to discuss such a sensitive subject.

At secondary school, insult was added to injury at what seemed like every opportunity. The fascination of the average 11-year old male with the shape of his classmates' penises seems innate and deep-seated, and to my mind does not imply homosexual tendencies. Communal use of toilets and showers on a daily basis soon enabled the class to memorise who was intact and who was not. "You've been circumcised", one such boy was quick to point out whilst standing next to me at the urinal. "You couldn't pee properly when you were young" said another. Something told me that it wasn't worth complaining to a teacher about this type of bluntness: even if I could overcome my embarrassment, what would be done about it? Indeed, just a few months later, the subject of circumcision was discussed very openly in a religious education class. The female teacher had the gall to ask who in the class had been circumcised – in a school where uniformity and conformity were everything, and respecting individual differences was seen as a weakness! I could see eyes looking in my direction, feel fingers pointing towards me. I just sat tight. Not for a million pounds would I put my hand up. Before anyone could mention my name – and many would have not hesitated to do this – a classmate saved the day by owning up to being ‘cut’. How I longed to move to a mixed-sex multi-faith school.

It was nearly a quarter of a century after these incidents before I could do anything about my unwanted state, but that’s not to say that my grief for my lost foreskin went away in the interim. If anything it intensified. “What you never had, you don’t miss” is a principle that definitely does not apply to the foreskin. I had to wait until long after I had left my parents’ home before addressing the issue constructively. The turning point was a chance reading of the article on circumcision in Maxim of April 1996. By this time I was rapidly approaching middle age. I just had to jump on the restoration bandwagon before it was too late.

I bought some 2.5cm wide zinc oxide plaster tape from Boots, cut a strip 17cm long, folded the ends over to make it double sided, stuck one side firmly down on my glans, pulled as much shaft skin as possible over it, and pressed it firmly over the other side of the tape. I know that one should try to avoid tape making direct contact with the glans, but mine had become so insensitive with advancing years that I suffer no ill effects. I have been doing this every morning for nearly a year, and the end result is a very natural-looking foreskin. The tape is sufficiently invisible to pass unnoticed in public urinals and showers, and sloughs off during the night as a result of erections during sleep, thus allowing for washing in the morning shower. This process does generate a certain amount of post-urination dribbling, but that is a small price to pay for having a glans that is three-quarters covered. I have also tried taping skin over a Boots medium-flow bottle teat, as recommended in the Winter 1996/7 issue of Norm News, but find it impossible to urinate in a straight line no matter how much I trim the hole in the end of the teat.

My process will undoubtedly take a long time, but it is well worthwhile. I look forward to the day when my new ‘foreskin’ stays in place without the assistance of tape. May it come before I start acquiring grey hairs. And may I thank NORMUK, P.O. Box 71, Stone, Staffs, ST15 OSF, for their support during my labours.

Editorial

Another milestone has been reached. We are now on the Internet and can be reached by E-mail at acornsoc@aol.com, so I hope it makes it easier for some to write in material or even just to be chatty.

Since mentioning the magazine Foreskin Quarterly in last edition's editorial, I've been inundated with requests as to where it might be obtained. It is:

S.P.B. Distribution
F2, 28 Carlton Road
Bournemouth
BH1 3TG
Email: 100675.1545@compuserve.com

Last time I was in touch each edition was £8.99 and they had plenty of back copies. Just ask for their order form and everything will be revealed.

I've been asked to make a plea. If you get an answer to a contact corner ad, please answer it even if it's in the negative. Otherwise the writer doesn't know if it reached you and wonders who might have got hold of it.

I Love It Now

I was stunned to hear of the existence of The Acorn Society (how come I'd never heard of it before?) and almost beside myself with excitement when all eight copies of 1997 landed on my doormat. I read them cover to cover in sequence with both an actual and figurative raging hard-on. Everything that I've thought, felt and fantasised about, for as long as I can remember, was touched upon at some point, and I could have wept for joy.

I was circumcised at the age of three and it traumatised me for years and years. I have the most vivid memories of sitting in the bath, post op, fiddling with the plaster around my tiny dick, waiting for it to soak off. Curiously though, I have no memories, from only days prior to that, of what I looked like with a foreskin, and my little brother's dick was now my only point of reference as to what had fundamentally changed about me. I was certainly puzzled by this development, but like all small children I just accepted what had happened to me and adapted to my new situation. As I grew older, however, I got more opportunities to look at other boys' dicks. Firstly in games of "I'll show you mine if you'll show me yours", and then in school changing room situations, and it soon became apparent that I was the only person in the world who looked the way I did. In retrospect, it amazes me that I, alone out of all my friends and school colleagues, should have been the only 'roundhead', but I was, and consequently other boys used to point and laugh. Things weren't much better at home. My dad joked about it a couple of times, and I once heard my mum tell my sister that I'd had half of my willy cut off. My parents' comments soon led me to conclude that my dad, like my brother, was not circumcised, meaning that I was the only one in the family that had been done, and ergo, it must have been done as a punishment.

I also remember, in my early teens, experimentally wrapping various types of paper and material around the end of my dick to (a) see what a foreskin would look like on me, and (b) ascertain whether any of these materials could actually pass for 'real' in a changing room situation. But needless to say I never tried any of them out publicly. It's really no wonder that, for years, I felt like a freak, skipped games at school as often as possible to avoid being naked in front of people, and felt only deep depression about the state of my dick, and it was at this time that my obsession with cut dicks developed.

A few years later I came to the realisation that I was gay and started buying gay porn where, thank God, there were many images of circumcised men, probably because much of the porn was American. So I now knew that I wasn't alone, and rather than dip my toe in the water of my newly realised sexuality I dived straight in to swim out and meet all these guys who were just like me. Shock number one was that, again, most of the men I met, and had sex with, had foreskins, including those I developed longer term relationships with, and shock number two continues to annoy me still. A lot of foreskinned guys are really dismissive of a circumcised dick because they have never taken the trouble to figure out how it 'works'. In my experience, very few will think to apply direct stimulation to my knob, the only way I can be brought to orgasm, and fewer still will think to apply any lubricant. I've had conversations with gay friends who have admitted that their heart sinks if they get a man home and he is circumcised, because they don't know what to do with 'it'. I find this situation very depressing, and in an effort to increase my chances of meeting cut men I now visit gay saunas where I can see what I am getting and, yes, the quality of my sex life has improved, and not only because cut guys know how to work a cut dick. The visual aspect of sex has always been very important to me, and I just get very turned on by the sight of a circumcised dick. I realise that there is a lot more to my life than being gay, and a lot more to being gay than the type of sex I have, but, as some of your readers will appreciate, I am tired of wanting one thing and having to settle for something else.

In the last year or so I have really come to terms with being circumcised, which I think has a lot to do with the public nudity of the sauna environment. I love showing off my cut dick in the showers. Completely flaccid it isn't exactly a showstopper, and even half cocked it's only of average length and girth, but my bell end swells to quite a size, almost out of all proportion to the rest of it, which always draws glances and comments (of course I now realise why I was given the op in the first place). The skin on my shaft moves easily back and forth, but there is no way I can pull any of it over my knob, and my scar is a noticeable uneven brown line 2cm in some places, and only a  $1\frac{1}{2}$ cm in others, from the ridge. There are also a few lumps and bumps of skin, mainly on the underside, and I realise from reading Acorn that this is generally not judged as attractive, but I think it gives quite a rugged appearance.

It's taken me many, many years, but I can finally and honestly say that I am very glad I was circumcised at a very young age (and perhaps only a circumcised friend or two during my school years would have helped to banish my sense of freakishness during my adolescence). I am happy with its look, feel and performance and, incidentally, it has got increasingly sensitive as my embarrassment about it has diminished. My obsession/fetish for cut dicks continues unabated (see my ad in Contact Corner), and it has deepened immeasurably since discovering this publication. I'm determined to attend the imminent Spring Meeting, mainly to meet everyone, but also because I am desperate for someone to point out my meatus, frenulum and sulcus (the idea of getting an inspection appeals to me). I think I've figured out what my corona is, and that I've got a fully exposed glans with a tight cut, but some of the language you use puzzles me still.

I'd like to thank you all for this opportunity to finally 'speak' to someone about all this, and many thanks for Acorn. Keep up the good work!

Photography

Some members may be interested in a recently published book called Naked New York by Greg Friedler, published by Bloomsbury at £12.99, ISBN 0 7475 3326 1. This comprises 72 photographs, 37 male and 35 female. A page is devoted to each person with two 3.75" x 4.75" photos of each, one in normal clothes and one naked. Males range from 19 to 75 years and females from 19 to 46, with the majority of the females under 30. 27 of the males were circumcised, 8 uncircumcised, 1 uncertain and one hidden. I make that 77% circumcised, which is perhaps a little less than might have been expected, but obviously a lot more than a similar exercise in London would be likely to show. A few of the males were depilated but none of the females, although some trimming is in evidence. The book is in black and white only, but none the worse for that.

Dilemma

I am a 45-year-old bi-sexual with a substantial and loose (after years of manipulation) foreskin, often worn retracted, because I have several cockhead piercings – and the aesthetic value is reduced when the foreskin is pulled forward.

However, I move in rather conventional circles (most of the time), and reluctantly remove my jewellery on these occasions, replacing it as soon as I get home.

So sometimes, when peeing, I have to pull my foreskin forward to avoid spraying like a showerhead. The temptation is to change my social habits, go for broke, get circumcised, and have to wear my jewellery permanently (a sexy idea), or should I keep my foreskin intact, or even have it modified or pierced.

I would like to correspond with anyone who shares this quandary, and with anyone who appreciates genital piercing and tattooing (contact with experienced and skilled genital tattooists would be helpful).

Finally, (and briefly at this stage), I would like to express my strong opinion that any form of physical modification should only be practiced by, and upon, consenting adults. The only reason to operate on a child should be a medical one. I find religious and superstitious practices (such as circumcision and piercing), especially on young children, abhorrent, and an infringement of basic human rights.

Two Balls Too Many

A judge in Kuala Lumpur, sentencing the woman to one day's imprisonment, said "Just because a prostitute disapproves of a client's genital ornamentation, that is no excuse for beating him into unconsciousness with a broom."

The Singapore Straits Times report goes on to reveal that, like many Malaysian men, the plaintiff had two small ball bearings inserted into his penis to heighten sexual pleasure.

The court heard that the sight of the man's penis with its gleaming, highly polished balls had so disgusted the prostitute that she screamed, seized a broom and began clubbing the man, breaking his left forearm.

"This annoyed me, so I reminded her about her promise of total satisfaction, and asked for my money back," he said. "That must have been when she struck me across the skull. I awoke next morning in a hospital bed. I have still not had a refund. It is disgusting," he wailed.

And you thought it tough when your local naturist club threw you out for having a few rings too many.

Statistics And Cornflakes

I was surprised to read Anthony's assessment of the circumcision rate in Britain today. His figure of 1 in 7 is what I and many others have estimated from observations made over the years. His other figure of 13.1% is, of course, somewhat lower than fact because he fails to account for the number of medical circumcisions performed outside of NHS hospitals both in infancy and more especially at, or soon after, puberty. There are no statistics kept for these operations but when they are added in it is likely to put the true circumcision rate in Britain close to 14%.

I would be very pleased to learn exactly which official statistics publication gives current British circumcision rates and their cost to the NHS. Since Anthony has never been one to write to Acorn in favour of circumcision I can see no reason to doubt his figures which certainly disprove the wildly inaccurate claims of the American anti-circ fanatics that less than 1% of British and European men are being circumcised.

The claim in his article with which I must take issue is that the Kellogg who invented cornflakes and the one who publicly advocated circumcision were one and the same. I cannot now find the original references, but it is widely known that the two men were brothers who didn't always see eye to eye with one another. One, a doctor, advocated circumcision (as did most of his contemporaries) as a preventative for masturbation – which society of the time saw as a great evil. His brother, a grain merchant, invented corn flakes in the hope that, being more attractive for breakfast than the usual grits/gruel/porridge of the time, boys would want to get out of bed for them in the mornings and thus avoid the temptation to lie there and masturbate.

Finally, Anthony once again misrepresents the medical profession in his last paragraph. Circumcision as a cure for the very distressing and sexually debilitating conditions of phimosis and paraphimosis is not illogical but very sound medicine proven over thousands of years of practice. Phimosis is certainly not fictitious to those who suffer from it. The embarrassment, pain and, in many cases, eventual need for a circumcision anyway, engendered in a young boy by the so called alternative treatment of manually stretching the foreskin is the true child abuse.

Penis Types

The initial comment is reference Issue 8/96 and the drawings of the cut/uncut penis. In a subsequent issue there were some comments on the drawings. As with most things, there are many variations. The uncut penis drawing is one example of how one may appear. Other variations include:- a) foreskin which overhangs the end of the penis and tapers off to a small tube; b) cases where the coronal ridge is not visible under the foreskin – the entire penis may appear as a straight tube with no apparent ridges; c) where the opening at the end of the foreskin is off to one side and not dead centre; d) where the skin is quite excessive and appears as very wrinkled.

The cut penis may also be seen in many variations:- a) depending on how the circ was done, the skin may still cover the coronal groove or even part of the glans; b) the cut may be higher on the shaft to fully expose the groove with no excess skin and a smooth appearance. It would seem that most American circs are done in this style; c) the scar may be darker or lighter than the skin; d) the scar may be symmetrical or rough and uneven; e) there may be evidence of where stitches were used, depending on the type of circ done; f) there may be a few ripples of skin when flaccid, as in the drawing; g) there may or may not be a frenulum left after the circ; h) the glans may have a slight bend or twist to the left or right.

This brings to mind that there appear to be identified three types to the glans or head. They are either of the bottle type, blunt type or prow type. When being identified to a particular group, doctors would take into consideration the angle that the glans curves up from underneath to the top of the penis, the presence or absence of a very defined coronal ridge – some have quite an extended or high ridge, while others quietly roll over to join the penis shaft. Also, the length of the glans is taken into consideration. Some are small caps, while others can extend to a fuller distance. Variations also exist between their flaccid and erect appearance.

And an update from Canada.

As a bit of information, it seems that clothing catalogues which model underwear and also underwear/swimgear catalogues here are now quite free in what is being shown. In the last four that I have seen it is apparent that all models are cut, as the glans and coronal ridges are plainly visible through the cloth. What is the situation there? Are printers just as free? Do you have mail order clothing/underwear catalogues? If you do have such firms, can you please forward their addresses to me?

National magazines have recently published articles regarding a new topical cream which is to be applied to the infant penis prior to the circ, so that pain is lessened. Several studies have positively confirmed its effectiveness. It seems that circ is certainly very alive and well in America. As well, the Mogen clamp can now take care of the procedure in a matter of just minutes or less.

A recent article in a European published magazine indicated that Muslims and Jews were the only ones that routinely circumcised their males. Yet they also published a photo of Antonio Banderas – clearly fully cut. I think they need to read about the styles and customs in America.

While I continue my urological research on the subject, it is very interesting to note that there is so much interest there, and definite attitudes towards the cut/uncut situation. Even if the subject is cut, there is definite discussion on how the circ was done, its pros and cons. Aesthetics are also very important to most people. Hospitals here still circ very often. The doctor will make the rounds on given days and take care of things in very short order – usually with the Plastibell, Gomco Clamp or Mogen Clamp (preferred by mohels).

As a final note for now, I found it very interesting to see that magazines published in England freely advertise cosmetic surgery clinics – and circumcision is always listed as one of the procedures available there. Has anyone looked into this – is it a common procedure there... what procedure is utilised for adults... what is the cost... being cosmetic surgery in some cases, can the patient specify how much skin they wish to have removed?

A Complaint

Enclosed is my renewal for my membership of the Acorn Society. I wasn't going to renew it after writing a number of letters to the magazine which were never published, having read a request for more letters to be sent in by members. And one more thing, some of the letters regarding circumcision more or less have had negative undertones regarding Islam by so-called educated people.

I do really enjoy being a member of the Acorn Society, which I joined in 1990 when I lived in Dundee. The Acorn Society still do a good job in supporting circumcision in a society that is getting more and more anti-circumcision, thanks to the medical profession who is not Muslim or Jewish.

What can I say that hasn't been said before in the defence of circumcision? Perhaps if more of the Uncut brigade practiced more personal hygiene there will be less germs and cases having to go to the doctors. Personally speaking, from an artistic point of view, I find the foreskin very attractive to look at and admire, and even erotic.

I do not expect this letter to be published, so keep up the good work and more power to your arm, and, as mentioned, I do still enjoy being a member of the Acorn Society, but why all this anti-Islamic feeling?

Yahya Ahmed N.I.M. Lamont – Manchester

[There, Ahmed, your letter in its entirety. I presume the negative undertones you refer to are the stories of forcible circumcisions by Moslems on their prisoners over the centuries. This, I'm afraid, is fact and not anyone's opinion.

Your last letter but one was published in 3/96. I didn't publish your last letter because it was all about religion and conversion to Islam. In the joining questionnaire, I ask for religion just for statistics. By far the majority say 'none', the next highest is 'atheist', and one went so far as to say "Religion. Not likely, they kill". So I took it that it wouldn't be very popular.

That said, the next item came from the Internet and may be of interest to you. — D.A.]

A Moslem Circumcision

My wife's family is from an Islamic country where all men are circumcised. Therefore, before my marriage, I had agreed to let myself be circumcised. After the marriage I still agreed but hadn't the nerve to go to a doctor to ask for it. Finally, I told my wife that I would have it done but that I hadn't the nerve to go to the doctor, and asked her to arrange it.

A few weeks later, we had an invitation from my wife's parents to visit, and just before leaving my wife told me to take a shower as I should be clean for my circumcision party. This was a situation with no way out. The family was waiting. All were informed – me, the last. I asked her for the name of the circumciser, the so-called Sunnetci. When I heard his name I was a little bit less nervous, because I had met him earlier when I was attending the circumcisions of the sons of my brother-in-law. I knew him as a professional, and saw that for the boys it was not a big deal. I was aware that he never uses anaesthetics because his opinion is that these can destroy some nerves, and lost sensitivity can result. I have no idea whether this has a scientific base.

When we arrived we were welcomed by the Sunnetci and directly guided to a separate room. First he gave me a sedative (a high dose of valium) to calm me down. I was instructed to take off all my trousers but keep my shirts on, and place myself on a prepared mixture of deck-chair and couch covered by white linens. Cushions were hidden under the linens to bring me in the right position and to expose the parts of interest to optimum access. I was surprised how perfect everything was arranged.

He started to examine my prepuce, moving it forwards and backwards resulting in an erection. He told me that with an erection the skin to be removed could be much better estimated than when in a flaccid state. He explained that he would do it in the traditional way and would remove the frenulum after cutting off the foreskin. The normal cut, he told me, would cause only little pain, but the excision of the frenulum might hurt a little bit more. The traditional method is to pull the skin tightly forwards over the glans, fix it with a clamp, and then cut it along the clamp. The result is that most of the mucosa is kept and the scar at the outer skin will be later exactly at the corona in flaccid state with the movable mucosa left. Then he swept a disinfectant fluid over the complete area including scrotum and belly. He called for assistance and my brothers-in-law came quickly and fixed my arms and legs, pressing them down. Simultaneously, the big door to the neighbouring room was opened. This was a surprise for me because I thought it would be done in this separated room.

Outside, the whole family was waiting, my parents and grandparents-in-law, another brother-in-law and the sisters of my wife. The Sunnetci saw my surprise but told me that it had to be done as with all other family members. However, in my case, the small uncircumcised boys and all the girls were excluded.

I felt as he grasped my foreskin, drew it forward and clamped it. He spoke a prayer. I couldn't see what was going on. I heard applause from the family members and then I felt the pain like a cut in the finger. When the knife was swept along the clamp and the foreskin was off and shown to the family, they all applauded. I had some delay in noticing the pain, but immediately the Sunnetci blew a cooling spray on the cut. The clamp was taken off. With some more cooling spray, he excised the frenulum, and this hurt. He sutured the cut with eight stitches. Normally he leaves the cut without sewing. He told me that he stitched only because of the cut frenulum. The doors in the meantime were closed again. He covered the wound with some layers of gauze. At that time already all the pain had vanished.

After about half an hour I dressed again and went to my circumcision fest. I was really proud to have had it done, and my family looks on me as a hero because they had always told my wife that I would never do it. I did it – with the help of my wife. I love her. This was 12 years ago and I do not regret being circumcised.

Last year I met the Sunnetci (he lives near the western border of Germany) again, and he told me that now he performs at big annual circumcision fests, where on one day up to 200 adults and boys are circumcised. It is during the autumn or Xmas vacation time. The boys are mostly between 4 and 9, but also adults are circumcised on the stage in this big fest with some hundred guests in a hall. The boys are circumcised in public on the stage, waiting in a queue, but the adults can choose to be operated on in a separate room with or without family members.

Unknown – Internet

This is an account by a German of his Muslim/Turkish circumcision. As a matter of curiosity, it seems unusual that he also had his frenulum excised, since I understood that this is not normally done during Muslim circumcision. Can any reader enlighten us on this topic?

Hindus Sue Hospital Over Circumcision

A Hindu man and his wife from India have sued East Alabama Medical Centre for malpractice, claiming their infant son was circumcised against their wishes and counter to their religious practices and beliefs. The circumcision will cause them embarrassment and humiliation when they return to their native country and might affect their son's ability to marry within his faith. The hospital action "violates the acceptable standard of care" at the hospital and caused emotional and mental anguish to the child and his parents, the lawsuit states.

The couple are seeking unspecified damages, although a claim filed against the hospital last year requested compensation of just under a million dollars.

According to the court file, the day after Mrs Punna's son was born, she signed a release allowing hospital personnel to perform a circumcision and a Hepatitis B test. She knew little English and her husband interpreted for her in conversations with hospital personnel. The hospital violated its own policy by apparently not using AT&T Language Line service that provides interpreters.

The hospital denies the allegations, stating in court documents that “it exercised reasonable care, skill and diligence in all aspects of the care and treatment” of the infant. The hospital claims that there was contributory negligence that prevents the Punnas from recovering any damages.

Bharat was born Sept. 6th 1995. The circumcision was performed the next day. The lawsuit was filed in May. According to a Dec 20th letter from their lawyer to the hospital administrator, Mrs Punna signed the release forms “not being aware of what she had signed. Hospital personnel failed to ensure what she was signing when she signed the release. Therefore this release was not an informed, willing or voluntary consent.” Mr. Punna, an Auburn university student, had spoken to several nurses and other hospital personnel expressing his wish not to have circumcision performed on his son.

The Punnas are citizens of the Indian area of Hyderabad, which is inhabited mostly by Hindus. Hindus deeply oppose circumcision, which is a distinction between Hindus and Moslems in their native culture. When the family returns to India they “will suffer further public humiliation, ridicule and emotional distress.”

Wasted Space

Too much space is wasted in the newsletter by replies from members who are under the impression that the letters from women are genuine. Let's get three things straight. First, the Society has only one female member, and the letters don't come from her. Second, it is unlikely in the extreme that so many wives and girlfriends would know about the newsletter and, even if they did, want to write to it. Third, and most important, it doesn't take Dr Anthony Clare to tell you that the phoney letters use exclusively masculine terminology. I've nothing against members indulging their fancies in this way but, for the benefit of new recruits, these letters should be appended with words to the effect of 'This is probably a fantasy' and, better still, a comment from someone qualified to analyse the fantasy.

Girls Find Out

My husband thinks I ought to share a memory with your readers, particularly the female ones. Can you remember when you first came across a hard adult-sized cock, and how it impressed you? It is still a vivid memory to me.

Like many girls, I was always interested in babies and used often to get to look after them and play with them. So I was aware of the difference between little boys and girls at an early age. It was fun to hold the little boys' cocks when they wee'd. I don't recall any of them getting hard. I remember being surprised to see my first circumcised one. Up to then I hadn't realised there was a knob inside the end. I didn't like to ask about it at the time (I was about 8), but later remembered it and put two and two together.

When I went to secondary school I got a new friend, Sally, and we spent all our time together. We were both intrigued about sex though we weren't particularly precocious. I was an only child and had never seen my dad naked, so apart from babies, I didn't know anything about cocks. She had a brother two years younger, but she hadn't seen him erect, so we weren't at all clear how things were meant to work. Our knowledge of the mechanics of sex was rather patchy anyway, to say the least.

In due course there were necking parties and long kissing sessions, but it was all really very innocent. Sometimes the boys would quickly hold your breast, but underneath their bravado they were as shy as we were (this was the early seventies). You were meant to push their hands away if they 'went too far'. I got an occasional impression of adult male equipment from a statue or classical painting (which tend to be rather moderately endowed, don't you think?), but I still hadn't managed to see any actual live examples of what men had between their legs; what made those funny little shapes in their trousers.

Somehow we picked up the idea that sex involved insertion, but this still didn't square with Sally's talk of her brother's dangle thing, and what you could see from men's bathing costumes. I don't remember at that time ever feeling a hard cock being pressed at me through a boy's clothes while we were necking. So we just didn't know that there was such a thing as an erect penis.

Enlightenment finally came when we were fifteen, one summer weekend when we went to stay with her gran. There was a new boy we hadn't met before, about a year younger than us, living a few houses away. He was attractive, medium height, friendly but seemed very innocent, and soon we were teasing him. That night Sally and I were talking about sex and boys as usual, and the subject came round to him and we planned to get him to show us his cock. The next day we found him and wandered down to some long grass and lay down. Sally got round to the subject fairly quickly, and next thing slid her hand up his shorts. There was a lot of squirming and giggling and he got her hand out. Then I wanted to, and he wouldn't let me, but the two of us were too strong for him and we pulled his shorts off.

We got him to calm down and let us inspect him. For some reason I hadn't expected him to have pubic hair even though I had some myself. His cock was bigger than I had expected even though it was soft. He was very tense and ticklish to start with, but we insisted on touching it and he didn't really resist. Pretty soon he began to relax, and then it started to move and swell. That really got us interested, how it was changing in front of our eyes and responded to being touched. Soon he was lying back and his cock was fully extended like a twitching pink stick. How weird! I hadn't known what to expect, but this! He must be a freak. Surely men didn't normally have a growth like this. Perhaps my memory is exaggerating, but I picture him about 7 ins long and reasonably thick. Anyway, he must have been pretty well fully developed.

After a bit, he pushed back his foreskin to show us his shiny red knob and make it appear and disappear. Another trick – whatever next? (We soon found out.) Of course we had to have a go with it. Then we wanted to see his balls, so he opened his legs and we had a feel of them too.

We were playing at pulling his cock down and letting it spring back. Suddenly, he said, "please squeeze it". It seemed a strange request but I did, gingerly. Was that what he wanted? He said, "hold it tight", and started thrusting into my hand. Sally wanted to do it but I wouldn't let go, so we were both holding his cock while he was thrusting up and down, with his knob sliding in and out of his foreskin. This went on for about a minute, with him alternatively slowing down and speeding up. I was mystified. By this time he was panting and we were giggling, when he suddenly said, "I can't stop it", and sperm jetted out over our hands. We dropped his cock in horror and he quickly grabbed it to finish himself off. He held it for a while and told us that was just spunk which always came. Then when he took his hand away his cock was slowly shrinking back, all wrinkly. What a business! He lay there rather self-conscious. We all wiped ourselves on the grass, then I took hold of his cock again, which felt quite different now that it was soft and damp. But he was sensitive after coming, so we let him put his shorts on and he went home.

What excitement. At night, Sally and I couldn't stop talking about it, and how it was finally obvious how insertion worked. I remember we were somewhat worried at the thought of something that size going into us. We were all a bit shy the next day when we saw him, but curiosity got the better of us and we spent most of the afternoon at the bottom of the garden, taking it in turns to wank him off, about 5 times I think. All fascinating stuff for two sex-mad girls.

We had to leave that evening and didn't come back for about a month, but we had another session then. We didn't want to try having him inside us, so it was all hand work. I don't remember how many times he came. Funnily enough, he never saw or touched our fannies or breasts. We never offered and he was too shy. Anyway, he was happy enough to let us play with him. The next time we visited he was gone and we never saw him again.

Up to then we hadn't discovered masturbating ourselves, but we did straight after. We never did it to each other, but we used to do it individually at the same time when we were in bed in the same room, exciting each other with sexual talk and fantasies. I had a large old doll with plastic limbs, and holding its leg kind of filled up my hand and was reminiscent of how he felt. It was always in my bed!

In spite of being nervous about how big and hard a cock was, it wasn't long before we got into proper sex. We used to compare notes about boys and how they were equipped and performed. We still keep in touch and you could say we have both had active sex lives, particularly in the early years. but I will never forget my amazement and excitement at my first sight and handful of an erect man-sized cock.

Measure Your Treasure

from Maxim

How long is your schlong?

Next time you get a boner, push it down until it's horizontal, and measure along the top from the base of the penis (that's from the pubic bone, not the flab covering it or the pubic hairline) to the tip. That's how the docs do it.

How does it compare?

Badly, if your yardstick's a rhino's two-foot wanger. The average human erect penis is a more modest 6 inches, and 90% of male members fall 1" either side of this. The average circumference is about 5". The longest stiffy on record is a whopping 13".

Does it matter?

Sexologists tell us the only thing that counts is what you do with what you've got. And it's certainly true that the vagina can feel stimulation only in the opening two inches. But do women find a larger knob more of a turn-on? In a survey for a women's sex mag, 90% felt penis size didn't affect their orgasm, but about the same number considered penis proportions to be 'sometimes' or 'always' important while on the job.

Can it be lengthened?

Probably. Surgery can increase both length (by at least an inch) and girth – but it's expensive, can be painful and isn't always successful. If your todger's genuinely small (under about 2" when erect) see a doctor. Don't forget, abdominal fat can conceal up to 2" of penis, so if you're on the porky side, slimming could reveal its true scale.

Clever dick facts.

A humpback whale's penis measures 10ft, an armadillo's extends one-third the length of his body, and a pig is blessed with an 18" knob shaped like a corkscrew.

Smaller dicks expand more than larger jobs. A study comparing men with limp penis lengths averaging three to four inches found the smaller organs increased by about three inches, whereas larger horns expanded by just two inches.

For every 35lbs of excess weight, an extra inch of your penis will disappear into your spare tyre.

MUSE

MUSE stands for 'medicated urethral system for erection'

It consists of a small pellet which comes in a small applicator. It is a device by which drugs can be inserted and subsequently absorbed from the urethra (the opening at the end of the penis through which urine and semen are passed) to give an erection.

It will only be available on prescription after February 1998. A factsheet on MUSE is available from:-

The Inpotence Association,
PO Box 10296,
London, SW17 7ZN

A helpline is also available on (0181) 767 7791

Dreamscape

When I was a child, usually if I was ill, I had this recurring dream. I used to hate it and would try to wake up if it came. It was always the same dream and went on for years. I have never told anyone about it until now – it was in black and white.

I am standing on a chair in a white room. I know it's me on the chair but I see it from the side. Behind me is a lady in a white diamond shaped nurse's hat and in front of me is a black man in a white coat. The dream was so vivid that even now, 40 years on, I still feel queasy remembering it. It's like opening up my soul. The man has a pair of small scissors and he is snipping bits off of my penis until it's all gone and I fall crumpled onto the chair. Then I'm standing on the chair again and it starts all over again. It happened time after time, and went on for years.

In conversation as a teenager, my mother gaily told a girlfriend of mine that she had sent me off for a little snip to stop me wetting the bed, on the advice of a coloured midwife who was dealing with her second child. I was two and had a dorsal slit with no anaesthetic. I was gobsmacked. It all suddenly came home to me.

The revelation answered so many questions that I had never even thought to ask, like why was I so different to look at than other boys. Why did I pee in such a messy way (split stream). Also an unreasonable fear of a doctor examining me on entry to the RAF, and school medical inspections.

I so much miss a penis as nature had intended it. I would love to have a long tight foreskin like D.T. of Manchester's 'passions'. He seems to have far more opportunity to indulge. I can't even find a good video of a foreskin in action. V.Q.'s circumcision video is the nearest. What a terrible waste! I hope the 'patient' is happy with the result. It looked so much better beforehand.

In the Editorial you mentioned a magazine called Foreskin Quarterly. Where can I get it? [See this editorial. – D.A.] Finally, Doreen Chase, what a sensible woman you are. Such a shame that my mother didn't share your ideal. I suppose that's the cost of ignorance – it's just that I had to pay.

The Patient Replies

At the recent AGM David gave me a chance to see the previous article prior to publication. I don't know why Anon puts inverted commas around 'patient' as if he believed that I was unwillingly circumcised or done outside of a purely medical situation. I can assure him that I was not pressured into being circumcised but chose it freely and willingly. Furthermore the operation was performed in a strictly medical environment without any sexual overtones.

I have now been circumcised for 3 years and my only regret is that I was not circumcised even sooner. Prior to circumcision my foreskin was somewhat tight as well as it being very painful when my glans was distorted by my short frenulum during full erection. My foreskin might have looked better to you, but I can assure you that it most definitely wasn't better on me.

I work in a hot kitchen all day and can assure readers that my penis used to be sticky, smelly and uncomfortable in these conditions – a situation that I am glad to say has been completely eliminated by circumcision; I am now comfortable all day as well as having erections which are no longer painful.

Editorial

I feel we must apologise again for the time taken to get the newsletters out. The team is very sorry but our working lives have been more than overloaded. In my case I also took my first proper holiday in 3 years in April. I needn't have bothered really either, as the England team got humiliated in the 1-day tests in the West Indies. Still, it was a wonderful experience around the Islands. Brian also has been super busy as well as helping to run a national speedway team. He has promised to get the celebrity lists out with this issue, of which so many of you have asked about.

The recent meeting was another success (see the following letter). It was great meeting so many new members. Two of them told me that it was a major event in their lives. They are major events in my life too.

On a sadder note, any one who was in touch with Graham Cox of Stafford should know that he passed away recently. He was an enthusiastic member and came to most meetings.

I think this is a more informative issue than normal. I hope you enjoy it.

Acorn Weekend — High Wycombe

The weekend for fellow enthusiasts so ably organised by Brian and the Committee was to my mind a great success. This was my second meeting since becoming a member of Acorn and I well remember the October 1997 event, again at High Wycombe, when I was a little apprehensive and so unsure of my reception.

I was so delighted by the friendly way in which I was met by Brian and yourself, and quickly thereafter introductions were made to the rest of the group, some of whom were also attending their first meeting.

Second time around, so many familiar faces, and a warm and interested atmosphere, allowed early and earnest discussion of the topic for which Acorn was born – circumcision/foreskins and the penis.

Each individual has his own thoughts, desires or fantasies associated with his manhood, whether it be cut or uncut, and could reveal or keep private his own particular feelings. Yet this still allowed full participation in the ideas and comments made by others, whether in the main meeting or in smaller individual groups.

As all participants knew why they were attending, there was no ice-breaking period required, and when in your inimitable way, David, you boldly stated "You are here because you are interested in cocks", this left no-one in any doubt.

I believe about 35 attended, some for the Friday evening and the meeting on Saturday afternoon, with others attending the formal meeting only, and yet some staying the whole weekend. Such attendance must have been gratifying for you, the Committee, and Brian in particular, without whose efforts we would not have the Acorn Society and meetings such as this AGM.

The formal meeting on Saturday afternoon was well attended, and the Committee, having given their reports, were justly rewarded with suitable 'gifts', on this, the tenth anniversary of Acorn's inception, by a generous, if waggish, member on behalf of all members, who applauded his sentiments.

I shall look forward to the next event with renewed interest, and in the meantime have much to think about from the discussions in which all participated this weekend.

The Video

I have just watched Adult Circumcision video and found it very interesting. But I think it would have been more interesting to see and hear the discussion between the surgeon and patient when it was decided that that particular method be used and also the amount of foreskin to be excised. From my observation of the inner foreskin, when it was reversed, it appeared that a little of the outer foreskin had also been left on the tip. I would have thought that if the foreskin had been tight before circumcision that this would have formed a constricting ring at the scar line.

Since this was only one method of circumcision, I hope we may soon see 'Adult Circumcision 2', '3' etc., showing other methods of performing this fascinating operation. I would like to congratulate the patient for his courage, both to have the circumcision and to let us see not only the procedure but the 'before and after' shots. I liked the finished article, but then, I thought it was a magnificent specimen with the foreskin. (I like the extremes – long tapered foreskins and radical circumcisions with nice obvious scar lines.

N.J.B. – S. Yorks.

[It would have been nice to have had a good commentary, but filming had to be discrete and there was no chance to 'mike' the cast. As a result the sound track was indistinct and unusable, as well as being mainly inconsequential banter with little relevant to the circumcision itself. The 'before' and 'after' shots were accompanied by much direction of which way to turn, etc.

Whilst ensuring that all the inner skin was retained, a small piece of outer skin was left attached to the inner skin at the tip. This causes no problem since the tightness related to the wider coronal rim rather than the shaft diameter.

Additional videos showing other methods would be nice to have, but require the active co-operation of doctor and patient. Any volunteers? — V.Q.]

Arthur C. Clarke

In my eternal quest for informed and interesting comment on the subject of circumcision, or preferably, foreskin retention, I was recently advised to leaf through Arthur C. Clarke's latest book, 3001. Arthur Clarke is a well-known science fiction writer who has an uncanny knack of accurately predicting the future, and is considered by those who know to be a latter-day Nostradamus – the 16th century astrologer who accurately predicted a number of phenomena happening this century. So impressed were NASA by his accurate space odyssey, The Fountain of Paradise, that the crew of the spaceship Atlantis took it with them and sent Clarke an autographed copy on their return to earth. In 1945 he predicted satellite communications, and did it so well that when the first commercial satellites were launched twenty years later they could not be patented. So it's worth listening to what he has to say.

Frank Poole, an American spaceman from the year 2001, who died in deep space, was discovered perfectly preserved a thousand years later and revived. To cut a long and exciting story short, he sets out to help his rescuers in their quest to survive an alien threat, and eventually gets used to life in the 4th millennium.

Inevitably he comes across a bit of 4th millennium crumpet called Aurora McCauley and gets to know her very well. Eventually she decides to treat him to a bit of rumpy pumpy and they get into a clinch. Total disaster! As he described it to a friend, a medical professor, the next day, "Everything was going splendidly, when she suddenly became hysterical and pushed me away. I was afraid I'd hurt her somehow –" Apparently she then turned on the light, jumped out of bed stark naked and in a terrible tizzy. Finally she relaxed and said to Poole something he never forgot: "I'm really sorry, Frank. We could have had a good time, but I didn't know that you'd been – mutilated". (Snap – more than one of Acorn's contributors have experienced similar humiliations, including me.)

Frank's friend was hugely sympathetic, but told him that in thirty years of practice he'd only seen half a dozen cases of circumcision – all for valid medical reasons, which, as he surmised, would not have applied to Frank. He explained that there may have been a case for it in backward countries in those days, but otherwise there was absolutely no excuse for performing circumcision – and several arguments against it, as Frank had just discovered! He had checked the records and discovered that by the mid 21st century there had been so many malpractice suits that the American Medical Association had been forced to ban it! The arguments among the doctors at the time were very entertaining! (I'll bet!)

He went on to say that in some countries it went on for another century, then some unknown genius coined a slogan – "God designed us: circumcision is blasphemy". He then offered Frank a transplant, telling him that he wouldn't be making medical history, by any means. Frank declined. (The fool. I'd love to have the chance!)

For consolation, Frank turns to another woman friend, Indra, only to find that she's not all that sympathetic. She is an expert historian of the period Frank originally lived through, and lamented how, right up to the early 2000's, atrocious behaviour of that sort was still going on, and people like Frank allowed it to happen. She was also shocked that in some countries young girls also suffered genital mutilation, again, purely for the delectation of selfish men. Shortly afterwards occurred the transition from barbarism to civilisation. Circumcision finally disappeared. Religion was condemned as a form of homicidal lunacy and banned. Toe-rags, scrotes and law-breakers in general, instead of being sent to prison, were restrained by the new technology and forced to perform tasks which character analysis decided suited their temperament, and once they had been cleared of their anti-social tendencies, were allowed back in society again. (If only!)

Arthur C. Clarke is described as the greatest prophet of the space age. Not only are his books entertaining, they are entirely feasible, and his predictions should be taken seriously. My big regret is that I shan't be around in the mid 21st century to gloat over the final and irrevocable demise of circumcision.

Hypospadias

I have just become a member of the Society and have been looking through back issues. I was pleased to read the short article about hypospadias in issue 2/97.

I have this condition and am quite self-conscious about it. When I was younger, in the showers at secondary school, I didn't think I was too different as hypospadias means that I still have the upper part of a foreskin. To the untrained eye it would appear that I have a short foreskin which doesn't completely cover the glans. Therefore, if any boy should have looked across at me, he might not realise.

My first sexual experiences, at 15 years old, were with friends masturbating each other after school. This made me aware just how different my penis was to others, although they didn't ridicule.

I have gone through stages of wishing that I was circumcised and having my meatus (opening) 're-positioned' at the tip of my glans, to wondering if I could have the underside part of my foreskin restored (with a skin graft) after having my meatus re-positioned to the tip of my penis. Either scenario would have psychologically meant to me that I was either one thing or the other. At the moment, half a foreskin means that I am 'in-between'.

After talking frankly to my last partner, he said it really didn't look different and that he was able to push my short foreskin back far more easily without the possible problems of it 'sticking', and not being able to be returned.

I believe I will always long to have a complete foreskin as all the experiences I have had have been with uncircumcised men, even a gorgeous 26-year-old Australian blonde in Melbourne last year! His presence of foreskin really surprised me as I was convinced that most Australian men were circumcised!

If any other members also have the same condition, hypospadias, please write your views whether you are content with how you are, or wished that you were circumcised or completely uncircumcised. Also, does anyone have any interesting statistics on the percentage of Australian circumcisions recently, and over the last 20 years or so.

David – Essex

Circumcision — Another Englishman's Experience

I was born in 1935 and circumcised (I believe) at between 6 and 12 months for hygiene reasons. I had a very isolated upbringing in the country, and had no experience of other boys. Starting school was a frightening experience, and the first visit to the urinal horrifying. I saw three boys standing holding their penises and they were completely different from mine! This completely shattered my confidence – there was no way that I could stand alongside and expose myself. I could never use a urinal again after this – for the whole of my life.

My next experience was starting grammar school at 11+. I had to shower with 10-12 other boys, and I was the only one different! In the next couple of years I came to realise that the difference was only the absence of foreskin – confirmed by a further startling incident.

When playing rugby I was made hooker in the scrum, and while locked in the scrum the boy behind me slid his hand up the leg of my shorts, found my naked glans, and felt very carefully around the rim. Immediately afterwards he said in a very astonished and concerned voice, "You've got no foreskin!" After this I felt extremely conscious of the naked exposure and sensitivity of my glans. I have never been able to use a urinal throughout my life as a result of these experiences. I finally sought counselling about three years ago. I have now come to terms with my circumcised state, and, in spite of some disadvantages, believe this to be preferable to a troublesome foreskin. The problem was lack of knowledge. I can now cope with stripping off in company without too much discomfort, but cannot conquer the fear of the urinal. I do not think I would consider restoration.

G.H.

Paeon To The Penis

With all the current arguments for or against the retention of foreskins viz a viz the circumcised model, I think it is high time men (and women) came to appreciate the penis for the work of art it is.

Many cultures actively worshipped the phallus and great commemorative statues were erected in praise of the member virile.

All penises are a thing of beauty, whether cowled with copious hoods of prepuce or whether of the surgically pared variety with prominently helmetted glans proudly on display... Size should not matter, although of course, exceptionally large cocks with pendulous scrotal sacs are particularly eye-catching! Perhaps even willies of the button mushroom type should be appreciated? Think of the pleasure they give their owners and those lucky individuals who get to share their mechanics...

After all, most men don't worry about the size of their feet or if their eyes are blue instead of the more unusual shades of green. Therefore they should be happy with what nature has endowed upon them. A lush, dark, thick pubic bush is not more handsome than a delicate dusting of pubic curls! After all, there might indeed be characteristic standards of beauty for the male genitalia that encompass standards of size, shape, colour etc.?!!

Whether in their relaxed and happy flaccid states or rearing upwards in their tumescent pride, I happily endorse penis power.

Comments

Congratulations on joining the net, David! I thought it might happen sooner or later.

A few comments on Issue 2/98: firstly let me spring to the defence of Anthony (although I'm quite sure he's capable of doing his own springing). Vernon tells us that Anthony has got it all wrong from almost every point of view. Firstly he quibbles about a minimal discrepancy in the percentage of boys circumcised at birth in this country when the real point of issue is that, if true, it is a scandal that so many children are pointlessly and cruelly disfigured by their parents, aided and abetted by the dinosaurs of the medical profession.

On the point of phimosis, a number of eminent specialists and consulting paediatricians have now generally acknowledged, in the literature, that tight foreskins and by association, paraphimosis, can easily be resolved conservatively by the use of steroid creams and simple manipulative exercises, with the option of minor non-destructive surgery as a last resort (chapter and verse can be provided). Others claim that the only true phimosis needing circumcision is BXO. Incidentally Vernon writes with such feeling about the miseries of those afflicted by terminal phimosis that one could almost believe that he'd suffered them himself – but did he not tell us somewhere that he was circumcised at birth?

With regard to which of the Kelloggs was the circumcision freak, who cares? Some people might say a plague on both their houses.

Once again a whinge from someone who disapproves of the views of women being aired in Acorn, although in this case he is no doubt correct in claiming, as I myself have previously, that some at least are phony. But an awful lot of them clearly are genuine, from their very content. I've a feeling though that what he really disapproves of is the commendable anti-circumcision views most of them advance. I was glad to see that our editor printed a letter from a 'lady' almost immediately after his, no doubt in implementation of our terms of reference which specifically ask women to give their views. The possibility that the writer might not be who she says she is cannot be proved and anyway, if a letter is worth printing, let it be printed!

Next a plea for consideration for those whose lives have been blighted by a hated and resented legacy of unsolicited circumcision and who turn to our pages for comfort. If you accept that they have to wade through a lot of corrosive stuff which identifies the writers as the sort of people who enjoy the idea of needlessly circumcising babies, at least material or information which might help them in their distress should be published where possible. I am referring in this case to the details I sent of the Symposium on Sexual Mutilations which is to take place from 5th to 8th August. After all, the notices column should not be reserved purely for gays drumming up trade.

Oh, and finally, I am beginning to lose count of the number of letters we have had over the years about the bloodcurdling and tedious experiences of all those guys who have had the supreme joy of having their wicks trimmed by a Muslim circumciser, all expressed in suspiciously familiar phraseology. But having gone to town on the genuineness of our so-called 'lady' contributors, I can hardly complain – but you see what I'm getting at. And in the Muslim context, I strongly identify with your comments on religious bigotry in rebuttal of Yahya Lamont's complaint.

As is so often the case, I seem to be the only contributor who fights the anti-circumcision corner with the same sort of gusto employed by the circumcision drum-bangers (is that better?) in support of their case. So in the interests of fairness, please let my views have an airing – preferably uncut!

Enthusiasm

For many years I had regarded myself as a 'cock freak', thinking this to be perverse at the very least. May I say that I enjoyed my 'perversion', having no preference either for the uncut or the cut equipment. Nor did I have any specific opinions for or against circumcision. I just enjoyed the sight and feel of a cock, whether mine or another.

On a trip to America some 20 years ago, I was introduced to the Uncut Society of America by way of a handsomely documented and illustrated book entitled Foreskins. Commonly called the U.S.A., the group was formed to promote the retention and enjoyment of the foreskin, and I was introduced to men who obtained such enormous pleasure from their foreskins, and it was difficult not to become part of their enthusiasm.

I returned to England with a determination to track down fellow foreskin enthusiasts, and suddenly my world opened up as I discovered all those special pleasures – and perversions – of the male overhang. Whilst I encouraged others to enjoy their foreskins, I got even greater satisfaction by decorating my cock and knob with tattoos and piercings. I continue to love and admire cocks, but I'm especially proud to be a cavalier myself – and maybe a little lucky!

My Circumcision — Mike's Story

A story told to one of our members by one of his hotel patrons.

Because of a continuing infection under my foreskin, my doctor advised me that I should consider circumcision. In any case, a second opinion should be sought. He made an appointment for me at the local hospital, but advised that it might be months before I could be seen. Meanwhile to continue using the cream. I had to agree it was a problem which just wasn't getting any better, although I was none too happy about losing my foreskin.

The day arrived when I was to visit the hospital seeking specialist advice. After an hour's wait I was taken into a small room, told to undress and lie on the table to wait for the doctor. He was a small grey-haired man in a white coat. With rubber-gloved hands he pushed up my shirt, exposing my now shrivelled penis and said, "Your doctor writes you have a problem."

"That's right," I answered. He was now moving my foreskin back and forth.

"If you continue using the cream your doctor has prescribed for you I don't consider an operation is necessary. You can get dressed."

"So you are not prepared to operate? I asked him.

"I have told you I don't consider it necessary."

"You may not, But I do. I have used the cream for months and still the infection returns. I want you to do it."

Removing his rubber gloves, he sighed. "Very well, but it may be some time before you hear from us," he said, and left the room. A nurse appeared and told me I could leave.

During the waiting months the problem persisted. It was with great relief when a letter arrived informing me that due to a cancellation I was to ring the local hospital the following Monday morning at 8am to see if a bed would be available. I arranged time off from work explaining that I had to go into hospital for tests. The girl in the admittance office was quite pleasant, took my details and told me to go up to ward 8. A nurse asked me if I had had a shower, told me to undress and put on a white gown and wait for the doctor. It was the same one I'd seen before. Stoneface, I called him. He told me the porters would be collecting me soon, but it was another hour or so before they arrived.

"On the trolley with you. Have we got the right notes? You're for a circ? Are you? Well, it's only a little prick, you'll be OK." Little prick, indeed. I did feel the two injections into my penis. Very painful.

The operation was over in about an hour and I was back on the ward. The nurse told me I could have a light lunch, adding that I must pass water as soon as possible, and then let her know if I had any problems. Day passed into night. Half asleep, I realised I needed the toilet. However, there was a problem. The once white bandage was now soaked in blood. Back on the ward I rang the bell for the nurse, who fetched the duty doctor. He explained that I had split two stitches which would have to be replaced. Afterwards he gave me some tablets to stop it happening again, and I went back to sleep.

I was able to go home the next day after being told to have a salt bath every day for a week. The tablets worked, I got no more night time erections and the stitches fell out after a few more days. My penis was still tender to the touch and very sore. It no longer hung down the way it did before the operation. It was tight and more pushed forward. It no longer relaxed. Then, I had my first nocturnal erection since the operation. Pulling up my knees to relieve the pain in my aching penis, I stumbled to the bathroom to see if a pee would help. It was only then that I realised just how much skin had been removed by necessity or revenge by Stoneface, who had performed a completely radical circumcision. In the weeks, then months, ahead I used huge amounts of soothing creams trying to regain a little surplus skin. It has taken many months to achieve this. None-the-less it is still a very tight cut cock.

The question is, should I have taken old Stoneface's advice and not have had it done? Or was my own decision correct? You decide!

Pieces From The Press

Actor Liam Neeson's wedding tackle is the biggest in Hollywood, it was claimed yesterday. He boasts a 12 inch-plus whopper according to a club for well-endowed members in Los Angeles.

Liam, star of Schindler's List, inches other stars out of the reckoning, Jim Boyd of The Hung Jury Club said on ITV. Dolph Lungren, Frank Sinatra and Willem Dafoe are all members of the 12 inch club. But Irish-born Liam tops the lot.

Boyd, who is seeking new members in Britain, said on the This Morning show that Gene Simmons of Kiss boasts a ten-incher. He told host Judy Finnigan: "For millions of women the ideal is a well-hung man." But Dr Raj Persaud, the show's resident doctor, claimed size was not that important. He said: "The majority of women are disatisfied with their sex lives because there is not enough kissing and cuddling in a relationship."

In an adventure story straight out of Indiana Jones, a team of American scientists have recovered lost treasures hidden behind the foreskin of American actor Anthony Quinn. Tales of lost treasures buried deep beneath the actor's helmet have been rife in Hollywood for over half a century. And last year a team of scientists from the University of California set out on a pioneering expedition to explore the uncharted area known as “Quinn’s Polo Neck”, and salvaged items rumoured to have been lost there over the years.

Several items were successfully recovered by the expedition, but the finds were not as spectacular as had been hoped. The items recovered, which have been put on display at the Institute of Foreskin Research in Glendale, California, included a large piece of cheese, thought to be 42 years old, and some fluff. Evidence suggested that the Greek actor, born ironically in Iceland to Mexican parents, may have been ransacked by bell-end robbers in the early nineteen fifties.

[What a load of old trosh! He must be in his dotage to allow an item like this.

Ten Years Of The Acorn Newsletter

I have been a member of the Acorn Society since 1995 but only received a complete set of back issues of the newsletter at the High Wycombe meeting in March. It has been fascinating to look back at the way members’ interests have been reflected in print during the past 10 years. The second issue, which appeared in March 1988, was the first to have contributions. ‘Andy’ felt that gay males would not be welcome in the group, a contention that was to prove pretty wide of the mark. By 1992 only 6 contributors to an Acorn survey claimed to be heterosexual against 20 who were bisexual or gay. The longest letter, an anonymous member’s life story, stretched over 10 issues from 1992-1993, after which we were told that the general response was “thank goodness it’s over”. The character who appeared most regularly was Rahbi, a very obliging Malay chauffeur who was the subject of several reminiscences by ‘H.C.’. Probably the most useful letters came from Dr Ray Hamble, who began writing in 1992 although, regrettably, not lately. Along the way, other regular features have included The Dictionary, with the terms for ‘circumcision’ and ‘foreskin’ in foreign languages (even Manx!), sightings (mostly from Dr Hamble) of celebrities’ cut/uncut status, and jokes and poems from ‘Anthony’. The letters that have provoked the most replies have always been detailed personal experiences from men and opinions from ‘women’. More about the ‘women’ later.

It has been particularly interesting to chart the progress of the Society’s meetings. The first, in Oxford in September 1988, attracted 7 members (from a membership of about 25). The second, in Weston-super-Mare in June 1989, was by all accounts a disaster, and David, who organised it, deduced that “meetings are probably not the right thing.” It goes without saying that they did continue, but amid controversy. David reported that, after one meeting, uncut members resigned, complaining of victimisation from the cut majority, and that at another meeting, he was one of many who had to turn away from a video showing ritual circumcision in relentless close-up. It was only very gradually that the Society learned how to make meetings suit the needs of most of the membership, the result being the well-organised and friendly three-day events we know today.

The look of the newsletter changed in 1994 with the arrival of a professional designer, Vernon, but the style had changed three years before in 1991 with the change of editor. Basically, Tony appears to have been forced to use everything he was sent, no matter how unsuitable, but was able to give long, knowledgeable replies to the serious letters. David adopted a much more light-hearted and tongue-in-cheek approach to the subject. He was often (and still is) short of material, but admitted at the last meeting that he doesn't use some of the more bizarre items he is sent. A few of the contributions in the early years now make astonishing reading. In 1989, two low-lives got off on describing (hopefully fictitious) sexual encounters with children in South America. Complaints from other members soon put a stop to this. More harmless fantasies were lifted, possibly word for word, from the letter pages of girlie magazines. Month after month writers described how they were sexually initiated as teenagers by older women (the au pair, my old nurse, my best friend's mother) or were given hand-jobs by doctors during medical examinations. My favourite tall storyteller was 'J.H. of Helsinki,' who sent in a completely wild fantasy about being shaved, circumcised and masturbated by a Turkish barber. All this despite the fact that, only months earlier, he'd claimed that he'd circumcised himself! It's a great shame that J.H. hasn't been in touch for a while.

For almost the whole of the Society's existence, however, the most enduring fantasy has been circumcision from a female point of view. Writing as a woman is common practice in men's magazines, where most of the fiction, and a good percentage of the letters, is done in first person 'confessional' style by men using female pseudonyms. Even Fiona Richmond's famous series for Men Only, in which she supposedly travelled the world, road testing men, was ghost-written by male journalists. You probably don't need Dr Hamble to remind you that it is far more of a turn-on to imagine that women are conspiring in men's fantasies about women. This attitude seems to have spilled over into the Acorn newsletter from the very first year, when there was a letter from 'Y.Z.' who claimed to be a Jewish woman who preferred men with foreskins. Clearly, editor Tony was not taken in ("Your interpretation of the Talmud [is] more original than orthodox,") but nor did he blow the whistle. Accordingly he opened the floodgates for letters from correspondents with wonderful Penthouse-style names like Sue, Samantha and Cathy, all of whom revealed remarkable knowledge of male circumcision. To date there has been something like 35 (probably many more) letters from 'women', not one of whom has been a member of the Society, nor provided a real address.

As far back as 1991, David hinted that these letters were not genuine (Sorry, you Hertfordshire girls!!) but this has done nothing to affect their popularity. Of course it is quite possible that some of the letters imploring more 'women' to write to the newsletter, and then responding to the 'women' that do, are also phoney [I'm certain that they're not. – D.A.], but it is certainly true, at least from the response recently to 'Doreen Chase', that there are members who really do want to believe that there are women out there who are passionately devoted to the subject of foreskins, so much so in fact that they even use male jargon when discussing them ("My present partner is blessed with a cock like a policeman's truncheon, with a foreskin like an oiled sock," revealed 'Ms A.C.' in 1992.) Unfortunately, as David pointed out more than once, it is more likely that at least 50% of women couldn't even identify a circumcised penis if it reared up and bit them.

It is a pity in a way that the obsessions and fantasies of Acorn members, which have provided such exciting and informative reading over the past decade, are enjoyed by a relatively small readership. There is much in the 80 newsletters, which kept me up until 3am last night, and busy this morning writing this, that would fill a column in a national newspaper and an hour on daytime TV, not to mention a psychiatrist's case study. I fully expect that, before the next ten years are up, the Society will have been discovered by someone influential and become a cult to rank with the Society for Psychical Research and the Test Card Fan Club. In the meantime, keep those letters coming in.

Feast Of The Circumcision

Letter sent to the Church Times by Lord Morris of Castlemorris, ex Labour Deputy Chief Whip in the House of Lords.

Looking back to January 1st, we seem, at least in our parish, to have overlooked that other slightly uncomfortable liturgical celebration, the Feast of the Circumcision, which is now held to be more a matter for the doctor than for the priest.

It was not always so. The story goes that in the 19th century, a bishop preached on January 1st about the new year and all its promise. After the service he greeted at the church door an ancient, holy and godly matron, who gently reminded him of the feast he had apparently overlooked: "Thank you, my lord, for a most uplifting sermon, and may I take the opportunity also to wish you a blessed and happy Circumcision?"

As she left, she turned back, and added, enthusiastically, "And many of them."

Cold Comfort For Life Model Equipment

OK, so I have a confession to make, and require some help from Acorn members to overcome it!

You see, amongst my many other naturist activities and my liking of being smooth all over and circumcised too, I have been a life model for artists for some three years or so.

Last year on January 1st, I made a New Year's Resolution to be totally nude in the company of others (apart from the family at home, of course) every day of my life and my, by now, many bookings as a life model help to maximise my days of nudity to meet my aim.

I am more than happy with the length and girth of my cock when erect – as is my girlfriend, who often calls it my 'secret weapon'. 'Secret' because when it is flaccid it is of perfectly average dimensions or – on a cold day – even smaller!

Now for the connection with life modelling. My sessions typically start in a cold art studio at about 10am and continue, with a break for lunch, until 4.30pm. By the afternoon the studio is sufficiently warm for my flaccid organ to be of reasonable size, and my balls are hanging nice and low as I would wish. The morning session is the problem.

Have members any tips as to a method of keeping the genitals from 'bunching up' and reducing in size in the colder morning temperature of the art studio? First impressions are important. I have tried applying baby oil which has some limited effect of keeping things a bit warmer but, even with a fan heater blowing straight at the crotch, it takes a time for things to hang large and low enough to make an interesting drawing. "If only those artists could be offered my erect cock to draw, they would see the real size of what I have to offer!", I keep thinking.

I have noticed at our naturist club, and elsewhere, that older men seem to have cocks and ballsacs which retain their larger size despite low temperatures. Could it be that their skin lacks elasticity – perhaps one of the few advantages of old age? Also, do Acorn members who have used them, reckon penis expanders (such as the Chartham Method) actually work? If you have used one of these devices, what frequency and method of use do you adopt to maximise its effect? Would it help with enlarging the flaccid penis, ie my 'cold cock' problem?

The editor and I would like to hear your views on all the related above-mentioned topics. If any other members are also life models, how do you cope with the problem of the cool art studio, and how would you advise me how to feel more confident by being able to present my artists with larger and more interesting genitals to draw earlier in the session

Mandella

I was recently staying at a hotel in which were piles of back copies of glossy magazines. In Country Life for Jan 12th 1995 was a book review of Nelson Mandela's autobiography, Long Walk to Freedom. The review, which was written by Sir Geoffrey Howe, included this sentence:-

"The Africanism of Mr Mandella's adolescence in Thembuland's royal household (he was indeed 'to the manor born') is underlined by the chilling account of his own circumcision ceremony."

The book is priced at £25 (published by Little, Brown) and is rather a lot to buy if you are not interested by the rest of Nelson Mandella's life, but I should think it will be available from public libraries.

It would be interesting to have the extract published in Acorn, but I suspect it would be infringing copyright laws to do so.

Contact Corner

Gay 40-year-old roundhead, keen on photography, wishes to create the ultimate Acorn-style photo collection. If you are either roundhead or cavalier and would like to be included in this collection (not for publication, just personal enjoyment) write to me via the Acorn address. Hope to hear from you soon.

Happily adult circumcised, now intending to have Albert piercing. I would like to have my piss-slit extended and would like name of sympathetic (enthusiastic?) doctor in Kent or South London.

Editorial

In this issue I have purposely included a number of contentious items in the hope that it will provoke a large number of hot replies, as I've run out of personal items. Somehow articles from newspapers, magazines and the Internet never seem as warm as personal ones from the members. If you have e-mail it's very simple to drop an item in. ## Islamic Cuts

I may be able to help following I.P.T.'s request in the last issue for information regarding Muslim circumcisions, including removal of the frenulum, as I was circumcised over 10 years ago in Saudi Arabia by a (Saudi) Muslim surgeon and learned quite a lot.

Whether or not the frenulum is removed often depends upon the religious tradition of the particular Muslim country. There are four Muslim law 'schools' – Hanafite, Shafite, Malikite and Hanbalite. The latter is the most puritanical (or fundamental) and is widely spread in Saudi Arabia.

The surgeon who circumcised me was, unlike the Turkish circumciser your correspondent described, highly qualified with medical degrees from London and New York. Again, unlike the Turkish case, he used a local anaesthetic in a scrupulously clean clinic and worked with the assistance of an (English) theatre sister. Both were masked and gloved, and I would estimate that 30-40 stitches were inserted. The whole procedure probably took around 45 minutes.

Adult Muslim converts were frequently referred to him by the local religious authorities and he had developed a standard technique. This involved a radical excision of the foreskin including the frenulum for reasons I shall explain below.

Although I wasn't converting to Islam I underwent the same form of circumcision, and what was my frenulum now only appears as a faint outline, rather like a sandcastle which has been washed over two or three times by a wave. The whole of the glans is permanently exposed and there is literally just enough loose skin left on the shaft to allow for a straining banana-shaped erection. This is in contrast to the type of circumcisions practised in other Muslim countries such as Morocco, where a different one of the four law schools prevails. In this area, part of the glans (up to a half) is often left covered and the frenulum is quite untouched. The ritual is purely symbolical but none-the-less regarded as essential.

The reasoning behind the Saudi or Hanbalite form of circumcision is quite different. Once a Muslim, always a Muslim. Apostasy (abandoning Islam) is punishable by death. In the early days of forcible conversion to Islam a male captive in war could be 'badged' by a mild form of symbolic circumcision. He could often stretch back the remainder of his foreskin and, if he was freed or escaped back to his own (non-Muslim) people, could deny he had ever been converted and undergone the humiliation of circumcision at the hands of his enemies. By practising a radical form of circumcision and removing the frenulum as well, devout Muslims believe they are not only carrying out their religious obligations to the letter, but also ensuring that the circumcisee remains conspicuously marked forever.

As far as intercourse is concerned, the absence of a frenulum is good news, in that there is nothing to become sore or even slightly torn. The bad news is that masturbation is difficult without a liberal application of KY jelly to compensate for not having a foreskin rubbing over the glans.

Whilst some of your members clearly see the absence of a foreskin as a humiliation, I am proud to have submitted to the ritual (especially at the hands of a Muslim practitioner) and to be effectively marked for life. If any of the members are nudists, they can see the results of his work at Eureka's 'library', which includes poses of my pretty shaven wife (another highly commendable Muslim custom!) who, like me, is a member of the SCN group.

Impotence and Adult Circumcision

A paper written in the Journal of the American Medical Association by Joseph M. Stinson M.D., of the Department of Physiology and Medicine, Meharry Medical College, Nashville, Tennessee.

Extensive debate on the advisability of circumcision in the neonatal period was initiated by Preston in 1970 (Whither the Foreskin? A consideration of Routine Neonatal Circumcision. J.A.M.A. 212:1853-1858, 1970), who suggested that boys could always elect circumcision later if desired. On the other hand, evaluation of patients undergoing circumcision between the ages of 4 and 7 revealed extensive detrimental psychological effects (G. Cansever. Psychological Effects of Circumcision. British Journal of Medical Psychology, 38:321-331, 1965). It is the purpose of this report to suggest that greater attention be given to the potential for psychological problems related to elective circumcision in the adult.

The patients presented as case reports were all on active duty with the USAF and had some problems peculiar to this status. All had complete physical and laboratory examinations, including examination of external and internal genitalia, neurological examination, complete blood counts, oral glucose tolerance tests, protein bound iodine and T-4 uptake, serum electrolytes, VDRL, sperm counts, and 24-hour urinary keto-steroids and hydroxysteroids. All were within normal limits with the exception of reactive hypoglycemia in one patient, who had a blood sugar of 40mg% at three-hours postprandial.

Case Reports

Case 1. W.J., a 23-year-old black father of two, was circumcised at age 22 while on a tour unaccompanied by his wife. His first post-operative attempt at intercourse, which coincided with his first attempt at extramarital intercourse, was a failure. Impotence continued after he returned to his wife. He refused psychiatric consultation and was treated with Halotestin, 10 milligrams daily, with temporary improvement.

Case 2. J.G., a 31-year-old white father of two (ages 9 and 10) underwent elective circumcision at age 28, and vasectomy at age 30. The latter was done while the patient was separated from his wife, and he noted the onset of impotency as that tour of duty was nearing completion.

Case 3. M.J., a 29-year-old black father of two, had an elective circumcision at age 23. He also gave a history of intermittent low back pain since the age of 20. Impotence was transient but recurring. When first seen by the author he complained of impotence accompanied by low-back pain with radiation into the posterior aspect of both thighs.

Evaluation by cardiovascular surgeons, neurologists and orthopaedic surgeons failed to disclose any physical basis for the pain, and all symptoms were considered psychological. He was treated at various times with Halotestin

10 to 20 mg daily, Cytomel 5 to 25 mg. daily, or Valium 20 mg daily without any change in the recurrent nature of his impotence or low-back pain.

Case 4. B.A., a 34-year-old father of three, was circumcised at age 22. He was seen initially because of chronic epigastric pain. Upper GI series, oral cholecystogram and barium enema were normal, as were liver function studies. He was treated with Valium for a functional gastro-intestinal syndrome, and later reported that Valium reduced his libido. Further questioning revealed that impotence had been present periodically for several years.

Case 5. B.S., a 31-year-old father of two, had elective circumcision and vasectomy while serving a tour of duty requiring separation from his family. On returning home he learned that his wife had filed for divorce. He had a full-blown psychotic reaction requiring extensive hospitalisation and psychotherapy. On return to an acceptable level of function he found himself impotent.

Comment

Since the widespread adoption of vasectomy as a means of voluntary sterilisation, follow-up studies have led to the recommendation that pre-operative evaluation include psychological assessment. No such recommendation is made for elective circumcision in the adult. While this report cannot claim to show a causal relationship between circumcision and impotence, adult circumcision is the one common thread in the five patients presented. In addition, two of the men had vasectomies, two first noted impotence during extra-marital intercourse, one had impotence accompanied by low-back pain, and one noted impotence after a severe psychotic episode. The latter had been treated with various psychotropic drugs. There was probably a great deal of interplay between circumcision and these other factors. Nevertheless, it is felt that these case reports are adequate to recommend psychological evaluation prior to elective circumcision, and post-operative psychological counselling when the procedure is done on an emergency basis.

Muslim Directory

In answer to 'A Muslim Circumcision', on the Internet, inserted by P.T. of Hastings in Newsletter 2/98, according to the Sunnah, in regarding circumcision, only the foreskin is removed and not the frenulum, because, anatomically speaking, the latter mentioned is not a part of the foreskin. I am a Muslim and have many Turkish friends, and when we discuss circumcision only the foreskin is mentioned. One of these friends is an authorised medically qualified circumciser, and he removes only the foreskin, and from time to time when his services are required, a Turkish mosque that I always go to when in London contacts him when he is needed to carry out circumcisions.

I know that The Acorn Society is making up a list of circumcisers in this country, so may I suggest to them that they can get a list of doctors listed in the Muslim Directory, which also lists all the mosques in the London area where circumcisions are carried out. ## Different

I recently joined my sister on holiday on the south coast. The weather was brilliant and the beaches were packed. These days, younger children usually go naked and, whereas my sister's son, Peter, aged 7, had happily swum in the nude the year before, this time he refused to join all the other kids, but stayed moping in his swimsuit and refusing to talk to anybody. I asked my sister what was wrong and she looked worried. She explained that she had taken Peter to the doctor because he had a tight foreskin and the doctor had referred him to a surgeon for circumcision. Since the operation poor Peter had gone into his shell and refused to talk to his friends, hated school and sat in his room all the time watching telly instead of playing football like he had previously. His whole outlook on life had changed, and from being a happy sunny little boy he had developed into a recluse who moped all the time. She had gone to see the doctor about it who said that in his opinion there was nothing wrong with Peter. He would soon forget about his operation which was a perfectly normal procedure, and become his old self again. He suggested that a word with a counsellor might be useful.

Having been a social worker for a couple of years and then done a long course on counselling, I suggested to my sister that I should have a word with Peter and see what the trouble was. She was very relieved since she was so worried about him and had no idea on how to cope with his moods.

When I spoke to Peter I was saddened to see how troubled he had become. He totally refused to discuss his problems until eventually I raised the subject of his circumcision. He burst into tears, said that he hated the doctor, hated his mummy and hated the appearance of his altered penis. I did my best to jolly him out of it, telling him that lots of other boys had the same thing and some of them even preferred it. This was no consolation at all, I'm afraid. Peter told me his penis still felt sore to the touch, and since he was the only circumcised boy in his circle of friends he was cruelly aware of his different status, especially since the other boys sometimes pulled his leg about it.

So I had a word with a friend who was a doctor and asked her about circumcision. She sighed and said it was a throwback to the 1930s, and since so few kids were done these days, those that were were very conscious of their disfigurement and often suffered agonies of self-consciousness among all their normal friends. She went on to say that the reason for its perpetuation was simple ignorance on the part of the medical profession. In medical school, trainee doctors were given absolutely zero instruction on the anatomy of the foreskin and care of the penis. The majority of the medical textbooks in English were American, and would you believe it, the foreskin was never mentioned in them, nor did they ever feature in illustrations of the penis. In her opinion the Americans loathe the foreskin so much that they cut it off as soon as a boy is born and try to pretend that it never existed!

She said that she herself had studied in Germany, where the Anglo-Saxon phobia for the foreskin was a standing joke. She was taught there that circumcision never needed to be performed for medical purposes since penis troubles could easily be treated without recourse to the knife.

She went on to say that so many mothers who had absolute faith in their doctor were thereby condemning their little boys to a painful unnecessary procedure which would affect them for the rest of their lives. It may not have been so bad when a high proportion of other boys were circumcised, but it was a very cruel thing to condemn a little boy to being so different from the rest of his friends, and for so little reason. The point is that if there are any mums out there with worries of this sort, do not accept the advice of well-meaning friends, enthusiasts or doctors until you find one who realises that treatment of minor penis problems should not involve a scalpel.

Roast Meat

In view of the apparent strengthening of the sun's rays over Britain, whether due to the thinning of the 'ozone layer' or global warming et al, I felt it timely to draw your readers' attention to the deleterious effect of nude sunbathing on a circumcised penis. The glans surface can become so tanned and desensitised as to resemble fine leather, with consequent lack of sensitivity and pleasure. This is bad enough for the man, but also very frustrating for the partner, requiring exhaustive fantasising and game playing, not to mention manipulation, to achieve a short explosive orgasm. As far as I can see, it is non-reversible, so be warned. Wear a high factor sun cream. Happy sunbathing.

Observations

He emerged from the shower and proceeded to vigorously dry himself. His back was to me but it was evident that he had a gym-trained body with the broad shoulders and trim waist of an athlete. Unusually, he was not overly developed with the prominent breasts and bulging biceps of the professional bodybuilder, but rather his physique was graceful and had the classical perfection of a statue.

He was a handsome man, strong of jaw and clear of eye. Unlike most physical fitness enthusiasts he had left his body hair to its own devices, there being a proud puff of dark fur on his chest with a thick trail of black curls tapering down to his flat stomach. From the back I could see his muscles rippling as he roughly dried himself off.

As he bent I could see the curve of his small buttocks which looked in size more like a teen-aged boy than the mature specimen he was... Save for the thick dusting of coarse tendrils, that is, that peppered each pert cheek!

He seemed God-like and remote, and almost like the chiselled perfection of a classical Greek statue. He was entirely unself-conscious in his bending and stretching activities, and was more intent on removing the last droplets of water from the densely forested areas of his chest and groin. He seemed oblivious to any onlookers and, in a child-like way, relaxed in the security of his own naked form.

When he turned it was obvious he was well blessed in his lower regions with a darkly pendulous scrotum swinging between his strong thighs, his heavy testicles suspended smoothly in their weighty sac. His penis was also hefty with prominent glans penis stretching his prepuce taut in the early morning rays of the pale summer sun. His foreskin, however, marred this vision of loveliness as it 'dripped' from his proud penis for several redundant inches, and simply resembled the wattled protruberances of the turkey bird in its coarse redundancy. Oh, to see the proud curve of his enviable corona or the prominence of his sulcus... That fleshy shroud had obviously cowed and obscured his mushroom head since boyhood and must have made showering awkward and masturbation cumbersome.

Such a pity that a sympathetic medic had not spotted our fine young man's hidden potential at those school medicals of days gone by, and arranged for his proud appendage to be surgically unsheathed in all of its glory?

The perfect 10? Sadly, no, though an impressive 9. No amount of bench pressing and weight training could have tamed that lax penile preponderance! One can but dream...

Rethinking a Custom

An Article in U.S. News and World Report, 15th June 1998

Even before their son, Emmet, was born in 1989, Philip and Penelope McGuire knew how they felt about circumcision. Without much agonizing, the Michigan couple decided that they would leave their son's foreskin intact. Recalls Penelope, "Circumcision seemed ridiculously unnecessary and painful."

A generation ago, Emmet would have been in the noticeable minority of uncircumcised American males. Attitudes are changing and neonatal circumcision rates have dropped steadily during the past three decades from 90% to 64%. However, the United States stands out as the only nation where circumcision for non-religious reasons is widespread. In Western Europe, only 5% to 8% of newborn boys are circumcised.

Circumcision remains the most commonly performed surgery on males in this country – some 3,300 operations a day. The popularity of the procedure in America is historically related to what some scholars say was a national obsession with hygiene, heightened by prudery. It is said that it was introduced during the late 19th century as a means of preventing sexually transmitted diseases; the Victorians also thought that it curbed masturbation. In the years after World War II, circumcision had become so ubiquitous that many hospitals offered it as a routine part of birth-related services.

The trend away from circumcision has its roots in the natural childbirth movement of the 1970s, which sought to make birth as gentle as possible for the infant. Women who undergo a drug-free labour for their baby's benefit hesitate to subject him to surgery a few days later. But a more strident anti-circumcision movement, centred mainly in the San Francisco Bay area, is trying to influence parents. These circumcision opponents, who include some doctors, promote their views through pamphlets, books, videos and the Internet, arguing that the procedure violates medical ethics and human rights by subjecting infants to what they see as disfiguring surgery. They liken it to female genital mutilation, which was outlawed in the U.S. in 1996. Despite little medical research, the activists hold circumcision responsible for male sexual dysfunction and psychological problems. Some have even staged protests accompanied by recordings of babies screaming during circumcision.

Parents in the mainstream who decide not to circumcise mainly want to spare their sons the pain and risks of surgery. Oakland, California resident, Donald Bivin, the father of an uncircumcised son, says, "Humans have been around for millions of years without being circumcised, and it hasn't been a problem." While the risk of complications from circumcision (most often infection, not lopping off the penis) is small – between 2 and 6 incidents per 1,000 procedures – credible research is showing that infants do feel pain. Most doctors defend the surgery as low risk and point out that a local anaesthetic can eliminate the pain involved. (The American Academy of Pediatrics, which is neutral on circumcision, is expected to update its guidelines later this year, recommending the use of a painkiller.)

There is reliable medical evidence that removing the foreskin reduces the incidence of first-year urinary tract infections in boys and ensures that they won't develop penile cancer, which does affect uncircumcised men. But penile cancer is rare (occurring in about 9 out of a million men), and first-year urinary tract infections occur in only 1% of uncircumcised boys. There's no clear evidence that circumcision reduces rates of sexually transmitted diseases. All the same, some physicians acknowledge that the demand for circumcision in the U.S. is based on religious or cultural, rather than medical, needs. "There is no proven, documented medical reason that says circumcision is better, as long as you teach your child to pull back the foreskin and wash," says Dr Karin Blakemore, director of the maternal-fetal medicine division at John Hopkins University School of Medicine.

Despite circumcision's slipping popularity, couples who decide against the procedure are often left with the impression that doctors and nurses expect the surgery nonetheless. Susan Flanagan decided not to have her son circumcised at birth. Then during her three-day hospital stay, nurses came by repeatedly and asked about circumcising her baby – "as if to say, 'are you really, really sure?'" she recalls.

Indonesion Ceremony

Reading the back copies of Acorn for 1997, I came across references to Rcircumcision practices of Indonesians and Malaysians. Having this time lived out in Indonesia for 14 months, I have had the opportunity to watch the operation being carried out on three separate occasions. It is the latest occasion which I would like to describe.

On November 27th last year, I was invited, through my wife, who is Indonesian, to attend the circumcision of our 11-year-old nephew. What I didn't know was that this was going to be a mass circumcision and, unusually, it was outside the June/July school holidays when most circumcisions are traditionally carried out on Indonesian Muslim boys by doctors and even by midwives.

Having asked my brother-in-law's permission to bring along a camcorder, I set off at about 5am in the car with my nephew and in-laws to my brother-in-law's office, The Department of Transmigration, in Jakarta. On arrival I quickly realised that this was going to be a much more elaborate affair than the two previous occasions. According to my brother-in-law, about 30 boys, aged between 6 and 11 were due to be cut that morning in a large hall by a team of 5 doctors plus nurses. On entry to the Department building, my nephew accompanied his father to the toilet where he changed into a sarong and donned a black hat, the same type of hat that President Soeharto wears, and is called a peci (pronounced 'pechee'). Meanwhile, his mother and younger brother went into the hall to join the other parents, many of whom were employed by this government department. At about 7.20am everyone seemed to be in their places. 16 boys sat in two lines at the end of the room with a huge banner above them proclaiming the aims of the Department of Transmigration. The parents sat on chairs at right angles to their sons and facing a long white screen/partition. Behind the partition stood a row of 5 tables, each one draped in a white sheet.

This being Indonesia, there had to be a ceremony and a speech given by a top employee. The youngest initiate, 6, was invited by the speaker to cut a cone-shaped mound of boiled white rice. It was very appropriate that he cut the top off and put the food onto a plate, I remember thinking. With that, Muslim prayers were offered, presumably asking for Allah's comfort in what was about to happen to these boys, and guidance for the medical staff.

And so the event got under way, accompanied by the taped music of 'Allah Akbar' (God is great). Boys came over to the tables where they lay down and hauled up their sarongs to expose their bare crotches. It may interest Acorn readers to know that one of those doctors performing circumcision that morning, was a woman adorned in a headscarf (Indonesian Moslem women aren't veiled like their sisters in other Moslem countries), and that I wasn't the only person capturing the highlights on film. A photographer and I witnessed what I would regard as an extraordinary occasion.

I will not bore readers with all the procedures of the circumcisions, since they are already well-known. My ten-minute film shows close-up shots of my nephew being circumcised, from the time that he was given the local anaesthetic to the bandaging of his bare glans. What I found also surprising was seeing so many of the boys, including my nephew, having to have adhesions to their glans removed first. This can't have been very pleasant.

On completion of the circumcision of each boy an announcement was made. It was rather sad and a little comical to watch boys clutching their sarongs out in front of them, whilst they waddled slightly bow-legged out of the hall with their concerned parents. I ended up accompanying my nephew and his bemused brother and mother in a taxi at about 8.45am, and even as I left other circumcisions were going on. Amazingly, throughout my nephew's circumcision, his father was not by his side, and indeed, straight after the circumcision he just said goodbye and went off to his desk job at the Department.

The conclusion to this mass circumcision was a reception two days later (it is normally a week later, to give the boys time to recover). Although I was absent, I have a fair idea of what probably happened, because I attended a reception, or selamatan, of a neighbour's boy last summer. Probably, from about 10am onwards, my nephew sat in his living room and greeted invited guests who gave him money to celebrate his coming of age. He would have sat, I imagine, in some discomfort, dressed in his sarong and black hat, and wished he could have enjoyed the food and non-alcoholic drink laid on in his honour. Poor boy!!

I discovered recently that circumcision is advocated by some members of the Chinese Indonesian community. This is surprising, since non-Muslim Indonesians, especially the Balinese, frown upon the practice. The boy in question is 5 years old, a Catholic, and Chinese. Since both he and his mother are students of mine, I was able to ask her about her son. She said he was cut on grounds of cleanliness, to which my reply was, "What about retracting his foreskin and washing the glans with soap and water?" Surely 5 is the wrong age. What do Acorn members think?

Fetish

I have received two responses to my proposition (issue 8/97) that circumcision can become a fetish because of the mixture of fear and shame that surround it, at least in my experience. The first response came in the form of a personal letter from a British Acorn member. We've been in correspondence now for several months, and although we don't agree on the origins of the fetish, we find that we share many common experiences. It continues to be a very interesting and pleasurable letter exchange. The second response came in issue 1/98. Another British reader, Ray Hamble, explained that he has never felt any shame about his circ or about his penis in general. I congratulate him on his self-satisfaction and self-acceptance.

I've begun to wonder if my reaction and the reactions of British readers are different because of differences in British and American cultures. As I read the various Acorn articles, I marvel at the fact that British members assemble to discuss circumcision matters in person, including, if I understand correctly, the display of circumcised cocks. In addition, I have read about nudist beaches for circumcised men and for women with shaved pussies. And what about nudist beaches where men wear their foreskins pushed back to mimic circumcision? We have our share of eccentric people in America, along with the truly dangerous, but I know of no one who participates in any of these activities. There are adult bookstores (sex shops), J.O. clubs, self-help groups, etc., but there are no activities specifically planned around circumcision. Furthermore, they take place in private venues. In other words, the circumcision fetish is a secret issue in the USA. Why is this so?

One explanation might be the pervasiveness of clipped cocks among American men born before the 1980s. A good deal of shame was felt by men who were uncut, a state that could signify lower class status, poverty or foreign birth. Thus, any shame men might experience about circumcision could stem from the lack thereof. To avoid this shame, some men have not been eager to display their cavalier status. To be circumcised as an adult would necessarily signify that you've possessed the dreaded foreskin for your entire life, a badge of low status.

Another explanation comes to mind. The British seem, to the eyes of an outlander whose English relatives arrived in New England in 1630, to be very tolerant of eccentricities. For all of our boasting of living in the land of the free, we are conformists (even to the state of our cocks). Conformity is a necessity where there is so much diversity. When Americans harbour ideas, fetishes and lifestyles which differ from the norm, they are explicitly and implicitly pressured to conform. For many the solution is psychotherapy. They feel, "If I'm different, I'd better fix it." Thousands of Americans avail themselves of this service. While those in therapy don't brag about it, they would be much more willing to discuss their experiences on the couch than ever mention their circ or circumcision fantasies and fetishes to anyone other than their therapist. How does America enforce conformity? Through shame. In America children are admonished: "You should be ashamed of yourself!" And usually we are. "He has no shame," is one of the more damning observations made of people of whom we disapprove.

What about the fear, the second component in the circumcision fetish, in my view? I doubt that British and American men are any different on this account. Men, in general, are conditioned to repress their fears. Masculine does not equal frightened. I cannot imagine a man or boy who would not be afraid of having his dick trimmed. The fact that anyone – parents, doctors, mohels – could have this power over a guy's penis is mind-blowing. In several of the Acorn articles, men have stated that their fascination with penises and circumcision dates from a threat or veiled threat: "Johnny's going to have his willy trimmed because he can't keep it clean." Conclusion: THIS CAN HAPPEN TO YOU! WATCH OUT! Or, the first sight of a playmate's naked glans at the urinal or locker room is engraved into a boy's consciousness: "He's different. He's lost something. Somebody's done something to that boy's pecker. Could that happen to me?" A corollary to this thought might be: "I want to control it (maybe do it myself)." On the other hand, the realisation that a boy has had alterations done to his pride and joy without his consent must trigger feelings of vulnerability and powerlessness – precursors of fear. I propose that many men eroticise their fear, rather than experience it. In other words, it is easier to get a hard-on about circumcision and feel, in some way, in control than to fear it. All in all, I'll bet that the British acceptance of their fetish, whatever its causes, is far more enjoyable than the American alternative. It does, however, give us common ground for discussing an uncommon subject.

Culture Clash

News Item from The Guardian

An Aboriginal circumcision ritual witnessed by Australian government ministers wearing tribal paint, and intended to help reconcile black and white Australians, has instead caused bitter controversy. Some doctors have called the initiation of the son, aged 7, of a senior Aboriginal leader, child abuse and not custom.

The boy's father, Chairman of the Aboriginal Parliament, said the attempt to promote understanding between cultures had highlighted the lack of it. "For people to criticise my culture now is another form of trying to take away my culture", he said.

The federal Aborigine affairs minister, John Herron, and the health minister, Michael Wooldridge, both doctors, flew to Arnhem Land, east of Darwin, for the event last week. A television crew, journalists and photographers were also present when the boy was prepared for his initiation into manhood. Dr Wooldridge said there was nothing barbaric about the custom. But publication of details of the rite, which can involve splitting the penis down its length, has led to argument over whether it should be allowed.

A Brisbane doctor who has worked with Aborigines said, "Doctors Herron and Wooldridge are to be condemned for watching an operation that I would be sent to jail for performing without an anaesthetic on a white child."

Odd Comment!

Some time ago my wife and I went to a local village hall to hear a local group give a concert. At the interval I went outside for a cigarette, but as it was raining hard I stood in the entrance with several other men and women sharing the same intention.

We got chatting about the weather etc. and then one of the ladies expressed the view that it was a pity that we didn't live in a perfect world – all babies being breast-fed and all men being circumcised. Nothing was further from my mind at the time and I was somewhat gob-smacked. None of the men commented on this so I lit another cigarette and waited to see if I could get this lady on her own so that I could ask her to expand on her feelings – but no such luck.

I later established that she and the other females were nurses, but I never saw them again, which was a pity in that she obviously felt so strongly about the male appendage. I could have asked her to write down her reasons which I could have sent for inclusion in one of the issues, comments from the ladies being always interesting.

Men Circumcised As Adults

Excerpted from Circumcision: The Hidden Trauma
(Boston: Vanguard Publications) 39–40

©1997 Ronald Goldman, Ph.D. All rights reserved.

Only men circumcised as adults can experience the difference a foreskin makes. In the Journal of Sex Research, Money and Davison from the Johns Hopkins University School of Medicine reported on five such men. Changes included diminished penile sensitivity and less penile gratification. The investigators concluded:

Erotosexually and cosmetically, the operation is, for the most part, contraindicated, and it should be evaluated in terms of possible pathological sequelae.<sup>(1)</sup>

Other men circumcised as adults regret the change.

I play guitar and my fingers get callused from playing. That's similar to what happened to my penis after circumcision.<sup>(2)</sup>

After the circumcision there was a major change. It was like night and day. I lost most of the sensation. I would give anything to get the feeling back. I would give my house. [This man's physician persuaded him to be circumcised by warning he could otherwise get penile cancer. When the man complained of the result, the physician replied, "That's normal" and would not help him.]<sup>(3)</sup>

Slowly the area lost its sensitivity, and as it did, I realized I had lost something rather vital. Stimuli that had previously aroused ecstasy had relatively little effect... Circumcision destroys a very joyful aspect of the human experience for males and females.<sup>(4)</sup>

The greatest disadvantage of circumcision is the awful loss of sensitivity when the foreskin is removed... On a scale of 10, the intact penis experiences pleasure that is at least 11 or 12; the circumcised penis is lucky to get to 3.<sup>(5)</sup>

The sexual differences between a circumcised and uncircumcised penis is... like wearing a condom or wearing a glove... Sight without color would be a good analogy... Only being able to see in black and white, for example, rather than seeing in full color would be like experiencing an orgasm with a foreskin and without. There are feelings you'll just never have without a foreskin.<sup>(6)</sup>

After thirty years in the natural state I allowed myself to be persuaded by a physician to have the foreskin removed — not because of any problems at the time, but because, in the physician's view, there might be problems in the future. That was five years ago and I am sorry I had it done... The sensitivity in the glans has been reduced by at least 50 percent. There it is, unprotected, constantly rubbing against the fabric of whatever I am wearing. In a sense, it has become callused... I seem to have a relatively unresponsive stick where I once had a sexual organ.<sup>(7)</sup>

Natural Circumcision

My first real sighting of a circumcised cock came when I was about 13. I'd gone swimming with my best friend, and afterwards, while we were in the showers, he took his costume off. The head of his cock was completely visible, and at short range it was very clear that he had no foreskin, just a slight change in skin colour behind the head. I was surprised that my best friend had been circumcised, and it turned me on just thinking about his skin having been cut away. I began to wonder what it felt like, so I started to keep my skin pulled back. It felt good, and I wished that I had been done as a kid.

By the time I was 18 I was an undergraduate at Bristol, and during the breaks a few of us would head off to France. It was during these trips that I began to make some new discoveries. We were lying on the beach in Brittany, and my friend was wearing a small pair of 'speedos'. They were wet after he'd been in the water, and as he lay there on his back I was fascinated by the clear shape of his cock head, especially the rim, through the thin material. Mine didn't look that good even when the skin was back. I thought that he had been cut. Then he took them off to sunbathe naked and it looked as though I was right, but there was no sign of a scar. We were really open with each other, so I asked him whether he'd been circumcised. He said he hadn't, and that I wasn't the first to think he'd been done. It was just that he'd been born without a foreskin. "Do you want to look at it closer?" he asked. I did.

Since then I've been really envious of guys with naturally circumcised dicks. They look so good.

A couple of my other friends had really short foreskins, just about covering the rim of their glans. That was great as well, just a bit of skin that couldn't be pulled forward to cover the head, leaving no choice but to have most of their head exposed (for all to see). When they got even slightly hard, their cocks would circumcise of their own accord. Again, after we'd been in the water, these guys had such a distinct shape through wet trunks.

More was to come. Another one of our Brittany crowd had been cut in his early teens. His circumcision was very radical: frenulum removed and a scar line most of the way down his shaft. He used to tease other guys passing by on the beach by leaving part of his cock hanging out of the side of his trunks so that they saw the head and cut cock. Most came back for two or three looks. By now I knew that I wanted my cock head exposed like theirs. I couldn't wave a magic wand and have the same as my friends with token foreskins, so I opted for the radical cut that looked so amazing...and it's just great.

There is a sequel to this. Two years ago I was in Prague, at an outdoor pool. A Czech teenager approached me and in excellent English told me that he'd seen that I was circumcised (he'd seen me change). He'd noticed other West Europeans like this and wanted his to be done that way as well. We talked, and the only reason that he hadn't had it done was because he couldn't afford it. I had a simple solution which he seemed quite pleased about, and by the following day we'd found a doctor who would do it for a very small amount (by UK standards). By that same evening he had received much the same cut as me. He's really pleased with it, no frenulum, and a thin scar just over halfway down the shaft. And now I hear that a number of his friends are interested as well.

It would be great to hear from anyone who would like to contact me, but only those who are pro-circumcision.

Editorial

Time for apologies again. The magazines have been out late because poor Brian has a really stressful managerial job at which he works all hours, and has to fit the sending out of the issues as he can. But this time it is me that is tardy, and that's simply that I've had very little material I can use of a personal nature. The Internet is chock full of items on foreskins and circumcision, but in the main it's all what we've had before. We've had loads of new members in the past year but very few contributions from them. How about it chaps? Short pieces on why you joined, what you expected, what are your disappointments if any, how you begat your more than normal interest in penises – in short, anything. We've been going over 10 years now and it would be a shame for it to pack up due to non-participation.

Also, I know I've asked before, but if answers to articles could be in the form of an open letter, everyone would benefit. It irked me to have to pass on four letters to one contributor alone, with nothing for the book.

Reading the article about the Sexual Mutilation Meeting in Oxford, I couldn't help but think that, although it all sounds way out, their sentiments are the same as the overwhelming number of our members i.e. circumcision should be done for two reasons. Need and Desire. The majority of our members fall into the latter category, and I know it's made most of them happier men.

The Frenulum

In 2/98 I saw two references to the 'frenulum'. The first in M.P. of Brighton's article, 'I Love It Now', where he is "desperate for someone to point out (his) meatus, frenulum and sulcus...", the second in the Internet quote, 'A Moslem Circumcision', where the Sunnetci (circumciser) informs the Muslim convert that he would lose his frenulum as a part of the ritual operation. P.T. – Hastings rightfully wonders if this is standard operating procedure in Muslim circumcisions. The loss of this part of the penis/foreskin is unnecessary and is certainly not a requisite of a circumcision, especially in adult procedures.

The frenulum, actually a diminutive of frænum – latin for 'bridle', is a gathering of the foreskin on the underside of the cock. The foreskin, like folds of a curtain, is gathered up to a point where the sulcus forms a 'V' in the glans, just below the 'meatus', or peehole. The sulcus is a narrowing of the penis shaft, just before the flair of the corona, making the glans look like a knob on a post. The frenulum is hidden, covered by the foreskin, when the dick is flaccid. However, with an erection, which usually reveals the glans, the folds of the frenulum sit snugly in the indentation of the sulcus. However, a foreskin can be skinned back even further, revealing its inner layer, the mucosa. When the foreskin is drawn back to its limits, the frenulum stretches into a vertical band and will begin to pull the tip of the glans downwards. Sometimes the frenulum is short and only a slight tug will put a strain on the end of the cock, causing pain, when pleasure should be the order of the day. Many docs might recommend a circumcision for this condition, although the frenulum itself can be divided or removed without a complete circ.

What is the purpose of these folds of flesh? Its Latin name might be a clue. Like a bridle, it reins in or puts the brakes on the foreskin, making sure that it is not pulled back too far, thus tearing the delicate mucosa. Interestingly, the French word for 'brakes' is les freins, a word whose origin is found in frænum. The frenulum of the cock is not the only example of this formation on your person. Your tongue is also anchored to the bottom of your mouth with a frenulum. It can be too short as well, and cause a 'tongue-tied' condition which requires a judicious slice to allow articulate speech. Having reached maturity with my penile frenulum intact, I can also attest to it being a source of pleasure. The stretching of the frenulum is viewed by many cavaliers as an essential part of achieving orgasm. They would be quite upset at its removal.

When M.P. – Brighton wonders where his frenulum resides, he may wonder in vain. His childhood circumcision may have eliminated it altogether. In the U.S. where, until the 80s, most men were cut, the use of the Gomco Clamp or Plastibell ripped away the frenulum entirely, leaving the 'V' of the sulcus smooth, or with the hint of a vertical line where the frenulum once lay. Sometimes, this area is bright red with a 'sore' appearance when the cock is hard. A circumcised friend claims that this area remains quite sensitive and pleasurable, although the frenulum has been removed. To each his own! Perhaps our medically-trained Acorn members can clarify if the use of either of these two circumcision devices inevitably rips away the frenulum, or if it is cut away on purpose. The most modern circumcision device, the TaraKlamp, has been developed in Muslim Indonesia to facilitate both boyhood and adult circs as an initiation rite. The TaraKlamp web pages clearly show that the adult frenulum survives the procedure intact.

When I was planning my own circumcision four years ago, I tried to maintain as much control over the operation as possible. I asked my urologist if the removal of my frenulum was necessary. He said that he would leave it in place. In fact, he said that a professor in medical school had said that it should be left intact, since it plays a role in controlling the shape of the meatus. Why is this important? The shape of the meatus is crucial in maintaining a single, spiralling piss stream. If you have a divided stream, you know how messy this can be. Is your frenulum missing?

The frenulum can be easily retained in a circumcision. The circumciser must make the circular cut horizontally below the frenulum. When the frenulum is freed from the foreskin, it retracts into the 'V' of the sulcus. Often, the doc trims the remnant edge of the foreskin into a 'V' shape which rises to meet the frenulum remnant, and they are sewn together. The most accurate means of achieving this procedure is the 'sleeve resection' circumcision, where a tube of foreskin and mucosa is isolated and eased off the dick shaft. This operation is performed with the foreskin retracted. In the cases of the two most common freehand procedures, the foreskin is either stretched forward, past the glans, and severed, as in the 'Moslem Circumcision', or the foreskin lies in its normal position as it is trimmed away. Doctors tend to do the operation as they were taught. The sleeve resection is the neatest freehand procedure. I didn't know about it before my circ, so, even though I retained my frenulum, my circ scar is quite uneven. I advise anyone contemplating a circ. to discuss the procedure with his doctor before he cuts. Ask him if he can perform the sleeve resection. If you want the 'tight look', he'll probably cut away the frenulum to try to achieve it. But do you really want to lose this site of pleasure for a 'look'? Give it some thought. Be in control. Once it's gone there's no turning back.

I'm curious to know how other men who were circumcised as adults have come away from the cutting. Did you have input? What kind of procedure did you have – do you know? Were you able to watch the procedure? And finally, did you retain your frenulum? If you don't care to discuss any of this in Acorn, write me. I will respond to any serious correspondent in the USA or UK. [I do hope however, that most letters are open letters to be printed in the newsletter. — Editor] I am, however, especially anxious to hear from Americans, since we seem to form such a small minority of the Acorn membership.

The Philippines

I have a young friend who comes from Asia, the Philippines to be precise, and I guess how surprised I was to learn that male circumcision is universal there! He was cut when he was ten. I asked him about any traditional or religious background of that operation in his country, but he just told me that cavaliers would be ridiculed at school when they had passed a certain age. Do you or anyone else in the Society know when and why circumcision became such a common practice in the Philippines?. He has the typical 'High and tight' cut that is so popular in the U.S. So maybe it is just another Americanism.

I have had some contact with a Jewish gay group in Germany, and with it had the chance to evaluate a Mohel's 'job'. I was actually quite disappointed to see that apparently this was just one of those "only a little bit off the top, please!" jobs. Actually it looked rather like a short foreskin to me. So I wondered whether I had been seeing a rather conservative sort of a 'Bris Milah', or whether a Jewish circumcision in general leaves plenty of skin over the glans? As I have learnt from my stories set in Nazi Germany, Jews were often identified because of their circumcisions, so I had always thought that their circumcision status must have been rather obvious. Do you know of any requirements (rabbinical or biblical) of how much preputial skin has to be removed in a Jewish 'Bris'. I have a genuine interest in this question.

Patrick – Germany

Rings and Things

In issue 2/98 J.D. is wondering whether to wear jewellery permanently in his cockhead piercings. I say, "Go for it!", what's stopping you? He says that he removes his rings because "he moves in rather conventional circles", but how conventional can these circles be if others even know whether he is pierced? Even when I go swimming at the leisure centre, it's my large and obvious nipple rings that cause comment rather than my hidden genital piercings – though, as a keen naturist, I hardly keep them to myself all the time!

I've had my Prince Albert for almost 20 years. I've never regretted it and never removed it other than when replacing it with a thicker one (I'm on 5mm now). I was only sixteen and much influenced in my original decision by my room-mate and lover at school, who was already pierced and proud to show everyone in the school showers. I remember that my piercing caused a brief stir when I first displayed it in those showers, as I was not so outwardly gay as Jon, but it quickly conveyed the message that we were an item. The clink of our rings as they touched is a more private memory of those days of youth.

Jon and I drifted apart when we had to go to different universities, but I have never parted from my PA ring. Indeed, it is very difficult to remove my current ring and I am intrigued by the idea of having the next larger size virtually permanently fitted. My foreskin can't naturally cover my PA now, and it retracts easily, particularly because a piercing in the frenulum was stretched until it gave way! I recently had two hafadas fitted in the scrotum, and I'm considering having another piercing in the front of the cockhead – which would probably require removal of the foreskin. I know someone who wears a diamond stud in that position and it's not a fake; with a durable mount it is feasible to adorn one's most precious organ with such treasures.

At the recent A.G.M., I was asked "Why?" by someone as he visibly winced at the thought of my Prince Albert. I can only say as they said when climbing Everest, "Because it's there." I'm not circumcised yet, and I've never had the guts for a tattoo, but my piercings are my declaration that my body is mine to modify and to enjoy. In naturism I enjoy the liberation of the naked body, but my rings allow me to go even more naked – to display my inner self. Circumcision uncovers the cockhead but piercing is for me the ultimate uncovering of all that I am, and literally the final touch.

Celebrities

I have just received the first instalment of the U.S.-produced lists of cut/uncut celebrities. Thank you. It makes very – and sometimes surprising – reading. I wonder how Rupert Everett and Daniel Day Lewis, both English born of the younger generation, came to be cut?

I first came across Bud Berkeley's lists when I lived in the USA: they came as enclosures with a newsletter containing some very revealing accounts of the celebrity 'sightings', ie. how and where they had spotted the celebrities and how they had found out their circumcision status.

Can we not do something similar here for more British actors, sportsmen and celebrities? Here are a few names as a starter:

1. Sir Derek Jacobi: British actor. Jacobi has written a chapter in a book celebrating the life and times of Noel Coward. According to Jacobi, Coward 'had a thing' about circumcision, and on one occasion came round to his dressing room after a performance to ask whether he was circumcised.

Jacobi explained that, as a matter of fact he wasn't, but why the question. According to Coward, you could never make a great actor unless you were circumcised! An interesting story, especially since the Berkeley list has Jacobi down as circumcised.

2. Sir Michael Tippett: composer. Tippett begins the very first pages of his autobiography, Twentieth Century Blues with an account of his circumcision, without anaesthetic, in early infancy. Apparently, the healing after the original circumcison as a baby had been botched and they had tried to undo the damage while he slept. An example, according to Tippett, of the power of the collective over the individual.
3. Barry Humphries/Dame Edna Everidge: Australian born actor and comedian. Ditto – page one of his autobiography reveals that he was circumcised immediately after birth in an Australian hospital.
4. Auberon Waugh: writer and critic. I cannot remember the original reference, but Waugh has written that one of his earliest memories was his childhood circumcision to correct a medical condition (phimosis?) He wrote movingly of the painful experience and how this memory had accompanied him through adult life.

Waugh's article appeared about the time of the birth of Prince William, when I remember distinctly a newspaper report that a prominent Jewish Mohel had attended Kensington Palace for the traditional circumcision of a royal male. In fact, Waugh's confession was a reaction against this practice. Perhaps Diana put her foot down and objected, for there is a consensus that this British royal tradition was broken by the princes William and Harry on her insistence. Whatever the case, I certainly recall it being mentioned as if it had been scheduled to take place (The Times?) at the time.

5. Prince Albert of Monaco: I once had a very pro-circumcision American friend (every good American should be 'cleaned up') who had roomed with Prince Albert at a college in the USA. I badgered him to know the details of the Prince's private parts. According to my friend, he was uncut ("sort of") and unremarkable. The problem was, my friend hardly knew what a foreskin was supposed to look like, let alone what it was for, or what it could do for you in adult life. Shame.
6. 'Lofty' in East Enders: I'm afraid the only first hand experience I have of a celebrity was in the showers of a swimming baths in London. The fellow soaping himself next to me turned out to be the actor who played Lofty Watts in the BBC soap. The sighting? Uncut, moderate overhang, thin, not big.

Now, does anyone out there have any sightings that they would wish to share? How about Tim Henman, or Michael Owen, or Gary Barlow, or.....

Directory of Perversion

(What the doctors call the funny things that people do to each other)

Acuculophilia – An attraction to men who are circumcised.

Algolagnia – Love of pain, as taken from the Greek. A psychological term to describe S.M., preferred by sexologist Havelock Ellis, who saw it as “pain given in love”.

Altocalciphilia – A fetish for high heels.

Asphyxiophilia – or auto-erotic asphyxiation (if solo play), is control or restriction of breathing via compressing the carotid arteries, or putting things over the mouth and nose to reduce the level of oxygen that can be breathed in. Hanging, where the body is suspended from the neck, though a relatively common fantasy, is very difficult to stage in a non-harmful way for S.M. scenes. Most dangerous is auto-hanging. Also called Hypoxiphilia.

Bestiality – Having sex with animals. In America it is now trendily known as Zoophilia.

Coprophagy – Eating shit. And enjoying it.

Coprophilia – Gaining sexual pleasure from playing with shit. [The O.E.D. puts it much more nicely. – D.A.]

Dacryphilia – Sexual arousal from seeing tears in the eyes of one's partner.

Klismaphilia – Obtaining sexual enjoyment from enemas. (That's having lots of water gently flowed up your arse).

Macrophilia – Sexual arousal derived from the idea of a person being trampled, swallowed or controlled by a larger human being.

Microphilia – A fetish for tiny people, imagining people who have shrunk or are little fairies.

Necrophilia – Having sex with corpses.

Polyamory – Multiple sexual and/or romantic relationships. Otherwise known as swinging.

Retifism – Fetish for boots and shoes.

Techno-Sexuals – Those attracted to robots. This may take the form of a partner who acts like a robot or human doll, mechanical dolls, wind-up toys or machines created for sexual intercourse.

This directory came from a magazine called Bizarre. It causes me two concerns.

1. The term acuculophilia is one which I have never before met, purporting to refer to 'love of circumcision', which strikes me as an appalling amalgam of Greek and Latin elements to create an unlikely neologism, based on the latin cucullus, 'hood', presumably referring to the foreskin.
2. I find it worrying that love of men who are circumcised should be deemed a perversion.

Oxford

Being a member of NORM UK as well as of Acorn, I attended the recent meeting in Oxford of the Symposium on Genital Mutilation. It was over three days and took the form of about 6 areas of debate (mornings and afternoons). Anatomy, Religion and Culture, Legal and Ethical Considerations, Universal Campaign to end Mutilation, Psychological Aspects, Foreskin Restoration and Medical Publications.

Both male and female circumcision featured on the agenda (currently, millions of females in the world still have the whole of their genitals cut away – without anaesthetic – from the age of about 8 and upwards). Speakers came from all over the world and, regardless that they were all in unison, it could be seen that they all felt deeply about what they thought was right, without any semblance of personal self-importance. There was no bending to religious or cultural customs. In fact one speaker was a Jew from Israel who was taking the Israeli parliament to court for perpetuating the custom on 8-day-old boys, and was praised for his courage, although somehow I don't think he'll win.

What sticks in my mind is the history of circumcision in the U.S. It started between the end of the Civil War and the end of the century, with doctors coming forward to state that foreskins caused dozens of ailments and congenital conditions – bed-wetting, hernia, epilepsy, hip joint diseases, diarrhoea, clubfoot, heart disease, nutrition deficiency, convulsions, paralysis, muscular incoordination, water on the brain, tuberculosis, gangrene, arthritis, eczema and warts, to name a few, and the only cure was circumcision.

There must have been pressure put on the doctors by bible punching type religious bodies, because the underlying enemy was – yes – MASTURBATION. A paper was circulated at the symposium giving quotes by doctors in medical publications of the 1800's (one of them was called The Journal of Orificial Surgery, I wonder which orifice?) Here are some of those quotes.

1. In cases of masturbation we must break the habit by inducing such a condition of the parts as will cause too much local suffering to allow of the practice being continued. For this purpose we may circumcise the male patient with present and with probably future advantage. The operation, too, should not be performed under chloroform, so that the pain experienced may be associated with the habit we wish to eradicate.

2. I refer to masturbation as one of the effects of a long prepuce. Not that this vice is entirely absent in those who have undergone circumcision, though I never saw an instance in a Jewish child of very tender years, except as the result of association with children whose covered glans have naturally impelled them to the habit.
3. Viewing the world over, the shameful and criminal act of masturbation is the most frequent, as well as the most fatal of all vices. Nothing but a sense of inexorable duty, in the hope of effecting a radical reform by awakening the alarm of parents and teachers to the enormous frequency and horrible consequences of this revolting crime, could induce the author to enter upon the sickening revelation.
4. Hip trouble is from falling down, an accident that children with tight foreskins are especially liable to, owing to the weakening of the muscles produced by the condition of the genitals.
5. There can be no doubt of masturbation's injurious effect, and of the proneness to practice it on the part of children with defective brains. Circumcision should always be practised. It may be necessary to make the genitals so sore by blistering fluids that pain results from attempts to rub the parts.
6. A remedy for masturbation, which is almost always successful in small boys, is circumcision. The operation should be performed by a surgeon without administering an anaesthetic, as the pain attending the operation will have a salutary effect upon the mind, especially if it be connected with the idea of punishment.
7. Measures more radical than circumcision would, if public opinion permitted their adoption, be a true kindness to many patients of both sexes.
8. The child had indigestion, screaming fits at night, and failed to thrive. My advice that circumcision be performed was concurred. I did the operation without any anaesthesia. The wound healed without any trouble, and the child's indigestion and screaming were gone almost from the hour of the operation. Used when required, there is no doubt of the value of this little procedure.
9. Masturbation can be, and often is, the sole cause of insanity.
10. Circumcision not only reduces the irritability of the child's penis, but also the so-called passion of which so many men are so extremely proud, to the detriment of their wives and married life. Many youthful rapes could be prevented, many separations, and divorces also, and many an unhappy marriage improved if this unnatural passion was cut down by a timely circumcision.

Two things occur to me after that. Firstly, you can bet that all those doctors who made those statements masturbated themselves. Secondly, in America now, to combat AIDS, gay men are entreated to masturbate as a form of safe sex. What a turn round in a 100 years!!

Although the pressure groups in America have succeeded over the last few years in diminishing the national rate of circumcision from 90-something % down to 60%, it would appear to me that it will eventually cease because of that favourite modern American pastime – litigation. Someone, somewhere, in one state or other, will win a court case for being circumcised without his consent, and the damages will be so prohibitive that the medical profession will run scared.

At the Symposium, not one speaker spoke out against elective adult circumcision, in fact some of them showed approval, as being an informed choice.

TaraKlamp

Surfing the 'Net can yield some very fertile circumcision sites. There are those that hold forth on the evils of circumcision and others that graphically demonstrate the steps necessary for undoing the evil – each step illustrated with photos of the Website owner's own cock. There have been very few Websites, however, which extol the operation itself. Until now! For an interesting excursion into the most up-to-date world of circumcision, type TaraKlamp into your search engine. It takes some time to scroll through the various offerings, but there are at least two which show this interesting device in action.

The TaraKlamp is a medical device invented in Malaysia with the sole purpose of simplifying circumcision. Remember, many Malaysians are Muslim. Islam requires the sacrifice of hundreds of thousands of foreskins each year. Young boys are the usual participants, but adult converts, too, must fall under the knife. As illustrated in one of the sites, the TaraKlamp is a plastic mechanism, maybe 4 inches high, attached at a 45 degree angle to a plastic ring. A second part is a flared, hard plastic tube, shaped rather like an infant's bottle nipple. The sequence of events illustrated with colour photos on the Website is as follows:-

1. A man stands with his flaccid willy displaying his droopy foreskin.
2. The man is shown lying on an operating table. He is draped, but his dick is in view through a circular cut-out. A line has been drawn around his foreskin to outline his corona.

3. His foreskin is retracted and the vaselined 'nipple' is placed over his glans. The flare of this tube accommodates the glans: the narrow end of the tube extends well beyond it.
4. Once in place, the wide edge of the nipple, now covered by the foreskin, is adjusted to match the previously drawn outline.
5. Now the plastic mechanism is put into place. The ring is slipped over the foreskin and positioned on the outline. It is still loose. The mechanism attached to the ring forms a truncated triangle. It has two arms, resembling certain wine bottle uncorking devices.
6. When the two arms are pulled upwards, away from the penis, they cause the ring to compress and engage the edge of the flared nipple, crushing the foreskin between the nipple's edge and ring. The space between the two surfaces is so tight that the blood supply to the foreskin is interrupted. Hopefully, the patient has received some form of anaesthesia, since the resulting pain must be excruciating at this point. At this point, without cutting, the foreskin would die and eventually slough off. But doing so might also have health risks.
7. The circumciser now takes a scalpel and cuts away the foreskin. A few drops of blood appear at the incision.
8. The foreskin itself is shown as a detached ring of flesh encircling the end of the nipple.
9. Part of the mechanism is broken off and the skin is removed, leaving the extended open end of the nipple/tube as a peehole. The arms and the constricting ring remain in place for 8 days, dangling between the legs of the new roundhead. There is no bleeding; the circle ensures a tourniquet-like fit. The ridge of skin still clasped between the tube and ring dies, but the remaining inner and outer foreskin behind the ring fuse and heal together.
10. After the 8 days, the mechanism is released and the nipple falls free. A dark ring encircles the circumcised dick, marking a visual separation between the inner foreskin and the shaft skin. This line is, in reality, a ring of dead flesh which was captured between the nipple and compression ring. It sloughs away and a normal circumcision line remains. Voilà, a trimmed dick!
11. The last photo shows a completely healed, semi-erect cock. The dark ring has disappeared. The circumcision scar is about halfway up the member. The frenulum appears to be intact.

I've been circumcised for about four years, but if I hadn't already had the operation, I think I'd be tempted to do my own. Or, perhaps this is the kindest cut one Acorn member can do for another. It looks simple and sanitary. Everything arrives in a sealed packet. Does anyone know if the TaraKlamp is available in the UK? Have any of you had a TaraKlamp trim? Are there other members who are interested in circumcision procedures?

An Irish Story

I am currently living an alternative lifestyle – in a threesome relationship with two men friends, half my age, one circumcised and the other intact, and I have developed some views on the subject which, I am told, might be of interest to your group. I hope your members won't be offended at the explicit wording of my letter, but it loses impact without the detail.

I was brought up in a rigid Catholic home in the west of Ireland, and was taught from an early age that all sex was sin, except for the purposes of creating children within marriage. Even then it was better for a girl to remain single and celibate, the better to serve the Lord, and I was under pressure from the beginning to join a religious order, having attended a strict convent school. I did so but, realising I had no vocation, avoided taking my vows, although I remained with the order as a long-term postulant to help out in teaching art etc. at the school for boys which they ran.

Having no brothers or sisters, I was wholly ignorant of male sexuality, and it came as a shock to me when I was asked to supervise swimming for the 8-year-olds, to find they all swam in the nude. The sight of so many willies, some of them quite big, had me brick-red with embarrassment, and naturally enough, the kids noticed and started to play up. Since there is no tradition of circumcision in Ireland, the boys all had foreskins, and one of them came up to me holding his penis out, telling me it was sore. I asked him what he meant, and to howls of glee, the little bastard pulled his foreskin back and exhibited the blood-red knob beneath it to me. To someone as ignorant as me on such subjects, it really did look quite sore – until a circle of giggling boys formed, also complaining of sore cocks, and also producing similar bright red knobs! I realised I'd been had, and that it was normal for a permanently covered cock-head to be that colour in a young boy.

My knowledge increased shortly after as I was helping matron, the only married member of staff. A thirteen year-old came in who really did have a problem with his penis – he could not draw his foreskin back at all and feared he might have to be circumcised. "Fiddlesticks!" said the matron as she stripped his pants off and studied it. "I'll not have any of my good Catholic boys with a Jewish cock". She looked at me, knowing my commitment to celibacy, and winked. "You can stay and watch this if you like. It might improve your education." I watched as she pulled the boy's foreskin forward as far as it would go, so it looked like a 3" length of bicycle valve rubber stretching from the end of his penis. Grasping the tip at each side by the thumb and forefinger of each hand, she pulled the small hole apart until she created an opening you could push your finger into. The boy responded by getting an erection the size and shape of a large beef sausage – another shocking revelation to me! "Good," said matron, and pushed some vaseline into the opening with her fingertip. "Try pulling your skin back," she ordered the boy, who pulled it back enough to reveal a small circular area of red. "That's no good," said matron, "here, let me show you," and I was shocked to see her start running the skin back and forward quite hard a couple of times until the whole knob emerged. "Do that a few more times and you'll have no more trouble," she told the boy. If they'd known, the nuns would have had blue fits.

Having reached the age of 36 without any sexual experience with the opposite sex, my powerful urges, sinfully satisfied manually in bed every night, made me realise that I had to get away from so much female repression imposed on the staff, in such contrast to the blatant and rampant sexuality of the pubescent boys. A couple of years ago I came to England where suddenly the restraints of Ireland were discarded and I realised I was free to do what I wanted!

I immediately started to make up for lost time, quickly discovering what I'd been missing all those years. I cast my inhibitions aside as so many convent girls do and entered body and soul into the free-wheeling sexual scene, having 10 sexual partners in as many weeks. I reached my present arrangements a few months ago when I met my two boyfriends at a wing-ding, anything goes drinks party. Fancying them both and thinking it would be a bit of a lark, I led them to a sofa upstairs and sat the two men on either side of me. Then I aroused their lechery by hinting to them the fact that I had no knickers on. Immediately two hands burrowed under my skirt to check. I responded by undoing their zips and pulling out two fine stiff-standing penises, curious to note that one of them was tightly circumcised, the first time I had come across such a thing. We spent half an hour fondling each other, me with a cock in each hand while two sets of fingers explored my "vertical smile" – absolute bliss! Finally the two men came within seconds of each other and produced copious jets of seminal fluid which shot over the carpet.

Both men were close friends and we decided to link up as a threesome. Since the two men had such different willies, they were as curious about each other as I was about both of them, and we had long discussions – and practical demonstrations – on the subject of foreskins and circumcision. I tended not to take sides for obvious reasons, but listened with interest to their views. The circumcised man (his parents had lived in the States) was very conscious of his minority state in this country, and although his sexual performance could not be faulted, would in general have preferred to have a foreskin. The intact guy quoted all the stuff about cleanliness, health hazards and female preference for the cut member, which the circ'd guy immediately contradicted, saying that the medical experts had now discounted all such arguments in favour of leaving the foreskin intact. As far as women's views were concerned, I made the tactful – and accurate – point that women generally preferred what they were used to, ie. American women generally preferred a cut cock while European women favour the foreskin.

My own private view is that circumcision is unnecessary, provides no advantages, and is cruel. It also affects sexual function to some extent. I prize the mobility of all that extra skin which is so rewarding to wank up and down, and so beneficial in insertion, especially when a long-skinned man's bunched skin provides extra bulk at the base of the penis at the end of the in stroke, which I find highly satisfying. I've had enough experience now to recognise that the hygiene claims are a myth, and have a sneaking suspicion that whatever the reasons for the operation, it is not done for the benefit of the child. It wouldn't do to over-egg the cake though, and although my preference is for foreskins, I still find the other sort highly acceptable. But for maximum enjoyment, you can't beat an educated tongue.

How Smegma Serves the Penis

(From Sexology Journal, New York, 1970)

Is smegma useful? Yes, certainly. It lubricates the cavity between the foreskin of the penis and the glans, thus allowing smooth movement between them during intercourse. During an erection, the glans increases in size. The foreskin, on the other hand, does not change its dimensions. It is yielding enough, and thin enough, to accept the enlarged glans. Furthermore, the foreskin is pressed backwards during intercourse, and on subsidence of erection returns to its normal position. These movements are not entirely passive, but are aided by the relaxation of the muscle fibres within the foreskin.

But could these movements be comfortably performed if the surfaces between glans and foreskin were dry and harsh? Of course not. There would be difficulty, delay, need for manipulation. Nature has therefore provided a 'natural ointment', smegma, to ensure easy lubrication and protect this delicate region of the male genital organ. To secure its even distribution, smegma is formed from the whole inner surface of the foreskin cavity.

Recently, Soviet researchers at the Botkin's Hospital in Moscow have discovered important details of this process. Smegma production, they find, is concentrated in the cells of innumerable small prominences, minute microscopic protrusions of various shapes and sizes found on the inner surface of the foreskin cavity. The process is a continuous one: living cells are constantly growing towards the surface, only to undergo fatty degeneration in their turn, and separate off as freshly formed smegma.

These smegma-forming prominences vary with the age of the individual. The prominences may be present in fair numbers, even in infants and young children, but they reach their largest size and greatest number in men between ages 20 and 40. Thereafter, they regress until, in elderly men, they can be detected only in atrophied form. These findings tally with the amount of smegma produced at various ages. Comparatively little is formed in childhood. A noticeable increase occurs during adolescence, with its great acceleration of penis growth. This is understandable because the penis is developing into its mature and adult form. Smegma is needed for the smooth operation of erection, particularly during adolescence, when sexual thoughts and dreams, nocturnal erections and masturbation are common.

The adult stage follows with its period of maximum sexual activity. Sexual intercourse becomes a regular feature of life, and the function of smegma for lubrication assumes its full value. Middle age follows with a decline in amount until there is a virtual absence of the substance in old age. These findings are, of course, subject to individual differences; in some men, the penis remains well preserved and functional even into extreme old age.

Does smegma also contain sebum, the natural oil produced by the sebaceous glands on ordinary skin? This question has been debated for many years, but Soviet researchers have at last supplied the answer. They find that in childhood sebaceous glands are, in fact, present in the inner surface of the foreskin. As age advances, these glands decrease in number, and in adult life occur only at the base of the foreskin, inconstantly and sparsely. Other researchers have found them in rather large numbers in some individuals. But, in general, it is now clear that, while sebum forms an essential part of smegma in childhood, it makes no significant contribution to it in later life.

Attention has also been directed to certain papules present in some men on the corona of the glans. Recently naming them 'pearly penile papules' – or P-3, for short, an American physician considers they are probably more common than is generally realised. They rarely cause trouble and, since they consist only of a network of blood vessels surrounded by connective tissue, they take no part in smegma production.

Smegma is a substance of considerable chemical complexity, but little is known of its exact composition beyond the fact that it contains neutral fats, fatty acids, sterols, other lipids and cell debris. Scientific investigation is difficult because, on exposure, smegma readily undergoes changes in chemical composition and physical consistency. It can differ in colour from yellow to white and may vary between individuals at different stages of life. It also varies in amount in relation to the so-called 'smegma producing capacity' of the foreskin cavity. In other words, a long or wide foreskin produces more smegma than a short or narrow one. This is to be expected, since the function of smegma is to produce a uniform general lubrication between foreskin and glans.

How do these matters affect American men? Circumcision in infancy is a near routine procedure in the US. One must suppose then that most men would lack smegma through an absence of foreskin. This will be true for those whose circumcision is complete. However, the operation is by no means an 'all-or-none' procedure. Surveys have shown that as many as one-third of circumcised men are left with a portion of foreskin that partially covers their glans. Adding to their number those individuals who have not been circumcised, we find a sizeable portion of men are still in possession of foreskins. Hence, from the practical point of view, it is important that they should realise the need for cleanliness of the foreskin cavity. This means, in effect, keeping it free from an undesirable collection of smegma.

In its fresh state, smegma is a wholesome and functional lubricant. But, if allowed to accumulate in the foreskin cavity, it becomes changed into an unpleasant, unhealthy and bad-smelling substance. Such changes are due to chemical splitting of smegma fats and the action of skin germs, which are otherwise harmless. In addition, foreign material may gain access to the smegma deposit in the form of dirt, dust or sand, urine and semen. Normally, a healthy foreskin may be retracted for cleansing, and smegma can be removed by washing. The fact that it is a superficial substance renders its removal easy, provided cleansing is performed regularly. Particular attention should be paid to the depths of the foreskin where smegma is liable to lodge in the pocket between foreskin and glans.

A very tight foreskin requires attention also. Without correct treatment, ill health of the foreskin is liable to occur. Deposits of smegma collect and harden within the foreskin cavity, which can lead to chronic disease and even prepare the way for cancerous changes. Cancer of the penis is not common in the US, but is frequent in certain tropical countries. It is almost always associated with uncleanliness and long-standing ill health of the penis. Since the tumour commonly develops within such a closed foreskin cavity, it has been considered that retained smegma could be the cancer-inducing agency. [Sexology editor's note: Cancer of the penis is now known to be associated with the presence of the human papilloma virus (HPV). Cancer of the penis may occur in both circumcised and uncircumcised men if HPV is present. Additional risk factors are hygiene, genital warts and number of sexual partners. Smegma is not now believed to be carcinogenic.]

Personal hygiene and cleanliness rank high as a protection for the penis. Remember that it is stale and accumulated smegma that is a source of ill health. Freshly formed smegma, washed away regularly and constantly replenishing itself, is a wholesome lubricant – making for ease of erection and smoothness in sexual intercourse.

Editorial

I recently went on holiday to Cap d'Agde, in the south of France, the largest naturist complex in Europe, and I thought that I should report back. On the first full day there, all the British who had arrived the day before were invited to a wine party by the travel agents. Looking around, it appeared that about half were circumcised, all of an older generation. Launched into the company of the other few thousand there, the percentage went right down, and those few that were, probably were British as well, and, of course, some Jews. The French were predominant, closely followed by the Germans and Swiss, with a few Spanish, Dutch and Italians.

What surprised me most was the conformity of foreskins. I would have thought that, as circumcision was so uncommon in these countries, I would find quite a few that, to our way of thinking, needed circumcising. But not so. 90% were open at the end to show the tip of the glans, or were short and showed up to half of the glans. The rest were almost closed at the tip. I saw no long overhangs, and only about five that might or might not be phimosed. There seems more variation in foreskins at home here. I asked myself if this was why circumcision took off in this country and not the rest of Europe, or maybe the Europeans with abnormal foreskins wouldn't go to a place where they could be seen. I asked a German why he had been circumcised, and he told me that he hadn't, but had a very short, almost non-existent foreskin.

Another thing that I noticed was that young men now appear to have bigger flaccid penises than were evident when I was young. You can't compare them with older men now, as half an inch is lost off the penis length for every stone overweight, and let's face it, most of us are overweight, so it has to be done from memory. There aren't all that many young people in naturism. They go with their family until they reach puberty and disappear until they are young marrieds in their early twenties, presumably because they are so self-conscious about their bodies during that period.

Prince William Again

I read on the Web (www.circlist.org) that there had been sightings of tabloid reports that Prince William had recently been circumcised at his own request. Have there been any other sightings of these reports? Which tabloids? When? Is the information considered reliable enough to warrant a change in the celebrity list status?

C.B. – Cambs.

[The original assertion appeared in a newsgroup well known for its trolls. The story has never been given chapter and verse by its author, nor corroborated by anyone else. It is unreliable and almost certainly untrue – especially given the tacit agreement amongst the press to allow William and Harry privacy in their personal lives. — V.Q.]

Ragged Skin At Penis Opening

I am 20 years old and quite concerned about a particular characteristic of my penis. Perhaps your consultant could give me some information on the subject. At the tip of the glans I have a little protrusion of flesh where the urethra opens. I guess the best way to describe it is that it looks like ragged skin. Also, the frenulum is stretched quite tightly even when I don't have an erection.

A friend says that he has heard of people having things called strictures which block the urethra and can sometimes resemble what I have described. He suggested that I try applying hydrocortisone cream to this little ragged spot to shrink it. Will this help? What could have caused this? Perhaps it might be important to mention that I masturbate by rubbing my penis just under the head at the frenulum between my thumb and forefinger instead of the seemingly more popular up/down stroking method. Please give me some help with this problem.

Answer:

First, there's no point in using a hydrocortisone cream. It won't do anything to shrink this piece of skin. You don't have to worry that this might be a urethral stricture, which is an internal problem that affects the flow of urine. Nor is this ragged skin related to your masturbatory technique.

This flap of extra skin may simply be part of your anatomy. Some people have a bit of additional skin in some places on their bodies. If you're circumcised, it's possible that this ragged bit of skin resulted from the circumcision. When the penis is circumcised it is very small, and may grow in ways that result in such variations. This flap of skin should not affect your enjoyment of sex, or of your partner's. If you remain concerned about it, I suggest that you consult a urologist for advice.

Islamic Cut

I wonder if I can add a little to the Islamic circumcision correspondence. I have no religious leanings whatsoever and was referred to a Harley Street doctor specialising in both male and female genital surgery. It was only during his examination of my foreskin that he mentioned that he was a Muslim, and that his normal practice was to undertake a radical circumcision, although adding that he would do partial circumcisions if asked to do so, i.e. leaving some skin at the base of the glans.

I confirmed that I would like to be cut right back and to lose my frenulum, which is what he did. As he finished, I remember him saying, "There, you are now fully circumcised in the Islamic way." This was of no significance to me, although the fact that it was radical meant a lot to me then, and continues to give me great pleasure.

To any member contemplating circumcision, I would recommend the radical version, but whatever you decide, do have your frenulum cut. It not only looks good but stops the glans from being held down.

Lone Voice?

Am I alone, or have other members noticed the worrying trend for Acorn to become a platform for the anti-circumcision lobby.

I cannot be the only member who is happy with his circumcision, and it would be nice to read more about the benefits and pleasures. Current trends discouraging mothers from allowing their newborn boys to be circumcised will mean that we will be a dwindling minority (maybe even a freak show to be pitied).

To those who want to keep their foreskins – it is your choice – but you don't know what you're missing. If you are cut and happy, now is the time to put pen to paper, either to Acorn or to me via Acorn.

Further Observations

I have of late taken more than a passing interest in the genitalia of my fellow gym users, and it has come to my attention that great many health conscious young men in the prime of their lives, and presumably at the height of their sexual vigour, seem to suffer (if that indeed is the correct term) from what can only be termed as 'the anteater look'.

Their foreskins are very tight, all enveloping, and protrude from the head of their penises by several centimetres. Their cocks therefore look like eye-droppers!

How I would like to carefully retract these heavy drapes of flesh to expose the glistening, sensitive bulbs of their glans penis for all to see. The purple and glistening jewel in their crowns with its single sad eye!

Whilst variations in penis size and shape add variety to the spice of erotic life, it would require the boldest of connoisseurs to find those cowed hoods appealing. No. The circumcised penis is bold and to the point: what you see is what you get, and no hidden surprises there...

Comments On 'Paeon To The Penis'

I have 'Paeon to the Penis' (3/98) in front of me as I write, and compliment K.G. of London on expressing sentiments with which I 95% concur. "I couldn't have expressed it better myself" is the cliché which springs immediately to mind. So why do I only give the piece a 95% rating? It's the phrase "all penises are a thing of beauty" which worries me. Some, admittedly only a few, strike me as being decidedly ugly. I'm not thinking about distressing deformities or pre-pubertal penises, which in the first instance are sad, and in the second instance are usually insignificant and (to me) just plain boring. I believe that, just as there are pretty or ugly faces, pretty or ugly hands, and even pretty or ugly general physiques, so some penises are emphatically prettier than others.

It's a topic I've often discussed before. It is very hard to define, but there is a certain balance between shaft length and thickness, and between shaft and scrotum, which I find more attractive in some guys than in others. Sometimes the whole ensemble seems to be set further forward on the lower abdomen than on other occasions when it seems to hang further back between the legs. Those which stand forward (or proud) always strike me as being more attractive. The level at which the scrotum hangs (slung low or held tight and high) also has a bearing on aesthetic appearance.

These are subtle qualities which subconsciously affect the degree of pleasure that I experience when viewing a 'genital set' for the first time. But they do not detract significantly from my general accord with K.G.'s view that penises are a joy to behold. It matters not whether they are large or small, thick or thin, cut or uncut, black or white, hard or soft – they are all beautiful. And that's why I can never understand why men, traditionally, tend to hide this wonderful asset from public gaze. This is in direct contrast to women who do everything in their power to make the most of their breast cleavage and voluptuousness, and dare the fashion designers to produce even skimpier bikinis and mini-skirts.

But there is more to 'Paeon to the Penis' than just K.G.'s praise of its appearance. At least another three of the recognised Five Senses contribute to its joys. Take feeling and touch for example. First of all there are the magnificent sensations within the organ itself and, indeed, in the whole body corporate of sexual arousal and orgasm. These ecstatic joys, surely, are more fundamental even than its visual appeal. But there is also a great sense of pleasure in fondling the texture of the skin and feeling the increasing fullness as tumescence advances. Yes, the touch of a good penis is as glorious as its sight. As a sexual 'oralist' I know the pleasures which are generated by taste and smell are not only mine, but are experienced by all those who share my predilection.

Only hearing is of questionable value when assessing penile attributes – although the rhythmic slapping of carefree masturbation can be music to the ears.

Doubts

I have always been an ardent enthusiast for circumcision, but recently I've begun to wonder about it. For example, at work yesterday I walked into the toilets which have unshielded urinals side-on to the entrance to see a young guy there gazing down in satisfaction as he took a leak. He had the sort of over-developed foreskin which I used to hate so much in myself, and which he obviously had no intention of retracting since his urine jet emerged from its tip. Meanwhile, I went and did what was necessary, washed my hands, and, as I left, noticed that he was still standing there staring contentedly down at his cock as he stretched and released the surplus skin adorning the end. This had the effect of increasing the unease I have felt for the last few months about having got myself done (and incidentally gave rise to this letter) since my observations in the toilets, and the sight of dozens of blokes previously performing at the stall, bring home to me the fact that none of the other guys at work, of my age, are circumcised, and furthermore, none of them choose to pull back their foreskins when they pee. In the past, I'd always thought this was a common practice for hygiene. The niggle at the back of my mind is that, as far as circumcision is concerned, I appear to be on my own, and I also seem to be the odd man out over the necessity for foreskin retraction.

I always wanted to be circumcised ever since my first girlfriend was reluctant to have sex with me because I hadn't been done. She told me her brothers had been circumcised and that girls were liable to get cancer from uncircumcised men. This made me feel terrible about my foreskin and I resolved there and then to get it removed. It took me a couple of years to muster the courage to do so. After leaving college I took a job in the Midlands and found lodgings with a landlady who turned out to be an absolute tart. She was about 15 years older than me and had a really filthy mind, every conversation being full of double meanings, and the phrase 'nudge, nudge, wink, wink' fitted her perfectly. I found all this quite worrying since I was desperately naive sexually, and was still not quite sure of my sexual orientation. Within three days of my arriving I found myself called into her parlour, where I was dumbfounded to see her ironing her knickers, fully dressed above the waist and totally nude beneath! She grinned at my evident dismay. "Don't worry about me, love. I don't believe in standing on ceremony", she said. I was prepared to believe her too as I feasted my eyes on the untidy black powder puff between her thighs, noticing with interest that lower down the lips had been depilated. I have since discovered that a lot of 'professional ladies' do this.

I began to understand what it was all about when a procession of commercial travellers stayed, and to my knowledge quite a lot of them were offered extra 'entertainment' for a consideration. I doubt if it got declared on her tax return. Eventually of course, I found myself escorted to her bedroom after several suggestive comments that it might be worth my while. I was as nervous as a kitten as she undressed me, eyed my limp penis speculatively before stripping off herself. I'd never seen a woman of her mature years nude before, and was desperately excited at the vista of massive female flesh as she revealed her over-ripe melons to me with another view of her powder puff and nether lips. I sat there on the bed, red as a beetroot, while she chuckled at my continuing state of dick droop. She told me not to worry but just give her a kiss, whereupon she grabbed me in a tight embrace and laid on top of me as she ran her lips over my neck and chest. I felt plenty of excitement of course, who wouldn't? But at the same time I was overwhelmed by panic and still failed to respond. She told me to relax, not to worry, and then said a little 'gam' would soon do the trick. Whereupon she seized my pathetic little flopper in her fist, dragged the skin down off the head, and popped it into her mouth like a boiled sweet!

I then started feeling sensations I'd never even dreamt about before and within seconds found myself rising to the occasion like a true hero, and the party started on its inexorable path to a crescendo of sexual bliss. I could hardly believe what had happened to me, since it was more like the sexual boasting of my friends which I knew was only fantasy. But here I was actually making the grade with a genuine nymphomaniac (tart, in fact, but I didn't realise it fully at the time). She looked on me as relaxation rather than a meal ticket, which was just as well since I was broke most of the time.

This became a regular treat when she had 'nights off' from her usual clientele of commercial travellers. She seemed to prefer oral sex, and I was also required, despite severe misgivings, to 'give my tongue a treat' before she'd consent to the finale. The most exciting experience for me though, was when she gripped my shaft between her teeth and pulled her head back, grazing the knob through the stretched foreskin before biting and tugging at the foreskin tip. I could only stand a little of this before being overwhelmed with feeling and flooding her mouth with come.

Eventually I revealed to her my enthusiasm for circumcision and intention to get it done. She smiled and said a lot of older men had had it done, but she reckoned it deprived a man of his male scent down there and made it less interesting for oral sex. Anyway, I was finally circumcised at the S.A.S. Clinic, and about three weeks later was just about fit to renew our sexual activity. She was dead curious to see what had happened but was not too keen on the still raw-looking wound, and refused from then on to apply her mouth to it or let me have normal sex. Instead she made me perform orally on her while she gave me a hand job. This was not very satisfactory for me, but what really got me down was the constant demand she made on my tongue. After giving her a couple of comes in the evening and falling asleep, I'd wake up to find myself fighting for breath as she straddled my face with my cock in her hand and demanded yet more oral satisfaction. This was all very fine, but I found myself waking up tired, and have been unable to face kippers for breakfast ever since.

She seemed to really enjoy belittling me and treating me in a high-handed way. She had a tarty friend of the same age and inclination, and used to invite her round so they could both heap indignities upon me. This systematic humiliation by two strong-minded women made me wonder if I'd done the right thing by getting myself circumcised. Although neither of them made disparaging remarks as such about my altered organ, their disgraceful conduct in pissing all over it could not have made their feelings any clearer. Immediately afterwards I moved out, feeling in the depths of depression when I should have been rejoicing at getting my wish to have myself circumcised granted. Afterwards I got myself a normal girlfriend and settled down to a more normal and contented life. My new girlfriend made no comment at all about circumcision except for her initial surprise since it was an unfamiliar sight to her. When I try and raise the subject though, she seems to find it embarrassing and refuses to talk about it.

Sex is fine now, but the excitement of the appalling things my landlady did lives on and I can no longer reach the heights of sensation I used to feel, especially when she used to apply her teeth to my foreskin. My present girlfriend is not too keen on giving me oral sex, but when as a treat she does, I have to admit I find it quite boring. Anyway, what's done is done and I'm determined to make the best of it. Have any other members had doubts about it after getting themselves circumcised? It would be useful to know.

The Frenulum

There is often a lot of controversy about the frenulum whenever circumcision is mentioned. In my own case I never had a tight or even obvious frenulum when I had a foreskin. However, a great number of uncut men have this obvious 'string' which causes them a great deal of discomfort when erect, with it being stretched tight so that intercourse can be quite painful. It brings to mind the letter from 'Amanda' (about 1994?) and how she helped her boyfriend by cutting his tight frenulum. This resulted in his being able to properly retract his foreskin, and completely changed their sex lives.

It seems to me that in this day and age when the medical world wants to leave nature alone, and circumcision is sadly not as popular a neonatal procedure as it should be, boys should be examined. Since there are often adhesions which prohibit an infant's foreskin being retracted, most will have been broken down by the age of 5 or so. During routine school medicals at about that age, a careful examination of the frenulum should be made, and if any degree of tightness is seen, it should be snipped under a local anaesthetic so that the boy will never have any problems in the future. To all intents and purposes the boy will be untouched but he will be able to retract his foreskin fully and will never have problems during intercourse.

Returning to the subject of circumcision and the frenulum, it seems quite illogical to leave any trace of frenulum when the penis has been rid of its foreskin. Certainly in my case, when I removed my foreskin, my one regret was that I was not circumcised as an infant like so many of my luckier friends. To this day I enjoy the slight feeling of bareness given to my denuded glans and also the feeling of always being 'aware' of that organ nestling in my pants. Should anyone have any comments, do drop me a line. [Or Acorn! — D.A.]

So-Called Muslims

I am really disgusted that someone who hasn't met me judges me in such a hostile manner in more or less branding me of religious bigotry. I have never been a bigot, but have been a very religious person who happens to be a very broad and open-minded human being. These comments are, of course, directed to R.B.W. I will always stand up for religion, and one more thing, Muslims have never forced circumcision on anyone. It was the so-called Muslims who did such things, and Islam tells Muslims not to force the faith on anyone, and all Muslims get annoyed that so-called Muslims use and abuse Islam in front of the non-Islamic community, whom I deeply respect and enjoy being with.

It is these very so-called Muslims who are ramming Islam down the throats of the non-Muslim people in Southern Sudan where all males are being forcibly circumcised that is going against these people's human rights and, above all, Islam. A Muslim would never forcibly circumcise anyone who isn't within the fold of Islam.

I wish R.B.W. all the very best in life and that his knowledge increases as all ours should as well. I do not expect this letter to be published as I feel there is still an anti-Islamic bias against Muslims and Islam.

Reply To 'No Hands', Issue 4/97

It's true that you can have an ejaculation without an orgasm, as Anon wrote in 4/97, You can do it once or twice more until you are dry, but it's very hard to achieve all the time because you have to reach a point exactly, and then – hands away!

It would be very interesting if we could read about some other methods, like the feelings after a period of chastity, or from a female aspect. These masturbatory ideas are not often discussed, although they must take place.

I like to see tight radical circumcisions. I haven't been cut yet, but I do have a tight foreskin and have been thinking about having it done for some time.

I also like to see very small endowments. My friend has one and it's always exciting to see. Perhaps someone like that is interested in corresponding or meeting? Each letter will be answered.

To the letter again. If you hold back at the right moment, you feel fine to start over again. You must have great will-power, as Anon wrote, but it is possible.

I wonder if we could have letters on other topics, like feelings after periods of chastity, use of condoms, orgasms without ejaculation etc. Members, tell us about your likes and dislikes, and let's start some nice discussions.

I hope there's a great response to this, and I'll write some more in future issues.

Greetings from H. O. – Vienna

Rabbis Rebuked

(Sunday Telegraph – 2.8.98)

Israeli parliamentarians have launched a campaign to stop the country's Orthodox rabbis conducting posthumous circumcisions. In the latest issue to divide secular and religious Jews, Israel's burial societies have been accused of circumcising dead bodies without informing the families involved. The societies say they are merely following religious law, which requires that a man be circumcised to qualify for a Jewish burial.

"If I find somebody who has not been circumcised, I will do it," said the director of a burial society, adding that once the body is presented for burial there's no need to consult the family. "If you come to a Jewish burial society, you know what to expect."

Enraged by such reports, MPs are trying to have the practice banned. An opposition MP has filed a complaint with the police, saying the practice is illegal. "In a modern country like Israel, we cannot bear behaviour like that," he said. "It's a question of fanatics, and we have to deal with fanatics inside Israeli society."

Members of the parliamentary committee on immigration and absorption have urged Israel's chief rabbis to guarantee circumcisions are performed only with approval of a dead man's family. The issue triggered heated exchanges during a recent committee debate. "Only I am responsible for my sexual organs," declared the leader of the left-wing party. "The religious establishment is not only taking control of our lives, it is controlling our deaths."

However, Israel's powerful religious parties argue that posthumous circumcisions are no worse than autopsies, which they oppose, "Why do you object to a circumcision, but when we're talking about an operation taking out the heart, lungs and other organs, you don't have a problem?" they say. Israel's burial societies, under the control of the country's Orthodox rabbis, say they cannot bury uncircumcised bodies, and that there are secular alternatives for families who do not wish to follow Jewish law. But while religious burials are state funded, civil ceremonies are very expensive. In fact, Israel's rabbis are divided on the issue of posthumous circumcisions, and at least one burial society has stopped performing the ritual act.

In recent years, the issue has come to light because of a large number of uncircumcised immigrants from the former Soviet Union. The government spent tens of thousands of pounds on circumcisions following the influx in the late eighties. Concerns ran high in religious circles that when it came to Jewishness, many of the estimated 800,000 new arrivals were distinctly lacking. Surveys suggest that at least a quarter of the immigrants are not Jewish at all. Anatomically, it seems, it is a question of too much, rather than too little. Although the operation for grown men is performed by doctors, not rabbis, many immigrants are understandably squeamish, preferring to take their secret to the grave. Unfortunately, thanks to burial societies, they can't.

My Circumcision

I do not remember when I first became aware about circumcision. I had been left intact as a baby and had a long, straggling foreskin – when I was fully grown it extended over half an inch beyond the tip of my penis. I was quite a naïve adolescent – there was no sex education at home or school, and my sketchy knowledge was picked up from friends and books. I can recall discovering for myself how the foreskin worked. One day, when I was about 12, I noticed that the skin could pull back. I started to do so, not knowing how far it would peel back, nor what I would find underneath. And so I discovered my glans!

I remember the word 'circumcision' as a word from the bible, picked on with great delight by some boys in religious studies classes. I looked up the word in old medical books that we had at home and I suppose that I became aware that circumcision was a procedure which was carried out on some boys and not others. At school, there were both cavaliers and roundheads and no-one made any big deal about which you were.

It was in my late teens that I began to be really interested in the subject. I liked the look of the shorn cock and wondered what it was like having the glans exposed. I even tried keeping the skin back, but the glans was so sensitive that I quickly drew the skin forward again. The defining moment came towards the end of my first year at university. I went swimming with a friend and afterwards we showered together. He looked at me and said "I see you've never been circumcised." (He himself was cut.) I replied that no-one had ever suggested it and he said: "You ought to get it done. It would be much better for you." "And how would I manage that?" "Oh, just go and see your doctor, he'll organise it." The conversation went no further, but I realised then, first that adults could be circumcised, and second that it might be better to be cut than uncut.

After that, I became very interested in the whole subject, and was very observant about people's status as cavaliers or roundheads. I again tried keeping my foreskin retracted, but the sensitivity of my glans always defeated me. Then I realised that if I was circumcised I would have no choice about my glans being permanently exposed. So I decided that I would choose a time and date a few days in the future, and would pretend that I was to be circumcised then. After that, I would keep my foreskin retracted. It took a lot of willpower – for about two weeks, I was aware of every move that I made. I seemed to be in a permanent state of erection, and yet my glans was extremely sore and tender. Several times I nearly gave up, but each time I argued with myself that, if I had really been circumcised, I would have no choice. Eventually, after about two weeks, the whole situation settled and thereafter, I kept my foreskin retracted virtually permanently. I was lucky in having a quite pronounced coronal ridge so that even though the foreskin was quite bulky, it rarely slipped forward.

Over the next few years my desire to be circumcised increased. As I met more men who had been circumcised, and discussed with them the advantages, I became convinced that I wanted to be a roundhead. This, however, was easier said than done. Whenever I had a medical I raised the subject. I also saw three different doctors to request the operation. Always the answer was the same. Although my foreskin was a little bit long it was perfectly healthy and there was no medical reason to remove it. I decided that the next stage in my campaign should be to feign balanitis (inflammation of the foreskin). I claimed that during hot weather I suffered from persistent irritation and soreness and I also induced a rash before medical appointments by applying spices or ointments like algipan. Even this however did not convince the doctors. I was treated sympathetically, told to keep clean and dry and was given creams to apply. I was even referred to a dermatologist. Sometimes circumcision was mentioned as a possibility, but when I pressed this I was told that it was a serious operation and that there were lots of things to try first. I began to despair of achieving my ambition and I even began to wonder whether converting to Judaism or Islam might be a way!

I then had a stroke of luck. I was in a business meeting one day when the person I was with said that he would have to call our meeting to a close since he had to collect his sons from hospital. I expressed my sympathy that both his sons were ill at once and he laughed and said that both had just been circumcised. When I said "Both?" he explained that his 15 year old son had developed a tight foreskin as he matured, and that he, the father, had decided to have his 12 year old son cut at the same time as a precautionary move. It seemed to me that any surgeon who would do a circumcision just as a precaution must be in favour of the operation and I managed to angle the conversation with the father to find out who the surgeon was. I was given a name in Harley St. I knew that consultants normally only saw patients referred to them by a GP. However I decided to write to this surgeon direct and I told him my well-rehearsed story about suffering from balanitis and asking whether he would see me with a view to performing a circumcision. I really expected not to receive a reply, or at least a negative response but a few days later a letter arrived offering me an appointment.

When I went to see him he listened very sympathetically whilst I explained the frequent irritation and discomfort which I suffered. He then examined me very carefully. When I was dressed again, he said that he was not surprised that a foreskin of that length was causing problems. (I was obviously lucky that in fact it wasn't!) In his experience, once a foreskin began to give trouble, it usually continued. On the other hand circumcision was almost always an effective cure and he was therefore prepared to do the operation for me. I felt an enormous sense of relief as I heard this and I had great difficulty in not smiling in triumph. I had just one last concern and this was about the amount of skin which would be removed. I had seen some circumcised men with whom it was difficult to tell whether they had been cut or whether they just had short foreskins. I wished to be more radically dealt with than that. I said that since the foreskin was causing problems I hoped that he would remove as much as possible. He said that I need have no worries on that score – he always performed a full circumcision whatever the reason for the operation. I would find after the operation that my glans was fully exposed. In fact, he warned me that this might cause some problems initially since I would probably find that the glans was very sensitive. I could help myself by starting to keep the foreskin pulled back before the operation so that the hardening off process would at least have begun. I didn't tell him that I had actually been wearing my foreskin retracted for a number of years. I also tried to persuade him to do the op under a local but he said that he always used a general. I was disappointed and I would have loved to have been awake whilst the operation was being performed. However, I had no intention of rejecting his services just because of that. Three weeks later I was admitted to a private hospital. I went in at lunchtime and the op was due to be done at 7p.m. The afternoon was taken up with visits from the nurse taking specimens and the anaesthetist giving a check-up and taking blood pressure. Then at 5.30 the nurse (fortunately a male nurse so my blushes were spared) came to get me ready. I was washed all round the pubic area (but not shaved I am pleased to say) and I was then tied into a surgical gown. It always seems strange that the gown came down to the knees when presumably in theatre it had to be shoved back up to my waist, but there must be some logic. As I put the gown on I took a last look at my uncircumcised penis with the foreskin straggling beyond the tip – untidy and forlorn looking. I had no regrets about bidding it farewell. I was then given an injection and drifted into a half daze. I remember looking at the label tied to my wrist saying 'Circumcision' and feeling pleased that it was now so near. Then I was wheeled off to the theatre and put properly to sleep. I was woken a couple of times in the night by the nurse who shone a torch down below but I was too groggy to take much notice. In the morning, however, I woke bright and clear, very hungry since I had starved from mid day the previous day and in no pain at all. In fact I took no pain-killers at all after the operation.

I stayed in hospital that day and the following night and early the next morning the surgeon came to remove the dressing. So my circumcised penis was revealed – and very bruised and battered it looked! The surgeon explained that this was normal – the skin was very sensitive and had been traumatised. He told me not to wear a dressing but perhaps to keep a piece of lint loosely around it to keep it clean. He said that the glans would probably be very sensitive now that it was exposed to the world and erections would also be painful (and they were) but not to worry as the stitches would not come apart. Sex was banned for three weeks.

Over the next week to ten days the stitches gradually dissolved and the scar started to subside. The whole area however was still very puffy and numb. When I saw the surgeon after a week he told me that this was perfectly normal and that both symptoms would gradually go. He was right, although it took about three months before I could say that I had a fully healed circumcised penis.

I had had a slight concern before the operation that afterwards I might regret losing my foreskin. I must say however that I have never had a moment's regret. I was very pleased with my remodelled penis and proud of the exposed glans. I was much less shy about undressing in public. Whereas before, I had tended to keep myself covered as far as possible in changing rooms, now I didn't mind who had a look! Sex seemed better without the glove of foreskin and masturbation was still pleasurable! In all it was a success and I could only wish that it had been done earlier – say when I was 3 days old!

My only slight regret was that the surgeon hadn't been quite as severe as he had promised. Although the glans was fully exposed, there was still a ring of foreskin which tended to bunch behind the glans rim when the penis was flaccid. This niggled a bit and I would have preferred the type of circumcision that I saw some other men had where there appeared to be no spare skin at all. I assumed however that there was no way I could get an adjustment – it had been difficult enough getting the first operation. Even if the surgeon who did that hadn't by now retired I knew he would throw me out on my ear if I asked to be tidied up.

I then read something in Forum which suggested that the Surgical Advisory Service did revisions. I was very reluctant still to expose myself to possible ridicule there. However, as it happened, a small cyst had developed on the circumcision scar line and since the SAS also advertised minor ops I decided to have this removed and to see whether there was any chance of raising the question of a revision. I duly made an appointment, got to see the consultant and dropped my trousers and pants. He checked the cyst and said that it could easily be removed. He then looked at me and said: "Is that all?" So I plucked up courage and asked whether when he did the operation, it would be possible to tighten up the skin at all. He immediately became very enthusiastic. He examined my penis again and then said that there was surplus skin which he could remove. He suggested that he should do a complete re-circumcision so that he took away skin right around the shaft. He would cut the frenulum at the same time so that he could get a really tight effect. When I asked whether he would recommend the operation, he said that he thought that it would be very beneficial. It would be much better for the glans to be fully and permanently exposed.

So three weeks later I presented myself for the operation. I removed trousers and briefs and lay on an operating table with my shirt pulled up around my chest. This time I had my wish that it should be done under local anaesthetic although I was asked to fold my arms over my chest so that I couldn't actually see what was going on. He injected me and then after what seemed a very short time, he started.

He explained to the nurse that this operation was a bit different because I had already been circumcised but not enough skin had been taken away. I asked whether this was a frequent problem. He said that not many men went as far as a revision but in his opinion many of the circumcisions which he saw in the course of his duties were not as complete as they might be. Whilst he was working, I asked whether he got much response to the circumcision advert and he said that there were an increasing number of men seeking the operation. I asked whether he was in favour of routine circumcision and he said very much so. It was best if it was done as a baby but a man could benefit from it at any age and he would certainly recommend any uncircumcised man to consider the operation.

At only one point did I feel any pain. I yelped a little and he apologised and explained that he had just cut the frenulum which was very sensitive. At that I felt quite satisfied because it meant that I was now really radically circumcised. I was aware of him working on one side and then the other, and then very quickly it was over and he was putting a dressing on. It must have been a maximum of 20 minutes. I was then told to dismount, get dressed and rest for a little while in the waiting room where I could have a cup of coffee.

In the waiting room there was a man in his mid-twenties, looking a bit nervous. I smiled and said: "I'm glad that's over." He asked: "What did you have done?" "Circumcision." "Me too!" he said. "Well, you'll be much better off without it." "I know" he replied "I've wanted it done for the last ten years." And with that he was called into the surgery. Twenty minutes later he returned. "Well, I don't know what it looks like, but I feel great," he said. It was funny really, two men with highly damaged equipment feeling very pleased with themselves. But we both knew that we should very soon reap the benefits of our soreness. I was then called out, my dressing was checked to make sure there was no bleeding, I was given a prescription for painkillers and antibiotics, I paid and left. As with my first circumcision, the discomfort which I experienced was minimal and the painkillers remained untouched. An unpleasant feature was the dressing. I had been told to keep it on for 48 hours but it came right up the penis virtually to the meatus (presumably because the frenulum had been removed) and so the dressing quickly became soaked with urine. This I found very unpleasant and it was a relief to be able to take the dressing off after the stipulated time. This time the penis did not look so damaged – no puffiness probably because most of the actual foreskin had now gone. I was a little concerned that there still seemed to be slight bleeding where the frenulum had been removed and in fact this continued for about five days forming a haematoma. I was thinking I would have to return to the surgery but it did at last stop. The resulting blood blister however did take some weeks to dry up and eventually go. The stitches gradually dissolved over a week or ten days although they left slightly raised lumps which again took some time to subside. I think a different stitching technique must have been used from the first time. Anyway, in due course, everything healed up properly.

So what does it look like now? The skin is now reasonably tight on the shaft and there is no surplus skin to ruck up behind the ridge. This means that the glans is fully exposed including the underpart of the rim, running right round to the V-part of the underside of the glans where the frenulum had been. I have at last got the really radical circumcision that I wanted.

And my opinion now? Firstly, I believe that my glans has expanded through being exposed on all sides. Secondly, this has been an added bonus to the improvement in appearance which the operation brought about anyway. Thirdly, the exposure of the underside of the rim, which is a very sensitive area, has been very beneficial both in sex, where the whole penis head is subject to stimulation without any skin covering, and in masturbation, where all surfaces are open to exploration.

I have always been an advocate of circumcision. Now I believe that the most radical cut confers the greatest benefits. If only cavaliers knew what they were missing, they would be queuing up for it.

Editorial

A profusion of circumcision stories in this edition. I won't apologise, as most members know that I feel if someone goes to a lot of trouble to write up their story then it should be told.

The following should, by rights, be found in the celebrity status columns, but as I'm writing here I might as well put it in here. During the last two weeks in October, late at night on Channel 4, two films by the British director, Peter Greenaway have been shown. One can always count on seeing a load of bare bodies in his films. The first, The Baby of Macon, starred Ralph Fiennes, who, like most of the rest of the cast, came to a gory end. He spent some time cavorting naked on the screen and, although it was easy to see that he sported a foreskin, the photography was all in a red hue which made it difficult to pick out the finer elements.

The second film, The Pillow Book, was a different kettle of fish entirely. It starred the British actor Ewan McGregor (who also came to a sticky end, having his skin peeled off his body, the meat of him cut up and put in a garbage lorry). It was all about a Japanese girl writing on bodies, so he spent most of his scenes, as did most of the men, in the nude with a lot of full frontal. Ewan has what could be called the perfect natural penis, with a smooth foreskin which just allows the tip of his glans to show, and would probably disappear when he is erect to possibly 6.5" plus. Two other young British men stood full frontal as well, and they could have been replicas of McGregor's. One Japanese young man had his foreskin retracted in his first scene, but had it brought forward in the second. His foreskin was short, as was his penis. A second Japanese also had a small penis, this time though, with a long pointed foreskin. A young fat American, cut, was scorned by the girl for having a tiny one, and a sumo wrestler type had nothing but a wad of pubic hair. Unlike most Greenaway films, this one had sharp lighting, the better, I suppose, to see the Japanese writing all over the bodies. As it was a premier showing, one can expect it to be shown again in the future.

Fulfilment

What a revelation! I received the bounty of five editions of Acorn last Monday evening and read them all through before turning off the light after midnight. Even then I didn't get to sleep for twenty minutes or so...! Thank you for producing such an interesting publication, and one which addresses in an adult and stimulating way a subject that has fascinated me from my earliest years, that of circumcision.

I don't know why I find it so all-absorbing. I recall bath times as a lad, when I shared the tub with my older brother who was cut. Right from that time I held a resentment that I was not. Was I not good enough to be treated in the same way as him? Was I inferior? Why couldn't I have it too? I remember at the age of ten or so trying to draw back my foreskin and fix it with metal grips, hoping that it would stay like that; that I would then be 'circumcised' too! Laughable? – well perhaps, but it shows the strength of my feelings on the subject even then. I wonder if other men have felt this at such an early age.

Soon after, when my sexual feelings for boys and older men began to stir, I regarded those who were cut as a special super species, particularly honoured in life and desirable to me in a very strong way. That feeling has not changed and even now, in my early fifties, I regard a sexual experience with a circumcised man as quite radically different and more thrilling and fulfilling than with an uncut guy. (Sorry, lads!)

And I am still unable to understand how the subject (and the difference) appears to be entirely unimportant to the majority of gay guys I meet. To me it is of the essence.

I lived my first thirty eight years languishing and dissatisfied with my boring foreskin. How ordinary my cock looked, even when the skin was retracted and I tried to 'pretend'. Fortunately I had a slight problem in that area with the tightness of the skin, which caused soreness. The sympathetic, even enthusiastic, doctor I consulted actually advised an operation. I was overjoyed! At last I was to become one of the elite. The operation was performed with just the customary temporary discomfort and I spent one night in hospital. Once the bandage was removed I had become a new man and had a penis of which I could be really proud – and still am.

Of course there are differences in things I do. I can't wear boxer shorts because the lack of support they provide allows things to move around too much and I find myself becoming embarrassingly stimulated within a very short time! And of course sex is rather different too. Previously, when masturbating, I had always liked the skin pulled sharply back at the moment of ejaculation; it made the orgasm very exciting. That is not possible now of course, but after the op I was left with a little loose skin, just enough to move gently back and forth over the ridge, and it saved things becoming too sore and reduced the need for much extra lubrication. I have some sympathy for men who are so cut that there is nothing to manipulate in this way, but they seem to manage well and enjoy their sex lives even so! Oral sex is quite wonderful now and aesthetically – such a handsome beast! Should anyone be in doubt as to whether to proceed, my advice is "Don't hesitate". It just seems a shame that so few such ops are done nowadays.

As a member of a swimming and keep fit centre (admittedly in an affluent part of London) I am impressed by the number of late teen to early thirty aged men that I see there who are cut. Perhaps that is a function of the idea that 'upper crust' blokes' parents had a higher regard for the op than other folks and I believe that that principle still holds true today, albeit to a lesser extent.

Well, there's one man's experience of reaching fulfilment by circumcision and I would be very interested to learn of any others with similar histories; specially younger men, because in a world of diminishing circumcision their cut state is very much in the minority.

From Tight Phimosis To Full Retraction

One Man's Stretching Experience

I grew up as the only intact boy in my area. I owe my good fortune to having unusually savvy parents. When a nurse came to take me to be circumcised, my parents said "no" because no male in my family had ever been circumcised or had any problems with his foreskin. Also, my grandfather was a druggist and had had to correct physicians' prescriptions so that the doctors didn't injure or kill their patients. At a time when most people treated doctors as if they were gods, my parents knew better.

My foreskin was long and tapered well into puberty. As a kid, I enjoyed looking into the tube and wondering where it went. I didn't see my urethral opening until I was about 12 and didn't see the corona of my glans until I was 16. Even into my 20's, the opening during erection was only about one-quarter inch across. I could stretch it but not enough to slip it back over the glans.

I let my foreskin develop naturally partly because I didn't know any other intact guys and therefore didn't know there was anything unusual about my penis. When I was a freshman in high school, I noticed one other intact boy in the locker room and was surprised that his foreskin wasn't long like mine. But I had no reason to think his penis was more typical than mine.

I was in no hurry to stretch my foreskin because I had enough skin to comfortably accommodate an erection and it was elastic enough that masturbation was pleasurable.

The first time I heard a circumcised college roommate masturbating in the upper bunk, I didn't know what he was doing because his masturbation was so violent that it didn't seem like the same peaceful, quiet activity as mine.

In my 20's, I was dating and enjoying sexual intimacy, including heavy petting, and wanted to begin sexual intercourse. I contemplated a moderate circumcision, just having the tight ring cut off, so that the remaining foreskin would slip all the way back. I didn't know at the time that this would have destroyed a great number of erogenous nerve endings. I also didn't know that doctors often ignore requests for a moderate circumcision and cut off the entire foreskin. In any case, before resorting to circumcision I wanted to try stretching. As a child, I had seen pictures of African Ubangis who had stretched their lips to six or more inches across. If they could stretch their lips, surely I could stretch my foreskin.

At first, I tried to retract it when my penis was flaccid but I became almost instantly erect. So I started stretching gently every evening with my penis erect. What I did was very simple. I didn't use lubricant. I encircled my penis between my thumb, which I placed at the corona, and my index and middle fingers, which I pressed against the underside of my penis in the area of the frenulum and urethra, and gently pulled my foreskin back. I pulled until there would have been discomfort if I had pulled any harder, then let it return to its relaxed forward position over the glans. I repeated this for about ten minutes, then masturbated to ejaculation. I let the semen remain in my foreskin until I showered the next morning. Perhaps hyaluronidase in the semen helped loosen my foreskin, because this enzyme is a potent skin relaxer. After about five months, I could retract my foreskin all the way with no discomfort.

That was over 30 years ago, and I have never had a single problem with my penis during all the years since. I've never had a problem with smegma build-up even though I couldn't wash completely under my foreskin for many years.

I have always been glad I stretched my foreskin because I've found that a fully retractable foreskin makes entering a vagina easier and more comfortable and sexual intercourse more enjoyable for both me and my wife. As I start to enter her, my outer foreskin, which has no natural lubrication, comes into contact with her outer unlubricated labia and is held there a moment by friction. As I continue to enter slowly, this friction causes my naturally lubricated glans to slip out of my foreskin and past my wife's naturally lubricated inner labia into her vagina. The smooth, lubricated inner foreskin follows the glans past the inner labia and into the vagina smoothly and pleasurably, without friction.

For many men, the foreskin undoubtedly slips back and forth over the glans during intercourse as they thrust in and out. But because my glans is unusually wide and my corona rather pronounced, once my foreskin retracts, it stays back until I slip it forward again. During intercourse, my foreskin remains behind the glans. Because of the abundance of supple skin on the shaft (both foreskin and shaft skin) and because we are both naturally lubricated, intercourse is very comfortable for us both.

Even if stretching had not worked, I now know that there are other simple ways to safely make a tight foreskin retractable without cutting, including, for example, topical application of the common steroid cream, beta methasone valerate 0.05%.

I hope other males with tight foreskins who want to be able to retract them find these comments helpful.

New Member's Experience

I am just writing to say how pleased I am to have joined the Acorn Society. I am only saddened that I hadn't heard of it years ago, as my interest in circumcisions and penises has spanned many years. It has been fascinating to read in the back issues the varied views on all aspects of circumcision and what some consider aesthetically pleasing and some don't.

May I take this opportunity to introduce myself to the rest of the members and tell you something of myself. I am a 38-year-old bi-sexual guy living in Jersey. About 8 years ago I decided to have a circumcision after suffering years of an excessively long foreskin that basically just got in the way. Even when fully erect my foreskin still covered most of the head of my cock. When I did pull it back I was left with a load of extra flesh that I found uncomfortable. Having been brought up with two brothers and a father who were all circumcised, I longed to get rid of this elephant trunk of a foreskin. Simply peeing, required me to stand there and peel back my skin until I could get access to my cockhead. Otherwise I was left with wet shoes, and whatever, as the pee stream went all over the place. I had to put up with this for years, as the family GP that I had was dead against circumcision.

I was always envious of owners of cut cocks, as their penises seemed to be so little trouble and clean-looking. After asking for years, since about 7 or 8, to have a circumcision, I decided to go ahead and at my own expense rid myself of my troublesome appendage. There are plenty of adverts for cosmetic surgery clinics, and all seem to offer male circumcision.

I contacted a cosmetic surgery clinic and went over to London for my operation. I had to go to an address in Central London. After confirming my appointment I went downstairs to the waiting area to meet the surgeon. He was a friendly chap who, after giving me a general checkover and a look at my penis, asked my reasons for having the operation done. I told him it was for practical as well as appearance sake. He told me that his patients were split about 50/50 cosmetic or medical need.

I had to remove all my lower clothing and lie on the operating table. Calming music played in the background, and he was assisted by a nice Australian nurse. Perhaps the most painful part was at the beginning, in order to numb the area. As I was having a local anaesthetic he had to inject the skin just under the cockhead. This was agony, as the skin here is probably the most sensitive of the surfaces of an uncult penis. I really squirmed as he injected the frenulum and made a series of injections underneath the head of my penis. As the anaesthetic began to work, he popped my cock through a little hole in the cloth that covered my thighs. He put on some stinging antiseptic cleaning fluid that was freezing cold. By slightly raising my head I could watch the whole operation.

He pulled my foreskin right back and then right forward as far as it would go, and then marked various places with a pen. He then got a pair of scissors and made the first cut, right up the middle of my foreskin. I was surprised how little bleeding there was. He then cut with a scalpel around the circumference and freed the outer and inner skins. He then stitched as best he could as my penis had swollen up massively by then. He commented that it was unusual for his patients to take an interest in the operation as most of them are too squeamish to watch their own circumcision. I didn't tell him that I found the whole operation intensely fascinating and, even dare I say it, quite a sexual turn-on. I had dreamed of this day for a long while and couldn't wait to try out my 'new' cut cock. He dressed the wound with gauze and a long bandage. My penis had now swollen up to an enormous size from the trauma and was stinging a bit, but otherwise OK. He gave me a prescription for some painkillers, something to stop me getting erections at night, antiseptic cleaning ointment, fresh gauze, and a little pamphlet to take with me about aftercare, cleaning, etc. I then made my way slowly up to the airport for my flight home.

After 48 hours, I soaked off the gauze in a warm bath. My penis was still enormous from the swelling and very sensitive, with a row of stitches round it. At last a cut cock to be proud of! However, my joy didn't last long. As the swelling went down, more and more skin moved forward until I was left with a cockhead that was only half uncovered and the skin hanging to one side. I was furious and contacted the surgeon and told him that I wanted a full circumcision and not what I had ended up with. I then went over to London again and he operated on me for a second time. This time when I got back to Jersey and had a look at the end result, it was even worse. Although he had cut away a lot more of the skin covering the head, he had left a lump of skin sagging down, and his stitching skills were not what I would describe as very good. Some of the stitches were coming undone because they hadn't been done properly. I complained again and demanded that they get it right or I would go to another surgeon and send them the bill. So off I went to London again for a consultation with the surgeon who admitted that it wasn't one of his best jobs, and without charge he would put it right. Back I went to London about a fortnight later and had my third and, hopefully, final operation. This time he took a lot longer and cut away the frenulum and the saggy flesh underneath. He also stitched in a relatively straight line this time. To fully expose my cockhead, he cut away a lot more of the skin and pulled it tighter. I was in a lot of pain this time because the skin pulled on my stitches whilst my penis was so swollen. But on getting back to Jersey and soaking off the gauze I was delighted with the result this time.

It now looks the way I wanted. The head of my penis is much bigger now than my pre-cut days, because of its new freedom. It is noticeably less sensitive, but I think that's a small price to pay for a cleaner looking penis and getting rid of my elephant trunk. I have been left with a very obvious raised scar line about half an inch under my cockhead. I also have a scar line running vertically down underneath my cock, about an inch or more long, where the surgeon cut away my frenulum and the extra skin. I actually like this scarring, as I feel it is a mark of having undergone my ordeal of pain to achieve what I wanted. I like the look of scarred cut cocks as it is like belonging to an exclusive club. I find it a massive turn-on to talk about circumcision and the actual operations. I love looking at cut cocks and seeing all the different ways they have been cut. I wished that I had heard of the Acorn Society years ago.

I hope you have enjoyed reading about my circumcision and I would love to correspond with other guys who like the cut look. I am also interested in ritual/ceremonial circumcisions and photos of cut cocks of all types, colours etc.

Cut And Uncut

The tight skin on an erect circumcised shaft gives better friction on penetrating women and men than the loose skin on the shaft of an uncircumcised cock.

It works like this. For every inch that a cut cock is inserted and withdrawn, there is a full inch of 'rub' between the tight skin of the cock and the vaginal or anal contact point. There is no surplus skin to ride up, and every inch produces friction between the two partners.

In the uncut cock, the hard core of the shaft is travelling backwards and forwards within its loose sleeve of skin, the surface of which can be stationary against the vagina or anus gripping it. The shaft is therefore working in and out within its own loose skin, and there is less friction from person to person. I have not seen this aspect of circumcision discussed before.

So what makes me so sure? I am 50 and was cut at 40. My young friend is 25. He is uncut and the proud possessor of a very large well-formed penis with a very attractive head covered with a quite dainty and helmet-hugging skin. He has no medical need for circumcision, indeed he looks most attractive as he is. He showers at his sports club in roundhead mode and his peers believe him to be one of the small band of roundheads in a large company of cavaliers. He is straight but openly discusses cock matters. I wank him by pulling his shaft skin back tightly and applying baby oil. It gives him the most intense orgasms he has ever achieved. As does a similar exercise in the jacuzzi. He is contemplating circumcision. He finds the tightness of a hard shaft irresistibly attractive.

Although bisexual, I am currently in a gay phase, as you may guess. At my local sauna, about one in six men are cut – mainly older men. Possibly military service had something to do with it. Among the young, only about one in twenty are cut. They are, however, fascinated by the subject and listen attentively when us roundheads hold forth on the subject.

Another Helping Hand

I would like to respond to A.C. (4/98). I found his article most stimulating and must commend him for his helping of the Czech teenager to achieve his radical circumcision and frenulum removal. I wonder how many men in his position would have gone out of their way to help a stranger in this manner? It is obvious that the boy had a strong desire for a circumcised penis and his chances of being cut were very slim until A.C. put his hand in his pocket to pay for the operation. He says that a number of the boy's friends are interested. I wonder if they will find other generous benefactors such as A.C. to help them achieve their desires.

A number of years ago, I was running a small farm with occasional hired labour and I took a youth on as a farm boy and a boarder. Carl was a 16 year-old lad, good-looking and slim built. I was living alone in the farm cottage and Carl moved in with me. He was very shy and kept himself covered up most of the time, but I did notice one time when he got out of the shower that he was uncut and had a short length of overhanging foreskin. It was about two months after he began living with me when my 14 year-old nephew Paul came to stay for a long weekend. Carl befriended the boy and they spent many hours together. After the boy had gone home, Carl and I were sitting in the kitchen and he suddenly asked me why Paul's penis was so different to his own. He had seen Paul dressing and noticed that the end of the boy's penis had no loose skin on the end of it and there was a scar round his shaft. I knew that Paul had been circumcised when he was 10 and realised that Carl had seen the results of this. He wondered why Paul's penis was scarred and why it looked so different to his. I explained to him about circumcision and how a boy's foreskin is cut off to permanently expose his glans. I told him that many people preferred the neat clean look of a well-trimmed penis and proud knob that couldn't ever be covered up. I asked Carl if he liked the look of the circumcised penis that he'd seen. "Yes!", he nodded, "I wish I could have mine done like that. It would be great."

I am very pro-circumcision, so I offered to pay for Carl to be circumcised if that was what he wanted. He was overjoyed and asked me to tell him in detail just what would be done to his dick during his circumcision. The bulge in his jeans revealed his swelling erection as I told him how a circumcision was usually performed and the probable results on his penis. He begged me to arrange for his circumcision immediately. I made arrangements with our doctor, who I knew favoured circumcision, to recommend him to a surgeon for the operation. I requested a radical cut for him and complete removal of his frenulum. The doctor examined his penis and found that there were no adhesions but he did have a slight phimosis and his foreskin could only be retracted with a little difficulty. A week later, Carl was circumcised at the local hospital and he was left with a neat scar well back on his shaft with a smooth area in the vee of his sulcus where he used to have a frenulum. He was, and still is, very pleased with the result. As far as I am concerned it was money well spent to help a youth become circumcised as he desired.

Carl's operation was carried out in the morning, under local anaesthetic, and we were back home just after midday. As the anaesthetic wore off, Carl was in some discomfort and pain, so he lay on his bed while I fetched some painkillers for him. These eased the pain, and by drawing up his knees he took some tension off the incision. He had some pain during the first two nights when, during sleep, his wounded penis attempted to erect, waking the lad with a sharp ache. It took three weeks for all the stitches to dissolve and the cut to heal completely. Even so, it was red and sore for quite a while after. Carl was proud of his circumcision with its neat scar halfway down its shaft and the smooth area where his frenulum had been cut completely away. His shyness disappeared and he had a confident air. Every chance he got he would walk around the house naked. He became quite a nudist. I didn't mind as I enjoyed seeing the youngster with his proud knob exposed and protruding ahead of him as he walked around. This was ten years ago, and Carl is now 26 and married. He and his wife have a son and, as you might imagine, he has been circumcised since birth.

Ibiza — Uncovered Or Covered

It has been weeks now since my Summer holiday to Ibiza. I went at the beginning of September and I had a really interesting time. I spent all my time over there on the only two naturist beaches there.

I have travelled extensively, over the past 15 years, to quite a few European countries, But I have never seen such a liberal attitude by such a large number of guys as on Ibiza, this year in particular.

I was quite amazed at the diversity of cocks that were on show to me. And there were so many guys there that I couldn't help but look at them parading and lying around with their cocks swinging and just lying there, pointing in my direction.

Yes, a great majority of them were cavaliers, as most of them were of course German and Dutch, British of course, and a small amount of Spanish and other nationalities as well. But there were quite a lot of guys who were also circumcised, and out of the 30 or 40 who I could see around me, there were, I would say, 10 guys including myself who were cut. And, NO, I didn't see, or observe, any of the said cavaliers with their foreskins rolled back, as was stated in a past edition of the magazine. They were all forward, and again, so many interesting differences in the length of their foreskins. Some had long ones, and others just covering, so that the glans was just showing, which I love.

Also, I must add to this small write-up, there were a few guys who were cut, and supported, like me, a great amount of body jewellery of some sort in their cocks, A vast amount of them had the popular Prince Albert piercing. Of course there were also a great many cavaliers who also supported a ring in their cocks as well.

So it was quite an eye-opener to say the least, and I was intrigued to see how many guys enjoyed just showing off their tackle to all on the beach. There were also a large element of guys on the beach who remained covered up, which was a pity really, but I'm not going to pre-judge them for their reasons why they covered up, as we are all different. But my sole interest was observing all the naked ones.

So I hope that this letter will encourage other members to write in about their Summer Holiday experiences this year, and hopefully write about their experiences on nudist beaches. Come on guys, get writing.

Lack Of Sensitivity

My husband and I enjoy reading Acorn, and we really feel that you make a valuable contribution to promoting a greater awareness of the effects of circumcision, which can be far-reaching. We do, however, take issue on one or two matters and in particular, advocacy of child circumcision, and feel you should know that it is not the unmitigated blessing some of your contributors suggest.

Although some circumcised children grow up unaffected by it, a lot of others feel differently, and some really hate being circumcised – my husband among them. The background as far as I am concerned is as follows:

Like all young girls I used to enjoy watching my little brother being given his bath, and noted with great interest how my mother used to pull back his foreskin to wash it. Later, when I was allowed to bath him myself, I took great delight in doing the same thing myself, taking his soapy little penis in my fingers and sliding the elastic tube of skin back over the shiny purple cherry. At first I found it quite difficult as the foreskin didn't uncover easily, tending to shoot forward again if I relaxed my grasp at all.

Having started off as a foreskin fancier, I remember at an early age asking a boy to let me get his tummy finger out and pull the loose skin back to see his knob. Later, I took great delight in the foreskins of my many boyfriends, especially if they were long and close-fitting like my brother's. It really turned me on to chat a boy up and to guess what his foreskin was like. I always got a thrill when I first got a boy's cock out of his trousers and stretched the foreskin back over his knob and watch his knees give slightly as I did so.

Until I met my husband I had hardly even heard of circumcision, thinking that it was an exotic and unusual practice restricted to Jews and primitive tribes in Africa. I was overcome with curiosity when I first saw my husband's cock, to see that the only trace of a foreskin was a raw-looking bunch of skin under his knob, while the knob itself was all dry, wrinkled and greyish in colour. I tried to hide my disappointment in not having a foreskin to play with, but it was only after we were married that the real problems manifested themselves. The main one as far as I was concerned was my husband's lack of sensitivity. With all my previous boyfriends I had learned to use the foreskin as an orgasm regulator when I masturbated them. To make them come slowly I would pull the skin right back and gently manipulate the shaft, avoiding touching the glans with dry fingers because it was too sensitive to touch. To make the guy come quickly, I would slide the foreskin to and fro over the knob, but without uncovering it, stretching it further and further forward until his sperm spurted, and caught the lot in his extended foreskin, squeezing it out like hair gel from a tube.

But I am at my wit's end to know how best to masturbate my husband. His glans is so insensitive that it would need sandpaper to produce any reaction.

There is not enough of his penile skin left to slide over his knob, and even with KY jelly it takes up to half an hour to make him come. Similarly, when we have intercourse I invariably orgasm before he does, and the friction of his immobile bunch of skin and dry knob soon make me so sore that sex has now become a chore instead of a pleasure.

My husband is as distressed about it as I am. He gets so moody as well when the subject is raised. He is very aware that he is the only circumcised man in our circle of friends, and the only time it is mentioned is in jokes, since it seems that circumcision jokes are now considered quite sophisticated and much appreciated by both men and women. But it is clear that it is only those not involved, ie, uncircumcised men and their women, who feel comfortable with circumcision jokes. Quite recently, for example, we had some friends round and one of the girls told a hilarious joke about circumcision. My husband sat white-faced and silent for the rest of the evening. At another party we went to, another girl brought out some holiday snaps, one of which showed her and her husband reclining on their towels, naked on a nude beach. His uncircumcised penis appeared so big and fat, from the perspective it looked as though he might have an erection. It was lying on his tummy like a huge German sausage, with the tip of his foreskin almost reaching his navel. He was looking down at it with satisfaction, while she was leaning over as if for a close-up view, and laughing. This gave rise to a string of ribald remarks, indicating envy on the part of the men and admiration on the part of the women. My poor husband went white again, got up and left the room. This time it was noticed and I was asked what the trouble was. I explained, and they were all amazed and sympathetic to hear that he'd been circumcised.

His attitude is really getting me down, and I honestly don't know if I can cope much longer. I really curse his mother for having him done, and blame her for wrecking our sex life. Apparently, the only reason for it was because she had read in an old medical book that it promoted cleanliness, which is ridiculous, and in no way justifies disfiguring the genital organs of a little boy. Those who claim otherwise are guilty of double standards in a big way – if males are so filthy they need a surgical operation, what are we going to do about females? After all, a neglected foreskin can hardly be more unpleasant than a neglected vulva and no one would dream of removing a little girl's labia because it 'promoted cleanliness'. The pubic hair of even the most fastidious of women will always have a smell of stale urine, and the sexual folds almost always harbour traces of 'cheese' – going down on a woman is not for the squeamish – whereas I have never found any of my previous boyfriends' foreskins offensive in this respect. I'd have dropped them like a brick if I had!

No, to my mind, foreskins are for fun, and an important factor in procuring sexual pleasure. It is cruel to circumcise little boys and shows a disregard of the feelings of both males and their female partners. In my case it is definitely harming my relationship, and I am not sure how much longer I can continue in it.

This is a genuine problem, but I have to remain anonymous for obvious reasons. I've written to you since it's not a subject I can discuss openly.

R's Story

I am now 47 and I was circumcised at 33 – one of the most joyous days of my life. Although the following is all very much about me, me, me, I hope my experiences will be of some use (or at least, interest).

I saw my first circumcised cock when I was about 6, and I remember thinking immediately how much I wanted one like that. The friend who I had seen told me that he'd been born with some skin but that had been removed with some cream. I don't recall if I believed him, but I resolved that I was going to be like that.

I spent a long time trying to keep the skin back. I don't recall whether it was tight to start with, but I think it can't have been, because there was no difficulty keeping it back with zinc oxide plaster (the opposite use to that some involved in foreskin restoration techniques use it for!). Unfortunately, the plaster used to slip down and itself start covering the head and – of course – the skin would cover the head again when I took the plaster off (essential when parents might be about).

Whether this led to me having a short foreskin, or whether I'd have had one anyway, I shall never know, but it became easier over the years to keep the skin back – though not nearly easy enough, and there was the constant problem of it going forward. One or two men I slept with seemed to think that I'd been cut, but I knew differently. I did though, love to be with cut men and to see their cocks shorn of that surplus skin.

I didn't get around to getting cut myself because I was scared. Not scared of the results, but of asking – being rather shy. How did one ask? Indeed, was it a matter for the doctor, or did one go straight to a hospital? By the time I eventually went to my GP (after ensuring my partner was prepared for the impending change, even if not entirely happy, and making sure I had something to see the doctor about at the same time) I was getting fairly desperate. I was, though, acting increasingly as one who was cut – to the extent of always masturbating with the skin right down, though this made for a rather sore frenulum.

All those years of wondering and worrying.... The GP hardly batted an eyelid, told me I'd have to pay (which I realised) and referred me to the local hospital. The consultant was also pretty matter-of-fact, but insisted that I saw a shrink, just to ensure that I was not trying to punish my cock in some way. As if!! He pronounced me sane and the operation was performed a couple of weeks later.

I was never asked how tight I wanted it to be. I'd have asked to be very tight if I had been (or had thought it through), but it didn't arise. The result is that I was cut about 1cm below the corona. This means that the corona can just about be covered when sitting (especially in pants), but is uncovered (I think) the rest of the time.

The operation was carried out under general anaesthetic in the morning and, though I was supposed to stay in overnight, I was discharged in the evening provided I was looked after, and stayed off work for a few days, and took salt baths twice a day. The whole procedure cost about £100.

I have a couple of mm of what I take to be sulcus on the left, which is intensely sensitive, much more so than any part of my cock was before the operation. I've been reading with interest the debates on the frenulum and believe that I am now without this, because the point at which this is normally anchored has actually been moved around the cock a bit – I take it when the three-way stitch was done. There's certainly some residual frenulum there, but it's not really attached to anything, and doesn't pull in any way whatsoever.

It was only when I saw the consultant that I realised that, in fact, I had a line of something like stitches around my cock about an inch below this. Whether this is the result of an attempt at birth to circumcise me, or whether perhaps I was the victim of a buried penis, I have no idea. Certainly my balls have always been very sensitive, which might give credence to an earlier buried penis??

The stitches were supposed to dissolve in the bath, but they didn't. This became difficult, as it was impossible not to get the occasional erections, and after a few days these could only be dealt with by rather painful masturbation involving pulling the shaft skin up and trying to cover the corona. When the stitches were out I continued masturbating by trying to pull what little skin there was forward. With effort I could just cover the corona enough to masturbate using that little foreskin, but I decided that was hardly what being circumcised was about – and I had actually gone back from where I was before the operation!

The issue really resolved itself, because in time it became very difficult to cover the corona when erect. Indeed, to try this, means pulling on the scrotum, which hurts my balls. Now when I'm hard there is no way I can cover even the corona. So, while I'd be a bit happier with less skin bunching up under the head when flaccid, I can hardly complain about less skin when erect. Even when flaccid, any cover provided disappears as soon as I start to pee. Other men appear to have been cut much farther down the shaft, but maybe it is the amputation of the frenulum in my case that means this was not necessary. If I do pull hard on the shaft skin when erect, I can still make it just about touch the corona. By the look of many of the men in Playgirl (presumably mostly cut) I am not dissimilar.

When fully erect there is a definite scar line, consisting of the remaining sulcus on the left, though just a couple of stitch marks further to the right. None of this hurts when I masturbate, though it can sometimes be a little red. KY helps, but is by no means essential. One disappointment is that I still get some smegma – even I think on the right where there's no apparent foreskin at all. The amount is very small, but it's still there. Do other cut men have this?

I've wondered about having a further operation to remove a little bit more, but I'm afraid I shall end up too tight (even if I could find anyone to perform it), and this time it might hurt (which it didn't last time, apart from the stitches). Again, what experiences do others have?

Perhaps because I used to keep the skin back there has been no change to sensitivity (apart from that couple of mm of intense pleasure), and I cannot offer any opinion on whether men should or should not have the operation if that is likely to be an issue to them. I most certainly recommend the operation, though, if, like me, you feel you should never have had a foreskin, and want rid of it. The feeling of relief (even without any problems with my foreskin) was immense.

My partner (44) still has his skin, though it is getting progressively shorter, and of little use except when entirely flaccid. He jealously guards his skin, but I do wonder, seeing him constantly trying to pull it forward when we have sex, because of the sensitivity of his sulcus and head, and the pull on his frenulum, whether he wouldn't be happier without it. At this rate, in a few years, he'll have nothing left to try to pull forward anyway. I presume that other men in his position eventually give in and leave it back?

I read on Vernon's interesting website of something called auto-circumcision. When does this normally occur, and can the skin be pulled forward to masturbate? Another (unrelated) question: what is 'Half circumcision', which I heard of from a South African? Surely the scar on the remaining foreskin would be very sensitive?

I've gone on a bit, but I hope this contribution will spur others to write too. Sorry, but I can't have any replies personally – any contributions in print please.

Editorial

In this issue I have managed to put together a series which in most part gives a balanced neutral image, with an accent on conciliation as befits the last edition of the year.

A new, simple Questionnaire is enclosed with this issue and we would be grateful if you would spend a few minutes to complete and return it promptly with your renewal to ensure that the results are as representative as possible.

There now leaves nothing but to wish everyone the compliments of the coming season from the team, and thank all those who have sent in their contributions during the year, without which we couldn't stay in being.

Having just become a member of Acorn I felt that a meeting on my home ground in Leicester was an opportunity not to be missed. However, being somewhat cautious and apprehensive, decided to test the water by just going along on the Saturday evening. I now see that this was an error of judgement as I missed most of the main events of the day. Still, it was a great chance to meet some of the other members in a very friendly and relaxed atmosphere.

I belong to the 'circumcised in infancy' brigade and, although I feel that having a choice would have been better, have never had any problems with my roundhead state. It's great to see a wide variety of cocks – so "vive la difference". It would be so boring if we all looked the same.

In recent years my interest has turned to genital piercings (which I once found abhorrent) and I now sport three of them. I was worried at first that they would cause a loss of sensation, but fortunately this has not been the case with me. Of course, it can become a bit of an obsession and you find yourself dreaming about what to have next, so I keep a picture of a very heavily pierced guy in order to deter me from going over the top.

I also received some compliments on a recent visit to a Spanish naturist beach, which was encouraging, as well as meeting some like-minded guys at the Acorn meeting. If there are any more out there I'd love to hear from you.

The Frenulum

I was cut as an infant, fairly tight with the scar about 5mm from the head. Most of the frenulum is intact but cut free at the scar line. I did not regard it as particularly sensitive until, some years ago, when using condoms, I came across some 'American tips', which only enclose the glans, and are only recommended for the circumcised. I found more sensation using these, I believe because the frenulum is left exposed.

G.H.

What Does it Matter

As long as I can remember, Acorn has given free rein to the pros and cons of circumcision lobbies. There has been more than adequate coverage in the past and, as one generation follows another, so it will continue as long as the magazine is published.

How many times have we heard the 'cut' being referred to as a mutilation? And indeed, there is a very strong case for leaving things as they are until a young man is mature enough to decide for himself. That is, of course, provided there is no religious or medical reason for the removal of the foreskin in infancy. It should certainly never be done, as was the case when I was a boy, to stop a child masturbating. Having said that, boys will be boys and, when I was in junior school, there were four of us who were great pals, two were cut and the third boy and I weren't. We used to play 'games', but the two 'roundheads' would never take part in mutual or self-gratification. Again, when I was a boy, pleasuring of that kind was called self-abuse, and "made you go blind!" How times change.

My best friend was circumcised at birth and I asked him whether he resented the loss of his 'hood', and does he ever wonder what it would be like if he had been left intact. Right off he replied, "No". He just enjoys good sex and gets on with it.

Then there is the category of the 'cavalier' who has a perfectly healthy and functional foreskin which causes no problems. He is quite happy with his lot and he too gets on with it.

Lastly, there are those of us who were left intact at birth and shouldn't have been. I suffered from phimosis and balanitis for very many years due to an overly tight foreskin. The trouble was that, when I was old enough to make up my own mind, I couldn't pluck up the courage to go under the knife. Old wives' (or rather, old men's) tales put me right off, so I continued to suffer painful and unfulfilling sex until my half-century. Then, by chance, I was counselled by a young 24-year-old who gave me confidence to go ahead with the operation. I might add that, not only did I lose my foreskin, but my frenulum was removed as well.

Wow! After a brief three-week healing period, I found out what sex was all about, and also that it was enjoyable. The first time I was fellated I was blown out of my mind. Penetrative sex is also extremely pleasurable and can now last as long as I want it to. And I would urge anyone in a similar situation to mine, don't waste time pondering. Go for it.

So, I say, make the most of what you've got between your legs. It's what you do with it that counts. Do you know of any sensation that beats an orgasm and, whether it is achieved with or without a foreskin, what does it matter.

J.C. – Ayr

Why Homophobia?

As members of Acorn, it goes without saying that we all have a vested interest, so to speak, in the penis; be it big or small, cavalier or roundhead, gay, straight or bi.

There are many men, cut in infancy, who resent part of their bodies being 'mutilated' without their consent, and imagine sex would be better if their foreskins had been left intact. Who knows?

I myself, for medical reasons, became an adult 'convert' at the ripe old age of 52 when my foreskin was removed in 1980. My article "It's Never Too Late", which appeared in Acorn a few years ago, detailed in depth the circumstances surrounding the operation. While I'm absolutely delighted with my altered state and enjoying sex as never before, the purpose of this article is not to promote the 'cut', but to explore a deeper topic that must touch us all, one way or another, and I hope it will encourage other members to exchange their thoughts and opinions through the columns of our magazine.

Why does the fact that we all have this interest in the phallus automatically class us as homosexual? Why are we classed as 'queer' if we don't follow football? Why are we 'poofs' if we wash our hands after being to the toilet? How stupid and ignorant can some people be? Is it not the critics who have the problem?

What is the cause of this homophobia? Are they afraid that they're going to be groped and/or propositioned? Or are they covering up some latent desire with this pseudo-macho image? Who is it that has the problem? Never does a man appear so small than when he is trying to look big. Besides, so long as we are discreet and keep within the law, whose business is it anyway whether we are gay, straight or bi?

I recently received a copy of Bud Berkeley's book, The Foreskin – A Closer Look from a fellow member and friend in the USA, and I was deeply impressed with a reader's letter in the last chapter of the book. It was entitled, "My Gun's Between My Legs." Here it is.

"Male liberation, as we have seen it so far, is a phony. It merely buries us deeper into our matriarchal society. Men learning how to cry? Men have always cried. Most of us have no hang-ups about crying. Our hang-ups are with our penises. We should be proud of them, free to talk about them, free to enjoy them without guilt. The issue is broader than 'gay' or 'circumcision.'. We are men because we have cocks. Our male libidos belong in our cocks. Instead, our society has transplanted our libidos from our penis to our fists and the guns in our hands.

"Our penises are looked on with disgust and derision, while our National Sentinel proudly holds a rifle. This 'loaded gun' culture of ours is the fault of our history of militarism. Through countless generations of war and struggle, men have become expendable to society, and women become widows. Women, constantly prepared for widowhood, protect themselves from 'the men' through the controls of myths, old wives' tales, traditions and taboos. The matriarchal pantheon is defended by the sons who are marched off to war. Why not amputate their foreskins, desensitise them, deodorise them to please the matriarchy?

How can a man enjoy the full meaning of manhood in a society which can't look a man straight in the balls? Why shouldn't men have the right to 'cock-talk'? It has nothing to do whatever with gay, straight or bi. It has everything to do with the healthy male libido being squarely where it belongs; in the penis. The violence of the fist and the gun is destroying our world. The gun between our legs would give only love and life to mankind...and a future."

What have others got to say on the subject?

J.C. – Ayr

[No-one can say we all aren't doing our bit towards this attitude. – D.A.]

Being Different

I think your members might be interested to know how it feels to be a circumcised man when all your friends and relatives have foreskins. I was done as a baby because the doctor said I needed it. I never felt bad about it because I thought it had been done for a good reason and, although my friends at junior school treated it as a huge joke, I never let it get to me. Later on when I started growing pubic hair and realised my cock was more than something to pee through, I found myself getting more and more defensive about it and hid my body from the others in the showers. At break times the boys often went into the 'leggaries' for a wank fest and I used to watch enviously as they demonstrated the very obvious advantages of owning a foreskin to rub up and down in this exciting game.

But I didn't really start feeling bad about it until the first time I was humiliated on account of my disfigured penis. I was 13 at the time and feeling the first real stirrings of sexuality. I had a particular friend called Ray who I always envied. He was taller than me, stronger, got better grades in class, had all the nice girls running after him – and naturally enough, was uncircumcised. I remember we went one hot day with his sister Liz to swim in the 'rezzy', a local lake, and after a happy half an hour or so of splashing about we got out and started drying off. Ray picked up his towel and took his swimsuit off while his sister did the same. She gave me a sly grin as she stood in front of us, dropping her towel to give us a view of her nude body before taking her time about climbing into her knickers. Ray laughingly accused her of showing her fanny off and at the same time dropping his towel and facing us stark naked. Instead of denying his accusation, she said he was much ruder than she was, and walking over to him, grabbed hold of his willy and gave it a quick tweak, saying he should cover it up. Ray backed off and, jeering at her, started slapping it against his stomach, making his foreskin flop up and down as he did so. I watched this in amazement – I had carefully changed into my underpants under my towel so as not to reveal my de-skinned cock, and had never seen a boy behave like this in front of a girl, even though she was only his sister. I could never have done such a thing. Liz made another grab at his willy to stop him, and laughingly made a remark about how he'd got 'foreskin flop'. She gave him a wink and then asked me if my foreskin was long enough to flop like that. At this, Ray whispered something in his sister's ear and I heard him say that loathsome word 'circumcised'.

Liz stared at me with her mouth open and said incredulously, "You're not really circumcised, are you? Does that mean you haven't got a foreskin? Come on, let's have a look!" When I tried to pretend that I wasn't circumcised, Ray called me a liar and grabbed my arms, telling Liz to pull my pants off and have a look. She did so, and examined it curiously, saying she thought it looked very peculiar, and asked if it wasn't uncomfortable having the end rubbing against my clothes.

This has to have been the worst moment of my life and I burst into tears. When the two saw this, they were aghast at my reaction and the realisation of how much they had upset me. They had no idea I could feel so bad about something they had looked on as some kind of joke and tried to make up for it by being especially nice to me for the next week or so. Unfortunately, Liz was unable to keep the matter to herself, and a few days later I began to get snide remarks from some of her friends at school. As I walked down the corridor, a group of girls coming the other way burst into giggles when they saw me, and one of them asked innocently if I was Jewish. I turned red, shouted "No!", and walked away with their laughter following me. It's a hateful thing to be ashamed of your own body and, if you've never known what true humiliation feels like, then come and ask me.

On an impressionable teenager, this sort of thing has a severe impact, seriously undermining self-confidence, and leaving one in a state of constant misery. My feelings for the people who still insist that all children benefit from circumcision is summed up in the line, "When will they ever learn?" from that sad Joan Baez song, Where have all the flowers gone?

Lady Doctor

I was born to parents who, although not Jewish, both had very strong views on circumcision. My father had been given a partial circumcision at 15 and had a deep cup to an acorn type of cut, but believed that full removal of the foreskin was beneficial.

Being wartime, I was born at my grandmother's house in Wales with only a midwife in attendance, and despite my mother's appeals for me to be 'done' there were no facilities, and she was told it wasn't necessary. Father remained in the services after the war so we moved around quite a lot, and on registering with a new GP my mother never failed to ask if I could be circumcised. But, despite numerous examinations, without success. At the age of 12 a GP snipped my somewhat tight skin, but of course, far from removing it, I now had more.

Annual school medicals were somewhat simple and, though including a genital examination, no conclusion was reached on my long foreskin. On two occasions my mother wrote to the school doctor, prior to the medical, asking him to recommend me for circumcision, but, despite close examination, declined to refer me to a hospital.

Unusually, far from developing a fear of circumcisiion, I developed a lifelong fascination with the subject and even when quite young wanted to be done, and by my teenage years became quite desperate about undergoing circumcision. Of course, for as long as I can remember, bath times would lead to comment about my foreskin and how nice it was for boys to lose it.

Into adulthood I continued every few years to find a reason to convince a doctor that I should be shorn, and whilst I enjoyed being examined, there was never a satisfactory outcome. Interestingly I have been married twice, and can vouch for John's comments that some younger women, as with my mother, are fascinated with the act of circumcision. My first wife was particularly keen on my being done.

I despaired, and then unexpectedly I mentioned the 'need' to be done to my current GP. I was then 44, and she about mid-30s. She greeted this with, "Let's have a look, then." On examining me, and pushing my foreskin back and forth, said, "Oh, yes. You should have that lot off. If I had my way, all males would be circumcised." Whilst I dressed she told me that on getting married she had insisted on her husband being circumcised, and when her sons were born they too were circumcised. Far from the NHS delays one hears about, she referred me to the consultant who had dealt with her males, and after all those years, within a fortnight I was scalped.

Thankfully, unlike my father's case, this consultant told me he believed in radical circumcisions, so not only was the whole of my long foreskin cut from behind the glans, but my frenulum was removed as well. The curious but pleasant thing is how much more naked I feel when in the nude than I ever did when possessing a foreskin.

I am delighted, not only with the appearance, but sexually as well, whether masturbating or having sex. Set off by shaved pubes I am very happy with the result. Having experienced sex with and without a foreskin I would recommend any male to undergo circumcision as soon as possible – he won't be disappointed.

Celebrity List

With regards to the latest list of 'Celebrities', I am sending you three further names along with comments as to the bona fide of the information.

Fox, Edward: English Actor (His mother's autobiography, Slightly Foxed, reveals that Edward nearly died twice as a baby, once after being circumcised).

Hailsham, Lord (Quentin Hogg): English Lord Chancellor. (He discloses that he has been circumcised in his autobiography).

Bean, Sean: English Actor (Full frontal nude scenes in the TV adaptation of Lady Chatterley's Lover revealed Sean as having a foreskin).

Incidentally, I am the person who supplied Chuck Thompson with the information on Gordon Kaye, Christopher Neame, John Noakes and Leonard Rossiter shortly after he published his first list in the States way back in 1986.

Finally, in closing, a private thought I have is wondering if one day we shall get to know the status of Robson Green's cock. He is by no means averse to showing his bare bum on TV, so maybe one day he will give a sufficiently revealing full frontal for it to be determined as to whether he is a roundhead or a cavalier.

G.H. – Yorks.

Decorations

About six years ago I decided to have a piercing done. I hadn't really thought about it before, and as I don't remember ever having a foreskin, I thought that a 'Prince Albert' would make a pleasant decoration, and like your reader from West London in issue 5, I never remove my ring, unless I go to a thicker ring. At the moment I am wearing a 7mm ring and hope soon to move on to an 8mm one.

It feels wonderful, especially walking naked, just to feel the enjoyment of the weight of the thick ring through the end of your penis – bliss!

To add to my Albert, I gave myself a frenulum piercing, which looks good along with the 15 hafada piercings down the seam of my scrotum. My next venture shall be a dydoe piercing which is usually done in pairs on either side of the glans. These are primarily for circumcised men.

I am 50 years old now, and was circumcised when I was too young to remember, and, like everything else, what you don't have you don't miss. But without a skin there is just so much you can do with one or two simple piercings.

Robbing Hoods?

Each age of man is understood, full growth a measured range.
Each one a state, a part, or 'hood', defined for every change.

All newborns have a babyhood, boyhood should follow free.
Then manhood would remain for good, were it not for infant – 'C'.

The Jewish penis has a week to stay complete unbared,
The mohel's zeal is at its peak – no babyhood is spared.

There's now much less of infant – 'C', though parents oft implore,
Cuts at a whim no longer be, there's more and more of 'fore'.

Boyhood rising risk begins. The doc's misguided word,
And cutting several thousand skins a year is quite absurd.

The manhood loss is that of need, or choice or vanity.
It's here procedures will succeed, and aid humanity.

Hail circumcision at its best, with knowledge and consent,
The owner feels so greatly blessed – there's nothing to resent.

So parents leave the hood alone unless there's harm or pain,
The intact penis fully grown is such a well-prized gain.

Acceptable Circumcision, A Less Controversial Future

I noticed a dichotomy in the lone voice of S.S., stating it was a choice if one wanted to keep his foreskin, yet was not happy at mothers being discouraged from having their baby sons circumcised. If personal preference seems to be all important, then no person should have his genitals irreversibly changed without his choice on informed consent. And certainly not at another person's whim.

Because circumcision is practised on such a sensitively personal part of the body, it should produce a pleasing aesthetic effect in terms of remaining portions of the prepuce, and especially the scar. Neatness, symmetry and a tidy straight scar should be essential features of which the circumcised person could be proud, not the ragged cut edges only approximated in most baby jobs before the advent of the Plastibell, together with twisting, assymetry, skin bridges and lumpy scars or skin tags. To be acceptable, circumcisions should be performed by competent plastic surgeons on the fully developed penis whenever possible.

At secondary school where I was first made aware of foreskins, 45% of my form were circumcised, of which all but one had ragged scar lines. The sole neat job was on a teacher's son, Jewishly circumcised, with a straight clean-cut scar and a neat generous fringe of foreskin, especially on the underside. Since then I have seen pleasantly, or even beautifully, circumcised penes on adults shorn by the Jewish method as babies.

Now that methods of renewal are being publicised, based on ancient epispadias using a weighted device (a PUD), I would suggest that removal of foreskin in the early years is restricted to the minimum amount. Excessive skin overlap or phimosis would be eliminated whilst leaving most glans cover. I would rename this procedure 'foreshortening', and the child could go later either in for a course of stretching, or have a full circumcision. That way there would be the element of reversibility, rather than the permanently mutilating radical infant circumcision endured for life by many men.

Those choosing a neat radical circumcision should certainly be encouraged to get surgery at reasonable cost (even subsidised by the NHS from the saving of 20,000 unnecessary infant jobs each year, and the additional surgery for treatment of complications). Since circumcisions would be neat and aesthetic, they could become fashionable and sought after, even an adornment, rather than an ugly affliction. No, S.S., I advocate not a dwindling minority, but body types that men can be justifiably proud of, not resentful.

There is a cultural significance in the bare glans, which I consider the ultimate nudity. If accidentally unhooded at a shower or medical examination, a European would cover up for the sake of modesty. A Japanese would do the reverse, and retract his foreskin publicly so as not to be KAWAKAMURI (skin covered), a mark of bad taste. When in Rome...

Circumcised Smegma

Thanks for Acorns 5 & 6/98. There are several very interesting items in these newsletters. In 5/98: 'The Frenulum' by D.P.R.; 'Tara Klamp' report; 'An Irish Story'; and 'How Smegma Serves the Penis' (this is generally anti-cut, but gives a pretty balanced point of view, and points out the importance of cleanliness and hygiene of the penis: a topic that many anti-cut enthusiasts ignore or skate over).

In 6/98, I particularly liked 'My Circumcision' by I.G.; 'Lone Voice?' by S.S.; and 'The Frenulum' by R.A.W. Speaking of frenulums (?Frenula), I want to weigh in on the side of 'low' or 'loose' circumcisions, which not only leave a decent remnant of the frenulum but also a cuff of foreskin that slightly overlaps the coronal rim. I think such a 'low' or partial circumcision would afford many of the advantages of both cut and uncut states. [Coincidental that we have two letters stating the same thing when the subject has never come up before. – D.A.]

Cut people can have noticeable amounts of smegma sometimes. This, at least, was my experience as a young boy, before puberty. Back then, the remnant of my foreskin would overlap the glans, and a 'scablike' material would sometimes form in the groove (sulcus). Living on a farm at the time, I did not bathe every day. Also, I had not then learned the joys of masturbation.

As regards S.S.'s 'open letter' in 6/98, please count me as a pro-cut man who is pleased and proud to be circumcised. As a tidbit bearing on the antiquity of routine infant circumcision, Taber's Medical Dictionary for Nurses, 1904 edition, includes an entry on a circumcision instrument setup. This would indicate that the operation was, at least, somewhat 'routine' at the beginning of this century.

M.S. – Utah

[M.S. also sent photocopies of a couple of book pages although not saying which book. One small item is a letter from Oliver Cromwell to his brother, and another one is this:-]

Circumcision: Rome 16 January 1645

I went to the ghetto where the Jewes dwell, as in a suburbs by themselves; being invited by a Jew of my acquaintance to see a Circumcision: here I passed by the Piazza Judea (where their Serraglio begins) for being enviroind with walls, they are lock'd up every night: in this place remains yet part of a stately fabric; which my Jew told me had been a Palace of theirs, for the Ambassador of their Nation in former times, when their Country was Subject to the Romans. There was a large Inscription on it, that I could not stay to reade.

Being lead through the Synagogue into a privat house, I found a world of people in a Chamber: by and by came an old man who prepar'd and layd in order divers Instruments brought by a little child of about 7 yeares old in a box. These the man layd in a silver bason: The knife was much like a short Razor to shut into the haft: Then they burnt some Insense in a Censor, which perfum'd the rome all the while the ceremony was doing: In the bason was also a little cap made of white paper like a Capuchins-hood, not bigger than my finger, also a paper of red astringent powder, I suppose of bole: a small Instrument of Silver cleft in the midst, at one end to take up the prepuce withall, clowtes of fine linen wrap'd up &c: These all in order the Women from out of another Chamber brought the Infant swaddl'd, and deliver'd it to the Rabbie, who caried, and presented it before an Altar or Cupbord dress'd up, on which lay the 5 bookes of Moses, and the Commandments a little unrowled: Before this with profound reverence, and mumbling a few Words he waved the Child to and froo a while; then he delivered it to another Rabbie, who sate all this time upon a Table, he taking it in his hands put it betweene his thighs, whilst the other Jew unbound the blankets that were about it to come at the flesh: at this action all the company fell a singing an hebrew hymn, and in as barbarous tone, waving themselves to and fro, a ceremony they observe in all their devotions: The Infant now strip'd from the belly downewards, the Jew took the yard of the child and Chaf'd it within his fingers till it became a little stiff, then with the silver Instrument before describ'd (which was held to him in the bason) he tooke up as much of the præputium as he could possibly gather, and so with the Razor, did rather Saw, than cutt it off; at which the miserable babe cry'd extreame, whiles the rest continu'd their odd tone, rather like howling than singing: then the Rabbie lifting the belly of the child to his face, and taking the yard all bloody into his mouth he suck'd it a pretty while, having before taken a little vinegar, all of which together with the blood he spit out into a glasse of red wine of the Colour of french wine: This don he strip'd down the remainder of the fore-skin as farr and neere to the belly as he could, so as it appeared to be all raw, then he strew'd the read powder on it to stanch the bleeding and cover'd it with the paper hood, and upon all a Clowte, and so swath'd up the Child as before: all this while they continue their Psalme: Then two of the Women, and two men, viz., he who held the Child, and the Rabbie who Circumcis'd it (the rest I suppose were the Witnesses) dranke some of the Wine mingled with the Vinegar, blood and spittle: so ended the slovenly ceremony, and the Rabbin cryes out to me in the Italian tongue perceiving me to be a stranger: "Ecco Signior mio, Un Miracolo di dio"; because the child had immediately left crying: The Jewes do all in Rome weare yellow hatts, and live onely upon brokage and Usury, very poore and despicable beyond what they are in other territories of Princes where they are permitted...

[The word 'yard' (for penis) was still used more than a century later by Clive of India. – D.A.]

Class Dressing

Dressing has always been fashionable, whether concerned with clothing or the arrangement of hair, and even skin.

The tailor's question, "Which side do you dress, Sir?" is often met with ribaldry – "Never mind, make it baggy at the knees!"

For those educated between the forties and the sixties, I suppose the left or right hanging tendency of the penis was determined by a combination of natural right or left handedness and the wearing of short trousers for over a decade. It was universal practice for boys to ignore the fly front, pull up the appropriate short trouser leg, withdraw the penis at the top sharp right or left for urination. That persistent directional 'training' must have been an overwhelming influence in settling the lifetime's dangling direction.

Now that short trousers have vanished from all but infant and recreational use, has the forced use of the fly front led to generations with vaguer penile positioning? Perhaps the change from Y-fronted underwear to non-opening brief type would mean pulling the penis out one side or the other to establish some form of right or left handedness.

I recall at the beginning of secondary education only one boy turned up in long trousers. By the age of 13, 50% of the class were still short-trousered. I remember previously insisting my first long trousers be shortened to remain in the majority (for conformity – even fashion), not having encountered foreskin or realising I was in the circumcised minority. At age 14, of the 6 short trousered, only I was circumcised, but 6 months later the three remaining bare-legged were exclusively foreskinned. When in a small minority, the older boys in short trousers discarded the practice of urinating via a raised trouser leg to achieve fly fronted conformity with the majority.

These recollections were sparked off by a documentary on Prince Charles' schooldays. At Cheam, the short-trousered Prince was beaten on the buttocks by his headmaster, bent over a leather-bound chair.

"If trousers were thick, they were taken down," confided a fellow pupil of the time. I wondered if the common practice of leg lifting at the urinal extended to the upper crust of the time, who were predominately – even exclusively – circumcised.

Comments

There's an awful lot of food for comment in issue 6/98, which is of course a credit to the editor for not boring us to tears. The first thing was the interesting observations you made on your visit to the huge naturist complex at Agde – something I could never have done in the past having been so self-conscious and so ashamed of my circumcised state. Now it would not be so bad since restoration has given me the appearance, but sadly not the performance, of a normal intact man. The fact that on the beach virtually all those who'd been circumcised were British and the majority of those from the older generation, confirms previous comment in Acorn, hotly disputed by those people who would prefer to think that the rest of Europe shares in their taste for subjecting defenceless children to the knife. Then C.B. of Cambs drew attention to the tabloid (Mirror?) reports that Prince William had been circumcised at his own request. I agree with V.Q.'s reservations about believing information from such a questionable source, especially since there was a report from a similar source in the summer that Prince William was amongst a group of boys at Eton who had taken part in a competition to see who could stuff the most 50p pieces under their foreskins.

S.S. of Twickenham is apparently one of those who only wants to read about good news, circumcision style, and dislikes seeing his obsessions questioned by those who disagree. He should remember that a large proportion of members who favour foreskin retention have to wade through distressing stuff, like that throw back to the saga days – ‘My circumcision’ (I would have preferred to read ‘My visit to the Zoo’, or something). Once again the same old material as the guy makes his way down the dreary path (five and a half pages of it) to his version of the promised land – a defrocked, desensitised, denaturalised and stunted winkle – and presumably lives happy ever after. What graunches me up is the tedious, lovingly described detail of every depressing step on the way. In his final sentence implying that cavaliers ought to be queuing up for circumcision, he shows a lofty disregard for those unhappy people who have suffered the ‘joys’ of circumcision without the option and whose only solace is to air their distress in Acorn.

‘Doubts’ by Anon was an interesting letter which throws the previous guy’s current certainty on the benefits of circumcision open to question – and he may well come to regret it. The tarty landlady’s apparent contempt for his circumcised penis (a pity he was so coy about describing how she and her friend came to pee all over it) is a humiliation not unknown to many circumcised men. Most girls of today this side of the Atlantic who know the foreskin horror stories to be a load of pernicious myths would prefer their partners to have one. (The same goes for an increasing number on the other side of the Atlantic.) He is right to question the advisability of having it done. Still his determination to make the best of it does him credit – I hope he succeeds.

Finally I have to comment on Yahya Lamont’s astounding outburst against me for suggesting he might be a religious bigot. My only reason for doing so was the memory of his famous attack on his co-religionist in Acorn a few years ago, when the guy admitted to keeping his foreskin intact and enjoying it. Yahya goes on to criticise, very rightly, other so-called Muslims who have done so much to drag the good name of Islam in the mud. I hope and wish he and like-minded Muslims would do something about it. The story about the forcible circumcision of non-Muslim Sudanese came as another unpleasant revelation which I had not previously heard about – chapter and verse anybody? Anyway it is not my intention to upset a brother member of Acorn so I say to him, Al Salam aleikum, Yahya mate, and the Compassion of Allah and His Blessings.

Best wishes to all for Christmas and the New Year (and Eid Mubarak to Yahya).

All the best, R.B.W.

A Different Reason

My experience of circumcision is unlike most members of Acorn. I was not circumcised at birth or during infancy, and as an adult had no desire or necessity to be circumcised until, during a medical examination, the doctor informed me that I had developed balanitis through diabetes and the only certain cure for the condition was circumcision. The doctor was apologetic and said that I would probably not like being circumcised but could offer no alternative. Reluctantly I agreed to be circumcised as the only option available. An appointment was made for the following week at the local General Hospital. I was apprehensive, but told no one what was to happen.

The first circumcised penis which I had seen was at secondary school, one boy of about 50 in my year had been circumcised, but we were naive and knew nothing about circumcision, or why his penis was different to everyone else's. I cannot remember any comments being made, but I certainly wouldn't have enjoyed being a minority of one.

In later years I had tended to avoid men who were circumcised, being guilty, like M.P. of Brighton stated in his article in 2/98, of not knowing what to do with 'it', and never taking the trouble to find out how 'it works'.

I attended the hospital at the appointed time and the circumcision was performed under local anaesthetic in the day clinic. No discussion took place as to the style of circumcision which would be performed, or how much foreskin would remain. As far as I was concerned, a circumcision was a circumcision, and it was not until I joined Acorn that I discovered that there were so many styles and variations. It appears that I was circumcised using the incision, trim and closure technique.

I was prescribed antibiotics, pain killers and valium, and an appointment was made for two days later to have the dressing removed. Instructions were issued not to bathe and to keep the dressing dry.

I had no intention of telling anyone of what had happened, but when leaving the hospital, I met a friend of my mother's, who I knew would tell her that she had seen me. So I plucked up the courage to visit my mother and tell her what had happened. My mother's reaction – shock, sympathy and laughter. My brother arrived during the laughter and was told what had happened. His reaction – more laughter. I think most of the laughter was from embarrassment.

I returned to the hospital for the dressing to be removed and was shocked at the sight of my 'new' penis. The glans looked like a blackberry and the shaft was bruised and bloody. Both were swollen. Dissolving stitches had been used, but I was told to remove any that remained after ten days to prevent fistulæ forming.

Arriving at the pub that Friday evening, my brother had arrived earlier and had informed my friends, both male and female, of my roundhead status. Their reaction – more laughter than sympathy. As I still played football at that time, it probably saved me the embarrassment of explaining things away, as it's impossible to hide a circumcised penis in a changing room or shower.

How do I now feel about being circumcised?

After about three weeks of slight discomfort, but no pain, the bruising and swelling subsided. But it took about 6 months for the suppleness to return to the scar area. The glans is completely exposed, although a remnant of foreskin covers the sulcus. One side has been cut very slightly shorter, but not enough to cause any concern. My glans has enlarged and about 25mm of inner foreskin remains. Also my frenulum is untouched. Enough foreskin remains to allow for a comfortable erection without excessive slack skin on the shaft, and masturbation does not require the use of lubrication. My frenulum appears to be larger than others which I have seen on both circumcised and intact men, and tends to pull my scrotum forward during an erection. I'm disinclined to have further surgery to cut or remove the frenulum as I find it very sensitive, and would not like to lose these very sensual feelings for something unknown.

I am satisfied and content with my circumcision and would not now wish to have a foreskin again, although if I had not required a circumcision for medical reasons I would still be a cavalier. If I had known about the different styles possible, prior to my circumcision, I may have chosen a different one to that which I now possess, but I am unconvinced by the arguments for having a tight circumcision causing a straining, uncomfortable and possibly painful erection, or removing the sensitive frenulum.

I find a circumcised penis far more comfortable, and looks far superior than one which is uncut. Handled correctly, it is far more pleasurable than one which is uncircumcised. The one problem is that, like me prior to being circumcised, uncircumcised men do not know how 'it works'.

Editorial

Here we are with the first edition of another year. We have to apologise for the fact that editions 7 and 8, plus backnumbers and other material, didn't arrive on your doorsteps until the new year. This was because Brian in the first place, for issue 7, was inundated with everyday work, which is at times very stressful, and was ill virtually all December, helped no doubt by the stress. He assures me that he is OK now. In my circular which I send to all prospective members, I have put the phrase '8 erratic editions of newsletters each year'. It would be appreciated if you could send in letters of complaints about this if you haven't received a copy for over two and a half months, or if one is missed out. I get the letters, but I can do nothing about them if I can't get hold of one or the other of the team. And I haven't possibly got the time to answer each letter individually, explaining the situation. We have never failed to get out 8 editions a year yet, and we see no reason why we will fail in the future, unless of course contributions dry up (nudge, nudge). Many thanks for your indulgence.

Skin Bridges

Born in Italy, living in Switzerland, married, no children, circumcised in Switzerland as an infant because of a phimosis. I do not have any details about the operation itself, or which method was used. I know that I stayed for three days in the clinic after the operation.

As a child, I discovered that I was circumcised when I started to go to school. Living in Italy and in Switzerland, this status was not so common. Later on, as a teenager and an adult, I discovered that I was also different from the circumcised men. The reason is that something went wrong with the operation: seven skin bridges on the right side of the shaft and near the frenulum were connecting the glans with the shaft. Some were positioned exactly on the edge of the scar in connection with the glans, some between the scar and the corona. I never understood where these skin bridges came from. Were they adhesences present before the circumcision and left by the doctor or were they a consequence of the circumcision itself? I did not know who to ask about the circumcision methods.

I never get pain during erections, but the glans was bent on the right side. When I was 26, one of these skin bridges broke during a sexual intercourse. The traces are still visible today, one on the glans, one on the scar. However, when I was 32, during a medical investigation for other reasons, a urologist offered to remove these skin bridges for aesthetic reasons. I accepted to get the six remaining skin bridges cut. It was done with local anaesthesia and took about fifteen minutes. I had no major problem afterwards.

Last year, I found a lot of information on the Internet regarding circumcision. I exchanged e-mail messages with a doctor who helped me a lot to understand what happened. If I summarise my situation, the skin bridges are a consequence of the circumcision done when I was a baby. The edges were not crushed together properly and – as a consequence – the skin bridges occurred. Some skin bridges were at the cut line (scar), but some were placed between the scar and the corona. After so many years, it is of course difficult to construct again what happened exactly.

A couple of words about the scar. It is a loose circumcision, the scar is located just behind the glans, when flacid less than 0.2in from the glans, more than 1 inch when erect. The scar is closer to the glans on the upper side. The frenulum was not removed, completely intact; the skin, where the frenulum is, is quite tight when I am erect. The scar is very smooth.

I am very happy to be circumcised. I like the appearance of my circumcised penis, I would not wish it to be covered by foreskin. This is also the opinion of my wife, especially after the second 'circumcision'. Before it, the erected penis was a little bit curved on the right, without any pain or trouble. The skin bridges were of course very tight. Today, the erect penis is straight.

Roots

It seems unlikely that a man of 52 could still have a question about male anatomy, but I have! Perhaps someone more enlightened would let me know the answer to this one.

I have noticed that just beyond their scrotum, most guys have a hard, exciting protuberance which seems to be the root of their cock. Even the owners of smallish cocks seem to possess this asset, but there are other guys, sometimes very big made in the dick department, who have none at all. Why is this, and am I right that it is the cock root? If so, how come not everyone has it? Is it only present when they are erect or is it always there? You will gather from this question that I am not one of those proud possessors!

I would certainly appreciate some information about this tantalising equipment.

The American View

For Man & Mate, Which Sex is Better – Cut or Uncut?

These questions are repeatedly asked: How can the foreskin benefit the sexual experience of the woman? Is sex different for the man, whether he's circumcised or intact? I have tried to answer these questions by providing posts made by various people online in different circumcision discussion groups.

I have encountered people who assume that sex with an uncircumcised man is unpleasant. Some have even gone as far as to say, it would be 'nasty'. There is the stigma that men with a foreskin are unclean. It is time for this myth to be laid to rest. The male with a foreskin can keep himself sufficiently clean with total ease. It is not a big production. See Natural Penis – Easy to Clean. Anyone who doesn't bathe adequately runs the risk of causing a 'nasty' experience for their mate, whether it's a male (circumcised or intact) or a female. Our culture's tendency to prejudge the man with a foreskin reminds me of a child who claims to dislike a particular food because he's never tasted it. Think of how many kids have refused to try something new because it 'looks funny'.

Circumcision Diminishes Sensitivity

"Research published last year in the British Journal of Urology may well explain the links between circumcision, frequent masturbation and oral sex. A group of doctors headed by Dr. John R. Taylor at the University of Manitoba discovered that the small sheath of foreskin tissue removed during circumcision is filled with extremely sensitive nerve endings and mucus membrane cells. The head of the penis itself is extremely insensitive to light touch, although it can be stimulated by heavy touch, they found. That lack of sensitivity in the head of the penis may well account for an increased need by circumcised men for the more intense stimulation that masturbation and oral sex can provide, according to Dr. Robert Van Howe...”

The sexual experience of the male can directly affect the female experience. Mentally speaking, if a male's sexual experience is immensely filled with pleasure, it will usually enhance her experience. In fact, it is often said that “sex is between the ears, not between the legs.” It has been suggested for circumcised men that any loss of sensuality can therefore be overridden mentally. Possibly this is true for some. However, mental effects on sex must vary widely. Some people are less mentally ‘plugged in’ than others. No matter what, it wouldn't be an issue if all the sensitive nerve endings of the foreskin were never removed in the first place.

Personal Accounts of The Female Experience

“I've had a pretty modest number of lovers, but my uncircumcised husband is definitely, far and away, more sensitive than the circumcised men I've known. This is such a plus – it is much more exciting for us both (the prematurity mentioned in some posts has never been a problem).”

“Well, my college boyfriend was from Spain, so he wasn't circumcised. And I absolutely loved his penis. It was so sexy and exotic to me. In fact, I'm extremely dissatisfied that my husband is not intact.”

In another post, the same person said: “Circumcision can harm sexual relations. If you've ever had sex with both a circumcised and an uncircumcised man, you'd know. Some women say that it doesn't make a difference, but I know that it definitely did for me. (Think “ribbed for her pleasure”.) So I do know better... and yes, I have heard a man complain about something he lost when he was 24-48 hours old.”

“Circumcised penises look ugly and unnatural to me! Also, with an uncircumcised penis, when you rub the penis with your hand, the foreskin makes it ‘glide’ up and down easier. Sex is better, too, for the same reason – the foreskin helps it slide in and out better. My husband was the first man with an uncircumcised penis that I had had, so I had nothing to compare to with my previous partners. If my husband ever dies and I start dating again, I will look for an uncircumcised man. The sex is better, and I can't stand the sight of a circumcised penis. Not only that, my husband's penis seems far more sensitive than my other partners' were, so he seems to get more enjoyment out of sex, which helps me enjoy it more. The circumcised penis is ugly, ugly, ugly!!!! The penis intact is beautiful, natural, wonderful! I can't imagine ever sleeping with a circumcised man again.”

In later years, dry and painful intercourse is usually explained by the idea that women lubricate less. But sex with uncircumcised men is described as much more comfortable. This future scenario is described very appropriately here: "Well, since you've been through menopause, your vaginal lining is much thinner than it used to be. You also have much less lubrication. Luckily for you, your husband is not circumcised. When his penis enters your vagina, it is one mucous membrane meeting another, and entry is easy and pleasurable. You shudder to think what sex would be like if your husband was circumcised, because your friends tell you that the glans keratinises (sp?) over the years, and the skin becomes thicker and drier. Forcing the dry, leathery penis into your ever drier and thinner-skinned vagina would be less than wonderful..."

Gay sex

Here is a description of the differences in sex between circumcised and uncircumcised men from a circumcised man who is gay. This will surely raise a lot of eyebrows. I would imagine a lot of you will get upset and question how I can include the experience of a gay man when talking about this. Obviously, women's bodies work much differently. A woman can describe the difference for her personally, but she cannot feel what a man feels and cannot describe how it might be different for him. We women are often criticised for even discussing circumcision because we don't have penises. In my opinion, a gay circumcised man would be quite qualified, possibly even more than a woman, to clearly define the differences. Who better to give such a review? What we are talking about here is "the sexual value of the foreskin". A gay man knows what men are capable of feeling. I would think a gay man has more insight because, unlike a woman, he possesses the very same equipment he is talking about. So here is what was sent to me from a gay man:

"I do think I have a lot of insight about this subject... Over the years I have noticed that uncircumcised men plainly have more intense pleasure (I see it as uncontrollable and very intense), erections last much longer and with much less stimulation. Circumcised men always need to be stimulated just so or they lose the feeling of pleasure."

Shame Overcome

I was very interested to read Anthony's article – Acceptable Circumcision, a Less Contraversial Future in issue 8/98.

I was one of the many who were circumcised at birth, so was never given the opportunity of choice. The operation was performed before I left the nursing home at the request of my father (who was also cut) but not for a medical reason.

My own circumcision was obviously not done with any regards as to what my cock would look like as I grew older. I don't consider it to be a neat job, with quite ragged edges in places, lumpy scar and one skin gathering. I consider that I have had a radical cut as I have no trace of a frenulum. When erect, there is little skin movement over the shaft. The dark scar line is still very obvious. I have seen many guys who have the same style of cut as myself, and very, very few who I would consider as having a neat and tidy circumcision.

Like so many, it was not until around the age of ten years that I realised I was different to nearly all the boys in my first senior school class. I think there were two other roundheads as well as myself. We were always having fun made of us, especially in the showers, so it rather pushed us closer together, and almost certainly the start for me of having sexual feelings towards my fellow roundheads, and later other boys. This in no way implies that being cut has made me gay, of course.

Until some years ago, I was always almost ashamed of being cut. But I met my partner, who has what I call a perfect uncut cock, but also likes the cut look, so that gave me more confidence in myself. We run a very small B & B with a very private long rear garden, and seem to attract naturists. Most of the older guys are cut, whereas very few younger ones are. I have no trouble now in being naked with other guys, even to the extent of going naked on beaches.

I am also sure that being an Acorn member, and reading about other members' problems etc. has greatly helped me overcome my own.

Partial Circumcision

It's a pity that in the questionnaire you don't ask for the type of circumcision ie. partial or radical. Also on the size of the glans for those cut at birth. I am sure that the earlier the circ is done the more 'flared out', expanded, the coronal rim becomes. Whenever I get the chance to examine a circumcision I look to see how flared the coronal rim is and also if the little 'ridges and bumps' are still present. (I think they're called Cowpers Glands and that they produce the smegma.) Obviously they tend to atrophy when the infant has been radically cut as they perform no useful job without a foreskin. In my case, cut as an adult, I still have them, though after many years of exposure they are certainly smaller than they used to be as a youth.

I examined a partial circumcision recently, and how the owner tolerated it I do not know. Only the tip had been removed as an infant so that over half the glans was covered by the remaining foreskin. On erection, this rolled back to expose a typically sensitive small coronal rim with no flaring, and prominent Cowpers Glands.

Possibly in the newsletter we could initiate a discussion on the points raised.

Celebrity List

Actor Nigel Terry – large, circumcised. Terry, I think, was circumcised fairly recently as I seem to remember he had a longish ‘overhang’ originally.

Actor and comedian Tony Slattery – large, uncircumcised.

Former Eastenders star, Michael Cashman – medium penis, long foreskin.

Baby's Foreskin

Here is an item from the doctor's page of the Supplement to the News of the World.

Q. Should I clean behind the foreskin of my two-week-old son? I don't want him circumcised, so what do I do?

A. Leave the poor boy well alone. The foreskin is attached quite strongly to the underlying head of the penis in a newborn baby boy and remains so until he is at least three or four years old. No attempt should be made to pull the foreskin back until then, unless it is so tight that it interferes with passing urine. After the age of five, very gentle washing of the tip of the penis with ordinary soap in the bath water is perfectly adequate.

Me. What does he recommend if the foreskin proves to be so tight that it interferes with passing urine? Surely it's better for the mother to get the skin 'working' as soon as possible (without causing any discomfort) as happened in my case, which probably initiated my fixation and preferring the 'skin back' position, although a nice neat circumcision would have been preferred, which was quite popular in the late 30's. My first wife was a circumcision enthusiast but was unable to have her two sons, born in the early 60's, 'done', due to medical opposition.

C.B. – North East

[According to the medical books I've read on the subject, the structure of the foreskin is such that it cannot fuse onto itself at the tip and be closed completely. As the inner foreskin is fused to the glans, the urine can only go one way. Initially this can cause ballooning, which is not harmful, if the hole is narrow, but with use this soon ceases. The mother cannot know if the foreskin is tight until after the foreskin has released itself from the glans. If it is then tight, the use of a steroid cream, under medical supervision, will soon put things to right. – D.A.]

The Questionnaire — 1

When I renewed my subscription at the beginning of this year I dutifully completed the accompanying questionnaire which asked, among other things, what my views were on my own circumcised state.

I'm always fascinated by market research investigations which involve grading my views on a subject on a points scale from 1 to 5, or whatever. The Acorn inquiry fell into this category and I can't help wondering how truthful my response was. Indeed, is one's reply to such questions ever the definitive expression of one's views? I suspect that one's mood of the moment can have a very important part to play.

In essence, the question was whether I was pissed off by the fact that I'd been up for the chop in infancy, whether I couldn't give a damn, or whether I was deliriously thrilled at having 'had it off' in the anatomical rather than the sexual sense. The options were fine tuned to about ten variations on the theme, and I was also asked to comment on whether I would recommend circumcision to my friends.

There are days, and when I replied it was one of them, when I don't give the end of my knob a second thought. I've got what I've got, it works handsomely, and nobody has ever criticised me for having been cut, so why the hell should I worry. But yes, there have been occasions when I've asked myself "I wonder what it would be like to have a foreskin?" Then, maybe, I have regretted never having experienced its pleasures, or inconveniences. On other occasions, on seeing an unsightly, long, tight prepuce with stale smegma smelling abominably beneath it, I've thought "Thank God I've not got one of those!"

It's the same old story when I ponder on whether I should recommend circumcision to others. When there are medical needs, or when the owner is less than motivated by matters of hygiene, I'd recommend the op. without question. On the other hand, a pretty foreskin, long enough to cup the glans like a true acorn, but not dangling halfway down to the knee, is too beautiful to sacrifice unnecessarily.

I'm not getting on at anyone by questioning the questionnaire, and I'm looking forward to seeing the published outcome, but I suspect we should treat the results with caution. It's fun to seek the views of members, but not altogether scientific.

I have a point in saying all this. I love my cock and get a lot of pleasure talking about it and about those on other guys. It's great being a member of Acorn and having a forum to discuss such matters but, at the end of the day, there's much more fun to be had doing things with our genitals than just talking about them. I read in a little sex book recently that every second of every day world-wide, some 19,000 men are experiencing orgasm, produced one way or another, whereas only 4.4 babies are being born per second.

This, surely, is overwhelming proof that the penis is primarily an organ for recreation rather than procreation. Let's not just talk about it, let's do it! And as for questionnaires, who gives a toss?

Ray Hamble

The Questionnaire — 2

I find the recent questionnaire somewhat depressing reading, as it seems to ideal extensively with circumcision. As one who was circumcised in infancy and regretted it ever since (and a lot of other roundheads would agree with me, I'm sure), I would prefer to read about the experiences of cavaliers. I suggest the following:-

1. At what age did they first discover that their foreskin was retractable?
2. Who told them how to do it? Parents, doctors, other school friends?
3. At what age did they manage to retract them? Did someone help?
4. Was it painful the first time? How long was it before it became easy?
5. What experiences did they have at school?
6. How old were they when they had their first orgasm? Who showed them, or did they discover it themselves?
7. How old were they when they had their first sexual encounters with girls? Had the girl had previous experience of foreskins?
8. How old were they when they first had sex with a girl?
9. Does their foreskin stay back during sex? Do they prefer it to stay back?
10. Any other experiences relating to their foreskins?

I.D. – Herts.

The Questionnaire — 3

Herewith, the questionnaire, completed as far as possible. I hate filling in forms. There always seems to be such a lot of irrelevant empty spaces even when I have finished. I have a few suggestions for inclusion in future questionnaires. What about pubic shaving, tattoos, piercings, alterations other than circumcisions...? (and that – and that – and that!)

My cock tattoo is quite subtle – the colour of the whole glans is 'intensified' – more visible. I currently have a 1cm thick, 3cm diameter steel ring through my cockhead, via my slit-open piss-hole. My pubic area was successfully treated with electrolysis a few years back, so only the occasional wisp of hair reappears. I do still periodically shave my scrotum and, sometimes, whole body.

On the subject of newsletter content, in contrast to at least one recent correspondent, I do like to hear about other guys' circumcision experiences, including operation details. I would like to be able to watch my own circumcision, if and when. My only problem being, 'is it a fantasy that I ought not to realise'. Plus being able to justify the expense. Now, if only I had a serious medical need...?

R.M. – Suffolk

My Piercing

Having recently rejoined Acorn I'm glad to find the correspondence still very stimulating.

I'm circumcised from birth with a very neat scar line. A year ago, on an impulse, I had my frenulum pierced. The procedure was very simple and I can recommend it. I often wear the ring every day and usually wake up with a fabulous erection in the morning.

At the salon, I was seated in a raised chair with good light to enable the piercer to work. I explained that I found the idea quite a turn-on and he told me of other customers, including couples M/F, who are both pierced at one visit. I had to show him precisely where I wanted the piercing, which he marked with a pen. He sprayed a cooling agent on the frenulum and over the glans. This removed most of the sensation whilst he applied to the skin web of the frenulum a special clamp which resembled a pair of pliers. The mild pain of this was the most uncomfortable part of the procedure. My cock became half erect at this point which helped a little as the piercer gently held my shaft whilst selecting a small spike-like stick. He eased this through an aperture in the clamp and through the frenulum. I could see that the spike was tube-like, open along one side.

I was now pierced and the chosen ring was inserted and fastened through the frenulum. The spike and clamp were removed, at which point there was some bleeding. This soon ceased and I felt quite comfortable with a loose dressing around my cockhead.

After a couple of weeks I was healed and ready to enjoy my adornment. I find my orgasms are often more intense and my ejaculations larger than before. If I masturbate, or a partner masturbates me, I can sometimes be brought to orgasm by massage of the shaft alone. The natural action is to stop hand movement at the frenulum, moving the ring with each stroke. The small ring looks good with my large glans and attracts favourable comment.

I would be very pleased to hear from Acorn members with piercings. Perhaps those with knowledge of other practices could also write. Subjects of particular interest include the insertion of ball bearings into the urethra (a Far Eastern practice), electrical stimulation, ejaculation quantity and vacuum developers. Lots of interesting subjects for the magazine pages.

Natural Circ.

After spending nearly all my holidays for the last twenty years on naturist campsites or visiting nudist beaches, I have been able to conduct my own mini survey each holiday on the cut or uncut status of all the males on each holiday.

Although I am cut myself, I have never experienced some of the negative reactions from continental people that some of your other members have written about. Indeed, I have found either total indifference to my status or people who comment on how they like the cut look. I have actually been chatted up quite a number of times over the years by people who've said they were attracted to me because of my looks and because I was cut.

I attend a French naturist swimming and sauna group that meets at a municipal pool in Brittany when I'm in the area. The group is mixed, but predominately male, straight and gay. I have been going for a while and after several of the wives and partners commented that they liked the cut look, most of the guys there have been keeping their foreskins rolled back, and some have even gone the next stage on and got circumcisions.

This Summer we stayed on a large naturist campsite in the south west of France. We became very friendly with the Dutch family who were staying in the next caravan to us. The ten-year-old boy was quite well developed for his age and had a circumcised penis. One day we were talking by the pool side and the subject came around to circumcision. My wife and I are both keen on circumcision, and after I had my circumcision I had my son cut just after his birth. The Dutch lady commented on how much more aesthetically pleasing and cleaner it looked, and wished her husband would see the light and get cut like me. "So", I observed, "is that why you had your son cut?" "No", she replied, "he was born like that." Having seen very short foreskins that hardly cover the head of the penis, this was not quite the same. She explained that right from his birth the head of his penis has been exposed. When he was younger, she told us, and when we saw him coming out of the sea when it was quite cold, a small bit of skin came just over the edge of the head of the penis. But otherwise it remained uncovered. He was, she told us, of great interest to the doctors and nurses when he was a baby, as they'd never seen this phenomena. On closer inspection, sure enough, there was no sign of there ever having been a foreskin on his penis. The skin was smooth all the way along the shaft right up to the head of the penis. Where the frenulum was, he had a wide V-shape instead of the normal thin strip of skin. But in all other ways it was a normal looking penis, albeit larger than most 10-year olds have. He was certainly not embarrassed by his naturally shorn penis. His mother was delighted at his status and joked that she must have been wishing aloud when she planned his circumcision during her pregnancy. He saved her the expense and the trouble by doing it himself before he was born.

I am sure some of your more knowledgeable members will have come across this phenomenon before, but I certainly have never seen such a thing. I believe, and our Moslem members will correct me on this, that in the Koran the Prophet was born without a foreskin. Perhaps some other members know of similar instances or can enlighten me on this one?

I would welcome correspondence from other members, bi and gay (pro-circ only please) on any theme concerning circumcision, piercing and penises in general. I would also like to receive exchange photos of cut penises in all shapes, sizes, ages, colours etc. for my collection.

R. – Jersey

The Last Meeting

I thought I had come to the wrong meeting. A procedural wrangle was going on and it was very difficult to tell from the minutiae being discussed what the meeting was all about. Was I at the U.K. Chrysanthemum Growers Society annual bash? Was I the only cock lover in the room? Impatience in myself and others saved the day. The magic word “cock” was uttered and I knew I was among friends.

And what friends they turned out to be. Able and willing to talk on my favourite subject. A chance to talk to the cut and uncut. A chance to talk of operation techniques, scar lines or lack of them. I thought I was alone in my feelings, but here was at least a room full of men similar to me. I suspect that millions of men in the U.K. are interested in the subject but only a handful actually join the Society. It is a popular subject for discussion at my workplace among the mainly male work force.

What a surprise to be able to obtain a circumcision video. I look forward to the meeting in the Spring with great anticipation. Perhaps it could be within easy reach of a sauna so that we can arrange a group demonstration.

To the guys who will be circumcised by the time of the next meeting, good luck! In my experience you won't regret it.

M. – Worcester

New Member's Joy

I have been astonished and amazed at the contents of your journal to find that others share my interest in all things phallic in general and circumcisional in particular. How marvellous it is to be able to talk about it at last, although I'm sure you have read the same thing over and over again. So I'll understand if you look for something more interesting for your august pages.

My interest began (as is often the case) in the school showers, when I observed one of the teachers to have a particularly large and beautiful glans with no skin cover at all. He seemed unabashed as he dried it vigorously with a towel and paraded it around the changing room before putting it into his pants. It seemed incredible to me at the time that a man could bear to have such a sensitive part of his anatomy rubbing and chafing against his clothes. I quickly decided that it looked 'macho' and tried to keep my own foreskin retracted all the time even though it took quite a long time to be able to live with the sensitivity. I have never really managed it successfully as I have quite a long foreskin that tends to cover my glans easily, and I find that I am constantly having to adjust it to a retracted position. I have, however, been doing it for so long (20 years) that having it covered makes it feel waterlogged and uncomfortable. Night time is when the problem starts as it covers automatically (I would be glad to hear of any tips on how to keep the foreskin retracted more permanently/successfully). Since then I have become almost obsessed with trying to guess whether men I meet during the course of a day are cut, have a retracted foreskin nestling in their pants or if they're wearing a hood. You may have guessed that my preference is for the former. And how I love to see them in the changing rooms! I never realised until I read Acorn that there are so many variations on a theme.

You may of course wonder why I have not as yet opted to join my circumcised brethren, and indeed it's something that I consider every day of my life. However, my partner is vehemently against the idea, and almost had an apoplexy when he found out that I'd joined Acorn. How do other members deal with opposition from partners? Nevertheless, I haven't ruled it out completely, as it is my body after all, but until then, retraction will have to do. In past issues I have noted some rather disdainful comments about men who wear it back (particularly on naturist beaches). Surely, however, everyone should be accepted as they are or choose to be – there is room for everyone, isn't there?

I have particularly enjoyed the 'Celebrity Status' reports (contrary to David I thought that Ralph Fiennes definitely looked circumcised in Baby of Macon despite the gory red of the film quality – does anyone agree?) Can anyone give a definite yes/no to Alan Bates' status – the list said yes, but in any films I've seen I would say not. How about Jamie Redknapp anyone? (there's one I'm sure we'd like to know).

I apologise if this seems like a collection of random thoughts, but I felt I wanted to write and say “thank you”, and I am still amazed that I dare to write my thoughts out on paper. Who knows, I may yet eventually get to a meeting so that I can chat with others who will not think me a complete nut-case – or worse. Long may you continue.

Tony – Yorks.

The Frenchman

I was born in the middle of France in 1941. At that time there were no Arabs in France, only a few Jews in main towns, and no protestants where I lived. They were 1.5% of the population, mainly in the east and mid south.

My parents began to get interested in naturism in 1945. Not nudist, but what would be called ‘green’ nowadays. So obviously they were against surgery. My health was bad and it might have been because of it that they became interested in naturism. My grandmother wanted my tonsils out but my mother kept hesitating and finally I escaped the operation after a long time. At the time we hadn’t the health service that we have now. My grandmother suffered much from rheumatism and wanted to be operated on, but unfortunately (or rather, fortunately) for her, she hadn’t the money. But she had what I call ‘the complex of the surgeon’, always feeling like having something cut out. And it happens that I have met a great many women like that, which has made me think: what can they have in their ass (or not have) for always feeling like having something cut. And not only that, they always want others benefitting from cuts as well.

The Germans, during the occupation, were always hunting the Jews, and many people that were no more Jew than you or me had been killed just because they were circumcised (for so-called hygienic reasons). So probably I’d heard much about circumcision at a very early age, although I can’t remember exactly when. But I remember very well that I thought the Jews did it out of perversity, and it couldn’t be in the Bible. At 16 I fancied reading the Bible and was completely astonished to find the story of circumcision in it.

Then a flash came into my mind. “It is that!” This was that operation of the tonsils, and needless operations in general in Catholic countries were pseudonyms for circumcision, because anything that could drive the mind towards sex was unthinkable. Then I began to ask around, “Why circumcision?” (in the spiritual sense, obviously), and it was the confirmation of my intuition. People were incredibly ill at ease, showing it to be their most touchy subject, and indicating to me that it was the most important subject to them in the world. And so it became in me an obsession.

I started to read everything that I could pick up about it, and at 18 I discovered that there existed a female circumcision. I asked around what it could be, but people were so ill at ease that they couldn’t talk about it. So then it became an obsession on top of my first obsession, and I sought hard for information on that. I thought that it couldn't be the cutting off of the clitoris, because I thought that a woman would die if she had her clit cut out. But at 20 I discovered that it was the clitoris that was cut out, and that flash came into my mind again, much more stronger than the first time. "It is that." It was an incredible pleasure and relief to me that women could have their clits cut out without any obvious inconvenience. It was incredibly marvelous to learn that.

It was obvious. All troubles about sex came from the fact that women feel like having their clits cut out but are too chicken to have it done, so they want to have their boys cut instead. And so I became an enthusiast of female circumcision. It was the solution. If they could have their clits cut off they wouldn't have those obsessions of having something cut, and that obsession of having their boys cut.

Women say everywhere that circumcision is cleaner, so why don't they have all their dirty folds of skin removed as completely as possible? I remember once, my grandmother saying in a violent temper to my mother, "I like what is clean!", and it astonished me. I remember the event because it was out of context as nothing was dirty there and then. It was like a frustration of dirtiness when nothing around was dirty. My grandmother was a coleric and authoritative person, which shows a too yang person.

After a while of being a total enthusiast of female circumcision, I thought that maybe that was going too far, so I became convinced for a long time that the best thing for society would be that 25% of all people, men and women, would be circumcised, then everybody could have sex with circumcised people. I was convinced that it was evil, but it was the desire that people had, and when a desire of something is too repressed it drives people to worse excesses.

I got the conviction that women, as much for themselves as for men, felt like circumcision: that it was a basic tendency towards circumcision in them, and that they projected it onto men. And that it is unconsciously to satisfy them that men adopt circumcision. I also got to the conviction that great chapters of cruelty amongst people, like the Germans in the war, came from the exasperation of women not being freed of their clitorises and inner labia. That the frustrations of a little cruelty accumulate in the unconscious for decades and cause explosions of cruelty, as unconsciously, men try to satisfy women. My reasoning was exactly the one of homeopathy – a little cruelty that could avoid much worse.

Twenty five years passed and I spoke of that to a psychoanalyst woman, a most intelligent woman. I told her about my opinion that it was a basic desire in women to have their clits cut off, and it was as if God made the clits for the sole purpose of having them cut. She looked at me dubiously, so I said, "But look how many women feel like being operated on for something!" She laughed and said, "Yes, it is a fact that that is quite common." But she refused any explanation of the problem.

A few years later I read Kushi, which says somewhere that too yang people hate hairs, and that when they see cats on the street they would like to shave them. And that was another revelation. The repulsion for foreskins and inner labia is the same as repulsion for hair. Let us imagine that for an unconscious reason you have a repulsion for trees and that you have a gardener. Perfectly unconsciously, you will seek on any pretext, the cutting down of the trees in your garden if you have any. And it's just the same for circumcision. So the only solution is in having a not too yang diet.

I remember when I was a child, my parents were vegetarians. My grandmother was exasperated with that. She was convinced that humans need much meat for being strong. She would shout and shout after mother, "Your kids will have T.B."

A perfect yang man is small, very strong, ugly, idiot, cruel and a pervert. A perfect yin man is tall, beautiful, intelligent, but weak. So only the well-balanced between them makes a sage. But for our subject here, everything which is cutting, cruel, perverse, is the sign of a too yang diet.

Let us be serious, only basically evil and perverted people can circumcise their children. See my letter about the yin and the yang – 'Macrobiotics', Issue 8/96.

The Encyclopaedia Britannica states that female circumcision may pre-date male circumcision. If you have read the "Modern Primitive" literature, Fakir wrote somewhere about the traditional tortures, that it is more something of women than of men. So women may be softer physically than men, but stronger mentally.

The Frenchman.

[In this instance I have edited this letter. Firstly to put it into better understandable English and secondly to cut out the more passionate parts. It does give an insight into how childhood events, conversations and feelings can have a frightening effect on the rest of one's life. Who, among us hasn't, to one degree or another, been a victim of something like this. – D.A.]

We've just got back from the meeting at High Wycombe, which included the A.G.M. (a copy of the minutes should arrive on everyone's doorstep later). There were about 25 members at one time or another. Not all stayed for the whole time, a few turning up as their other commitments would allow. A disappointment to me was that only one of our new members came along, after our best year of recruitment as well, with so many being so pleased to have found us. Never mind, maybe next time. Again, I'm sure that every one went away with more knowledge than when they arrived.

A pleasing aspect about the meetings is that friendships are being formed through other shared interests. A couple come to mind – playing church organs and canal narrow boats.

In this issue there are items which beg comment one way or the other, so do please pick up a pen and make your opinions and experiences known.

My Conclusions And Viewpoint

Circumcision has been practiced in various parts of the world for thousands of years, but it has never become worldwide. It couldn't have survived if there had been something really detrimental about it. Similarly, foreskins would never have survived if it had been shown that circumcision was of greater benefit. Therefore it comes down to choice, be it by race, religion, or personal choice by parents or individuals.

Most Acorn members, as we have read so often, who have had an adult circumcision, have had a compulsion for it since early childhood for one reason or another. Modern medical opinion shows that there are only two reasons physically for circumcision, torn foreskins through accidents, and BXO, where the whole front of the penis swells up enormously (very, very rare). This is the only true phimosis, a tight foreskin not being a phimosis. A foreskin that's too long (rare in actuality) in the eye of the owner isn't useless for good sex, a tight foreskin can be freed with the aid of steroid creams, and balanitis is rarely recurring with a loose foreskin. Yet these are the usual reasons why most of our members say they wanted a circumcision, and have been unhappy when doctors said no. I would suspect that the real reason lies solely in the mind, generated by an incident or finding during the growing up period (a lot of our members do say this), causing envy of another's state or a wish to become the same. And why not? If a person is totally unsatisfied with the state of a part of his body, which leads to a lack of self-esteem and self-confidence, then that is a good enough reason to remedy it. A pity that the NHS has never, from its institution, had the funds to support this.

One thing amiss though, is that, in their euphoria at accomplishing their hearts desire, most exhort everyone else to do the same. Only one or two, at the end of their circumcision stories, qualify it with, "If you feel the same as I did!" The rest forget that others have no such desires. I myself have often pondered whether I would rather lose a leg or my foreskin, and I still can't answer it. Still, it's nice of them to want everyone to feel as good about it as they do.

One other thing. In fantasy stories, and what purport to be true stories in magazines like Forum, men often refer to women playing with their foreskins etc, but never do you get women mentioning whether the men in the story have foreskins or not. Never, also, have I seen mention of bad smell or mutilation. From this I can safely gather that women are happy with what they get, the look and feel of a cock is not a talking point, and probably all they are interested in is what it does to them. It's only us what worries about them things!!

Naked Acorns

I was delighted to meet fellow Acorn members at Leicester recently, and I hope that I shall be able to maintain some of the pleasant contacts I made there as a 'new boy'.

As I mentioned then to some of the members, I had already arranged to hold a party for fellow circumcised gay naturists here. In the event, 15 of us met in Oxford, including one 'honorary' Acorn, who had a naturally retracted foreskin which could pass muster except on close inspection. It was very much open house for most of the day, with people arriving from 2pm onwards and departing as convenient, with a few staying on overnight. I had quite a wide geographical scattering of guests, with visitors from Sussex, Kent, Dorset, Hereford, Cardiff and the North Midlands as well as locals, with one friend from the Netherlands. Oxford is a useful centre for meetings as it is reasonably readily accessible from a lot of the country.

The idea of naturist parties horrifies a lot of people, but they are very sociable occasions, and initial embarrassment soon vanishes for newcomers. Quite often there will be the interesting question when someone new arrives of "Is he or isn't he?" – this time we all knew we had something in common and it provided a mutual talking point as we compared experiences. Some people had not come across the term 'acorn' before, though my Dutch friend said it was usual in the Netherlands. He had been circumcised whilst working in the tropics, but most of the rest of us had been done neonatally.

All of us were fiftyish or over and many regretted that the operation was now done so seldom with younger men. I could assure them that after my Leicester experiences that it was still possible to arrange for the operation privately.

As a general comment on several years of attending all-male naturist functions it is usual for around half of those attending to have been 'cut', though the proportion seems to be higher in London. Should any member of Acorn be interested in attending a gay naturist meeting perhaps they could contact me via Acorn.

Reactions

For anyone with the urge to do so, I suppose it is quite logical to get themselves circumcised. But for the rest of us it seems a bit odd, to put it mildly. With all the reports in the media about how the foreskin has more pleasure-generating nerve endings than the glans, and how important it is for ensuring sexual enjoyment both for men and women, it does seem puzzling that some people are so keen to cut it off. My brother joined the Acorn Society some years ago and to our parents' disgust had himself circumcised a short while ago. I tried to talk him out of it (and my husband called him daft), but his mind was made up and he went and did it. He's gay, and one of his men friends convinced him, that despite a possible risk, it would be worth it to make himself more acceptable in gay circles. This is not the end of the story, because he says that when it all heals up, if it's not really tight, he might consider getting a 'revision'. I was quite appalled because I had read that some men were so obsessed that they went on having the shaft skin removed until their knobs were tacked directly onto their ball bags. I've begged him not to do it – it would probably destroy his sexuality for good.

He passes on the Acorn newsletter to us when he's finished it, and we find it fascinating reading, although some of the more extreme stuff can be depressing. We appreciate the fact that you present both sides of the argument: the only thing that stopped him getting himself done earlier were the stories of how unhappy some men – and their wives – were with the effects of circumcision.

Last week he came round for a drink and was so enthusiastic about it, describing exactly how the operation had been done, and how he'd watched as his foreskin had been cut away, and exulted as it was dropped in a tray (yuck!). As a joke, my husband challenged him to let us see the finished article. He didn't hesitate for long and stood there proudly showing off his willy to us. Compared with when I'd last seen it as a teenager, I thought it looked awful, with a raw livid scar where his previous smooth, velvety foreskin had been. My husband's reaction was to ask him if it hurt because it really did look so traumatised. He admitted that it was tender, but he seemed so proud of his new cock that we hadn't the heart to say what we really thought.

We then went on to discuss foreskins and the various types. My brother used to have an "elephant's trunk" before he was done, a type I think always looks very sexy, but which the pro-circumcision community had brainwashed him into considering 'loathsome'. My husband on the other hand, used to have a foreskin which was long enough to hide the knob with a wrinkle of skin in front. I thought this looked the sexiest of the lot and, during 'girl-talk' with my friends, used to boast about it, although really I suppose it was nothing out of the ordinary, since most men probably have similar foreskins. It just looked particularly balanced and neat to me though. Over the last few years, though, he'd had trouble with his foreskin receding, so that the tip of his glans always remained uncovered. Although it didn't actually hurt, it was a constant niggle as the tip rubbed against his underwear and, since his urine was no longer forced into a neat jet by the foreskin tip, he peed in two streams, one of which usually ended up on the floor. I was rather unhappy about this as you can imagine, but I also found his naked tip distasteful because I've always had the notion that a knob should only be bared if it is to be used. Anyway, my husband has now largely cured the problem thanks to a device called the 'Cut/Uncut' ring, supplied by someone in Hawaii (website hyperlink <http://www.aloha.net/~uncut>), which gathers the foreskin forward of the glans and holds it there until it stretches back to its original position. It took my husband six months and he now has a foreskin to be proud of once more.

One thing, which really upsets my husband, is the claim that men with foreskins are inherently 'dirty', and need circumcision to force them to be clean. Not only is this an outrageous slur on the vast majority of normal men who are quite capable of using soap and water, but also is untrue even if they don't! For instance, my husband never produces smegma, and even if he doesn't wash he never becomes smelly or unpleasant under his skin. He was forced to go for a week without washing (or having sex) while away on a course, and the only residue under his foreskin was the normal moist lubricant which is always there – which has a faint but sexy male smell which is not in the least offensive. I wish I could say the same for myself!

The Club

Reading through some old back copies of Acorn recently, I came upon a small article sent in by John from Yorkshire in Issue No 1 of 1992, which was entitled 'Advertisement' and read as follows:- Circumcised? A cut above the rest? Take this opportunity to join the world's most exclusive club. Your very own membership diploma, also an ideal birthday or xmas gift for the man without skin – £5 to S.N.I.P. (and then a Private Eye box number).

I can't ever remember seeing this before although I must have read it. Did anyone ever reply to this box number? If so, what was the resulting reply? Was it just a humorous, vulgar, crude or rude diploma for quick, cheap laugh or was there some more positive side to this advert, with something more to being a member other than a piece of paper? If anyone has any information would they care to share it with us? If anyone did reply, was there then a continuing follow-up? If we hear nothing back then we can only assume this was some way of conning people out of £5 for some piece of paper implying its owner was circumcised.

Rising To The Occasion

Boasted the Jewish insurance salesman, “Not just from the cradle to the grave, but from the erection to the resurrection!” The humour is actually a real ‘gas’ in more than one respect. Every erection, hard-on, jack or cockstand (according to taste) is dependent on the secretion of nitric oxide (NO). Sufficient nitric oxide released within the penis institutes enzyme reactions, which, by causing muscle relaxation in the blood vessels of the penis (or clitoris), leads to enhanced blood flow and consequently erection.

Within the complicated chemistry produced by nitric oxide, guanosine triphosphate is reformed as the vasodilator cyclic guanosine monophosphate using activated guanylate cybase. Of course, the monophosphate is inactivated eventually by hydrolysis, causing the erection to subside. Maintaining an erection requires the production of fresh vasodilators and backing up nitric oxide release from continued sexual stimulation.

Most impotence or erectile dysfunction results from insufficient NO production. Viagra slows down the hydrolysis of the monophosphate, strengthening and prolonging any erection. In an age when NO should mean NO, it becomes a biological YES!!

Sensuous erotic stimulation of nerve endings in the penis causes the release of nitric oxide and vasodilators. As the foreskin comprises at least 50% of penile skin, with a high concentration of nerve receptors (exceeding 20,000), and nerve endings contribute to secreted nitric oxide, there could be a connection between circumcision and erectile difficulties, especially in later life. With reduced vitality in old age, the foreskin’s contribution could be essential in maintaining potency. In early to middle adult life, though deprived of his entire foreskin, the circumcised male has sufficient vitality of remaining nerve endings to produce enough NO for vasodilation and erection.

There may be a modern scientific basis in the ancient wisdom of Jewish circumcision, where the entire frenulum and large areas of adjoining foreskin are left intact. Not only is there less risk of haemorrhage, but the retention of a rich supply of nerve endings in the vicinity of the frenulum. That could extend the period in which the Jew could, “Go forth and multiply!”

I wonder if that is why the (then) Princess Elizabeth chose a mohel for her sons, rather than have them share the radical circumcision given to a high proportion of infant citizens by the medical fraternity at that time.

One last footnote or ‘wilting word’ – of the three million men successfully treated for impotence with Viagra, I wonder what proportion are radically circumcised?

Ring, Ring

I was interested to read the article by P.L. – Hants, 1/99, regarding his frenulum piercing. I have always found my frenulum to be an exciting erogenous zone, and am delighted that it wasn't cut away with my foreskin. Like P.L., I also had it pierced about three years ago, but mine was fitted with a small barbell. Having lost two of these in the sea whilst on holiday, I decided to try a small ring when my next holiday came around. The difference in sensation was amazing, as the backward and forward movement of the ring is extremely erotic and arousing. I have since advanced to having a Prince Albert piercing which I have enlarged to 5mm thickness over a period of two years, and find the added weight on my cock very stimulating. However, two rings so close together felt a little overcrowded, so I have reverted to another barbell in the frenulum – now at 3mm thickness. These two harmonise very well and I am now considering an apadravya if I can pluck up the courage!

I also enjoyed Ray Hamble's contribution, and thoroughly endorse his views.

Naturist Resorts

I was most interested in your piece about Cap d'Agde (6/98), which, as is your wont, was totally sensible and unbiased. Cap d'Agde may not be the largest naturist reserve in the south of France, but to me it is horribly overcrowded. The camping sites are minimal, probably consisting only of less than about three acres, whereas Montalivet, on the west coast, must have well over a hundred acres of woodland camping sites – totally uncrowded, excellent shops, restaurants and swimming pool, with a wonderfully long sandy beach. It is perhaps the earliest of the naturist reserves (an aunt of mine was there in the early thirties), and well worth a visit.

Regarding the piece I sent to you for inclusion in the newsletter [it already went in 1/99. – Ed.], please edit or scrub the first grumpy sentence about the survey being seemingly only interested in circumcision. There are one or two additional queries to be added to my suggested survey for cavaliers:

11. How much of your glans is covered a) when flaccid, b) when erect?

12. Several contributions to the newsletter have mentioned that they wear their foreskins folded under. Is this possible for you? It would seem an excellent plan for those of you who complain that your foreskins are too long.

Your opinions would be welcome on all these points.

Obsession

Thank you so very much for the 1998 issues of Acorn and the first of 1999. As Will says in 7/98, "What a revelation!" I read all eight 1998 issues in one evening. I echo his thanks for producing such an interesting magazine on my favourite subject, dicks, in a level-headed (nearly said 'serious') and intelligent fashion. I'm only sorry I didn't hear of Acorn many years ago, and can only wonder what I've missed.

I am totally fascinated, borderline obsessed, with cut dicks and often wish I was circumcised. For me, the surgically bared knob is absolutely beautiful, particularly when erect, and just so 'out there', if you know what I mean. Again, I echo Will's remarks regarding his attraction to cut guys, and would say the subject and difference is also important to this gay guy. Giving oral to a cut guy is wonderful and, I dare to say, easier.

I don't remember ever having any problems with my foreskin as a child, although I can clearly remember having a medical at school when I was about five (1966) by an elderly female doctor (I assume) who yanked down my pants to inspect my dick. She grabbed me with cold bony fingers and pulled my foreskin right back, painfully hard. I remember my mother being told that it was OK and she being given advice on how I should keep myself clean. Following that event, whenever I had a bath, I was instructed by my mother to wash myself 'down there' by pulling the skin back with finger and thumb, then wriggling my bare knob in the bathwater.

Like others writing in Acorn, I saw my first cut dick at school; I was about 8 and shared a changing cubicle after a swimming lesson. The other boy had no inhibitions about stripping off naked, while I hid under a towel. I couldn't resist looking at him and was intrigued as to how or why his foreskin stayed back, there seemed so little of it as well. I didn't realise or understand that it had been cut off. Personal and intimate subjects were simply not discussed between my father and I, so I had no-one to ask. I made sure I shared a cubicle with the cut boy at every chance, and stopped hiding under my towel. Eventually one of us raised the subject – I don't remember who.

The boy's brother and father were cut so he had no experience of uncut dicks. Rather than being shocked to find that his skin had been cut off, I was totally fascinated and rather envious. Using the urinals at school, I took more notice of the boys beside me, but can't now remember seeing any other cut dicks until I moved on to grammar school and communal showers after games lessons, where of course circumcision status was obvious. Cut were sadly few and far between.

When erections began and I discovered wanking, I also discovered that, although I could retract my foreskin and bare my knob OK, the frenulum was very tight and the skin would bunch up under the corona. Frequent wanking would leave the frenulum and corona very sore. Rough handling could even result in tiny rips in the frenulum where it joined the glans. Not knowing that this was a problem rather than an inconvenience, my wanking technique altered to take account of the tight frenulum etc., so that I'd rarely pull my skin more than halfway down my knob when hard. Having a generous overhang of skin, I also got into the habit of pinching off the opening to my foreskin at the moment of ejaculation to collect my spunk and avoid embarrassing stains.

Two of my first three sex partners were cut (at birth), wonderful for my interest, and me, but they weren't accustomed to playing with uncut dicks, and the tight frenulum became a problem as they expected my foreskin to retract further than it did. I quickly found out that my problem made intercourse uncomfortable, awkward, and occasionally quite painful. The frenulum area and front of my foreskin could be very sore and sometimes quite swollen the morning afterwards. However, being more inclined to the passive rather than the active role, it has been, and is rare for me to penetrate.

Several years ago the frenulum split again and I plucked up the courage to see my G.P. about it. He said it would heal and, so long as I was careful, would be OK. Some time thereafter it happened again and I returned to my G.P. After an examination he suggested I put "a dab of vaseline on it in future" for extra lubrication. He knows I'm gay and should be practicing safe-sex, but still suggested an oil-based lubricant. On a third visit I raised the idea of a circumcision, but he thought that was quite unnecessary. I took matters into my own hands (so to speak) and investigated the possibility of a private circumcision, but the cost at that time of £640 was beyond my means.

In 1991 I was finally diagnosed as diabetic after several visits to my G.P. with persistent thrush on my knob and foreskin. The thrush seems to cause a tightening of the foreskin, particularly around the opening, and it takes quite a time after the thrush is cured to return to normal. The thrush re-occurs in hot humid conditions, like summer; I am a chef by profession and work in a hot humid kitchen. My work takes me to southern Africa from time to time where it is very hot and often very humid. I have been told that if I was cut I wouldn't get the reoccurrence of thrush. My G.P. tells me to be more careful controlling my blood glucose levels and writes another prescription for Canestan cream.

During my teens I tried all sorts of ways to hold my foreskin back, such as sticking plaster, to give me the appearance of being cut, but to no avail. The foreskin would invariably work its way forward, often leaving me sore, uncomfortable and frustrated. After I became diabetic, I tried again to 'train' my foreskin to stay retracted, but again to no avail. Then a cut friend told me of his having a P.A. piercing done. At the time I thought that there was no way I could have that done, no way... Then I saw a picture of an uncut guy with a large P.A. ring, which very effectively held his foreskin back. After some serious thinking I went for it and had a P.A. done in May 1997.

Since then I have enlarged the piercing and wear a ring 5mm thick by 19mm internal diameter. Each time I move up a size of ring, my foreskin does stay retracted, but gradually over a period of about two weeks it slowly works its way forward and stays there as the skin becomes accustomed to the larger sized ring. And the old problems still exist!

Shortly after the first Acorn journal for 1999 arrived, I again made inquiries into a private circumcision, but the price in a London clinic is now £1390, well beyond my means. I really wish I were cut, for both the aesthetic look of a cut dick and to alleviate the other problems, although, now that I have the P.A. which I really love and want to keep, there is the added problem that the surgery to remove my foreskin could/would compromise the piercing, ie. close it up.

I'm considering visiting my G.P. again, but find it very difficult to talk to him and he's always in such a mad rush to get on to the next patient. I've carefully thought of what I want and need to say so that I can explain myself clearly and succinctly, without waffling and getting nowhere. But as soon as he calls me into his consulting room I know it will all go out of my head. Any suggestions?

A.F. – Berks.

Britons Abroad

When it comes to sex, we British are the stuffiest, most repressive and most prudish nation in Europe. Sexual material and services which are openly on sale in the rest of Europe, where it clearly does no harm, are strictly forbidden here, whilst the most bloodthirsty and violent rubbish Hollywood can churn out is freely shown on our TV screens for children to see. As a consequence, we tend to kick over the traces whenever we can escape from the dead hand of Grundyism by going abroad, and we tend to behave, some of us, with a lack of inhibition which appalls even our broadminded European cousins. Jokes about hordes of British girls queuing up to drop their knickers for the dishiest Spanish waiter are not at all far-fetched, and the horrible drunken behaviour of British louts is famous throughout the world.

Older Brits, too, tend to let their hair down on holiday to an extent, which ought to cause them severe shame and embarrassment, but probably doesn't. I remember last year in Magalluf (Majorca) being woken up at 2am by three ladies in their forties from the next apartment, who were taking a break from their husbands and kids. They had been tipping sangria down their necks all night, and sampling a bit of local dick, if their drunken conversation is to be believed. They were screeching with laughter as they searched fruitlessly for their key, and one of them yelled out, "Hurry up and find that effing key Sharon, or I'll piss meself!" "Me too," said another, and Sharon shouted back, "I need to go as bad as you, but I can't find the effing thing." By now I was up, and I peered through the curtains in time to see the three ladies whisper together, then screech with drunken laughter again as they all stood round a huge urn of geraniums right outside my window, hiked their tight skirts up their thighs, pulled their knickers to one side and pissed in the grossest possible fashion into the pot, as curtains twitched all round the courtyard.

Now let's not be mealy-mouthed about this. It was no genteel little tinkle hidden by skirts spread round a ladylike crouch. This was a proper piss in the full ribald significance of the word, and as entertainment goes was the most outrageously provocative and appalling sight I have ever seen. But then when I was talking to some friends the other night, we were comparing experiences of shocking behaviour of Brits on holiday, and two of the girls who had also been to Majorca stoutly defended our boys, saying they had seen drunken foreigners behaving far worse. The thing that really scandalised them was when some lads from a well-known country tried to revive a comrade who had passed out by pissing all over him – in the middle of the main street. When the lads saw they had caught the interest of the two British girls, they started hamming it up by insultingly pulling their foreskins back and exposing their knobs at them – which the girls thought dreadfully rude. But what really shocked them was when they hit on the idea of blowing their foreskins out with urine to double the size, and then let it go with a rush, instantly reviving their drunken companion. They both said they had never seen anything so rude in all their lives, and no woman would behave like that (only because they couldn't, I thought).

At this point I decided to put them right on that subject of maidenly modesty and mentioned Spanish waiters, at which they both blushed a deep scarlet (I wonder why?). I then recounted how the three ladies had pissed, standing and thrusting their hips forward in a disgracefully immodest and unladylike fashion, into the pot of geraniums. Whilst the girls had been shocked by the rude exhibition of the bare glans, and at the unfamiliarity of ballooned foreskins, which they had never seen before – and couldn't experience themselves – I explained that I had been even more amazed at the enormous power, volume and horrifying indiscriminate delivery of female urination when in a state of urgency. Although most males would be disgusted at the thought of peeing down their legs, it meant nothing to these ladies (one of them bellowed laughingly, “ere Trace, I've filled me effing shoes!”), and what totally gobsmacked me was to see how the compost in the pots was sent flying by the hissing, splattering torrents of second hand sangria. Unless they have actually witnessed it, most men just don't know about these things, since they could never match such a degree of virtuosity themselves.

We then went on to discuss foreskins and, following on from the ballooning trick, how elastic they were. One of the girls giggled and said she had read the press report of the philistine (in every sense) pupils at Eton College – with particular reference to Prince William – who had instituted the ‘shilling ceremony’, whereby they judged a comrade's worth by the number of shillings he could cram under his foreskin. An older woman in the group made the interesting observation that, between the wars, boys with foreskins were barred from Eton, but that since then things had swung very much the other way and, following the royal example, the toffs now favoured foreskins. One of the girls sweetly suggested that this only happened when they realised that it was an ideal place to tattoo the family crest! Naturally, the point was raised that William only qualified to take part in the shilling ceremony because his mother had stopped him being circumcised when the powerful palace authorities tried to have it done. One chap said that he had read in the Court Circular at the time that a Jewish circumciser had been in attendance at the palace, presumably to circumcise the princes. He then laughed and said that the rabbi didn't stay there long. When the Princess realised what he was there for, she told him to piss off, although she may not have used those exact words. But I wouldn't bet on it!

Steve – Bucks.

Rite To Reply

Circumcision certainly brings things to a head, so I would like to reply to some interesting points raised in Acorn. From the excellent description of G.C.D.'s circumcision, he appears to have undergone a Jewish-style operation rather than a ritual one. His skin bridges were caused by the freshly cut edge of foreskin resting against the tender torn surface of the glans' adhesions, with healing at contact points.

Had the full Jewish procedure been followed, the reflected mucous membrane would have been completely eased back down the shaft away from the glans, then secured with sterilised lint strips, leaving the glans totally bare beyond the dressing. The lint would be changed daily or soaked off in the bath, and reapplied until healing took place, each time the entire glans projecting beyond it. Only then would the frenulum and its associated prepuce be able to reassert itself around the lower portions of the glans.

M.B. coined the phrase 'circumcised smegma', which would cause a real American scream! It is formed in the sulcus, and not from ridges and bumps on the glans as described by R.W. Smegma is no secretion, but fatty degenerated epithelium retained in a confined space. Jewish smegma is equally emotive, but the erect penis of a plump circumcised Jewish baby can have up to two-thirds of the glans covered without it being necessary to cut away more tissue (according to the translation of the Dinim of Milah).

During my attempt at taped restoration, I managed to maintain continuous glans cover for over three weeks. When the plaster gave way (whilst reading the newsletter), I expected to find traces of 'circumcised smegma'. There was no debris from the artificial confined space, only moistness and a delightful heightened sensitivity.

R. from Jersey mentioned the child born circumcised, though the term is a misnomer, since there is neither cutting nor scar! Born without foreskin is probably more appropriate. This anatomic curiosity, though rare, is well documented. As well as the Dutch example, confirmed by the ten-year-old boy's mother, I have read about a French-Canadian baby, born with the identical condition, in medical literature. Yes, Mohammed had congenital absence of the prepuce. He was born without a foreskin as were other early prophets, but there is no directive on circumcision in the Koran. In Judaism, the absence of foreskin is catered for with the operation of 'Drawing Drops of Blood of the Covenant' by puncturing the already bare glans.

Whether the foreskin is congenitally absent or more commonly cut away, I agree with R.W. that the glans will flare out at the coronal rim through years of unrestricted exposure. Even after a few months, the denuded infant glans becomes noticeably plumper compared to the shaft. At maturity the coronal ridge can well exceed 1cm in height even when flaccid: even to overwhelming the modesty panels of trunks, briefs, swimming costumes and shorts. During sports and leisure activities, concealment of the circumcised state has become well-nigh impossible! Sightings at adolescent school showers proved all 14 circumcised in a class of 31 to be well and truly flared at the glans edge, irrespective of penis length and maturity.

Accepting the 'flare theory', I was amazed to come across a perfectly curved, plum-shaped glans with no ridge whatsoever – on a penis that had been circumcised Jewishly at under a week old decades earlier. There were skin bridges, but not on the upper side where flaring should have been present, a perfect exception to the rule.

Anyone wishing to add to my observations, or seek information, can write to me via Acorn or formally to the newsletter. Please excuse any propensity to pedantry and hair-splitting. I can only quote my response to Jewish foreplay – "Call it a prelude – there's no fore' to play with!"

The Big Cover Up Mystery

Crisps, cocks and condoms have one thing in common. They all come in various sizes, shapes, colours and flavours. As far as condoms are concerned, the range is enormous. Magnums or snug-fits; teats or plain-ended; lubed or dry; ultra-strong or featherlight; mulberry or marsala, and enough colours to compete with the ubiquitous rainbow flag – whether for straight or gay use, or even for avoiding the mop-up after solo indulgence. The choice is a vast one. But how much of this huge array is scientifically tested for either safety or consumer satisfaction?

It's fine to test the strength of a Virgin 'johnnie' by blowing it up to match a Branson round-the-world 'hot air balloon', but, equally to the point, do the various contoured shapes really stay in place more firmly than a straight sheath? Does a teat-end really catch the semen at the time of ejaculation, or does it merely act as a reservoir into which the fluid drains at the time of withdrawal? Is the teat itself not a hazard in that it stretches backwards during insertion, thus actually presenting a thinner and weaker point in the latex immediately in front of the penile meatus (opening) which bears the greatest strain during thrusting? These questions, and there are many others, have exercised my mind for years, but I can find very little hard evidence to suggest that they have been properly investigated.

Then there are the substantial issues surrounding user suitability and satisfaction. Of course, personal preference has an important role to play and choice is essential. But is there any widely available advice, based on fact rather than conjecture? I am a circumcised gay man of average endowment with an ejaculate volume of 3.5 – 4ml. I prefer a plain ended, non-ribbed, non-contoured, non-lubricated sheath to which I can apply KY to the outside as necessary. But that's my personal choice for pleasure and comfort. It isn't based on what may be truly safest or most advisable for my needs. If I were not circumcised; if my penis were two or three inches longer; if the volume of my ejaculate were to take up more space; if I were to be engaged in heterosexual, rather than homosexual, intercourse, would my needs (not necessarily my preferences) be different? I enjoy fish and chips and suet dumplings, but are they really a suitable contribution to my diet? At 16 stone I know there are better sources of nourishment to safeguard my survival. I'm afraid, though, that I don't know what are the most suitable condoms for my sexual appetite.

Talking of food leads me to the question of condom 'taste' – as in flavour rather than decorum! Raspberry Ripple or Exotic Caribbean Coconut may be delicious to the taste buds of those of us who enjoy a lively '69', but has anyone stopped to consider scientifically whether, as with those magical pheromones, some flavours are more passion-rousing than others. Is the taste simply for fun, or should it not be researched to see if it can provide a definite enhancement to satisfaction?

As a doctor with an extraordinary active 55-year sex life behind me, and a long-standing commitment to sexual counselling, I began this article with the intention of pontificating on some of the questions I've raised. I thought I knew a fairly sound formula for matching cock to condom under a variety of usage circumstances. But once I started thinking through the subject I realised my arrogantly assumed expertise had burst – just like the sheath I used last night!

So I throw the subject open for debate. Even if we can piece together a database of user experience it will be a step forward. What have Acorn members found to be the most satisfactory condoms in a wide range of circumstances varying from penis size through to volume of ejaculate, vaginal, anal or oral use, cut or uncut state, duration of intercourse, intensity of thrusting, etc. etc.? The more we know, the better informed, and safer, we can all be.

Yet Another Seven In Circumspection

A shy adolescent called Ron,
Had part of anatomy gone.
No skin on the end like brother or friend.
He'd love to put it back on.

A Jewess, sweet Hannah seemed bad,
To prefer one gentile, a lad.
She pulled back his fore', but wanted much more.
Unconverted, he's lover and cad!

A nother, a Judith from York.
She loved nibbling cheese from a fork,
Collected from friends' uncircumcised ends.
She said she preferred it to pork!

T here was a young fellow called Paul,
Whose surgery led to a fall.
"I was done as a child and later reviled.
Now underpants cover it all."

A livelier fellow from Bude,
Was oft to go out in the nude.
His skin was so tight, its loss put things right, but stumpiness made him a prude.

F rank shook when the girl in the car,
Went circling his personal scar.
"It goes up and down", she said with a frown.
"But the knob is more plumper by far!"

A Simon of persuasion gay,
Had trouble with preputial play.
With skin cut away, left 'mushroom' display,
"I must be a 'fun-guy' today!"

Distraught

I am a 52-year-old victim of male infant circumcision (senseless mutilation). Although from the medical point of view, one might say the procedure was done well, and completely, that does not mean that I have not suffered because of it. There has been nothing on the positive side to offset this suffering. I am unaware of any benefits to me whatsoever.

Until I was 51, the memory of this tragedy was suppressed deep in my subconscious mind, and although it has caused lifelong torment in my thoughts and in my dreams (my parents can confirm this from a most early age), I never understood why or where these thoughts (feelings of inferiority, fear and distrust) were coming from. I am only now beginning to realise how devastatingly it coloured and affected nearly everything I ever did or ever was. It has had a tremendously negative effect on my life.

Last summer, I came across some web sites dealing with circumcision, and as I sat there reading the screens, the actual memory, including the pain, came flooding back to me for the first time in my fully wide-awake state. Instantly I understood why my life has been as it has (I have a deep distrust of females and consequently never married, though I am clearly heterosexual and have long desired a wife and children, two female nurses took me to the room and stood by as I was mutilated, not lifting a finger to protect me). The level of rage I experienced, stored in my memory and deeply suppressed ever since that day, returned to me last summer while I was sitting in front of my computer. The feelings were almost overwhelming and unlike anything I had ever experienced before. It has taken me this long to be able to deal with this issue on a more rational (I won't say unemotional) basis.

Many people, including many doctors, believe an infant feels nothing, has no awareness, no memory, and so there can be no psychological harm. I am here to say that this is grossly and obviously false. My memory of that event is quite detailed, far more than anyone would expect. I can remember each separate cut, the pain, and the feel of a restraining harness of some kind. I remember people speaking and facial expressions (one nurse became concerned because I would not stop crying). Believe me, this is not a fabrication. I could never make up anything like this. To those who say there is no evidence of psychological harm, I say the evidence is all around you, but you will never find it if you refuse to look.

I now feel that if I am ever to salvage anything at all of a normal life, I must somehow help in the effort to expose and end this indefensible and barbaric practice.

Editorial

I know I have said this before, but I have to say it again. This magazine comprises the be-all and the end-all of the Society. It is the link between all the members. If there is no magazine there is no Society. The magazine comprises the thoughts, opinions and experiences of the members. Yet for every item submitted for publication I have to send on about 15 letters to members who have written articles. Not requests for contacts, mind you, just written articles. I never open closed letters, but I'm sure that most of them could be open letters and be published.

It will not have escaped many members' notice that most of the contributors are regulars (and they have my heartfelt thanks for it), leaving some 150 who have never contributed a word. In the main, this is a Society which people join because they have strong feelings about the basis of that Society, so they must surely have something to say, or at least disagree with.

We know a lot about the circumcision habits of America, but not much about anywhere else. We have members in France, Belgium, Holland, Germany, Switzerland, Austria, Spain, Italy, Finland, Sweden, Denmark, New Zealand, Australia, Canada, Indonesia and more. I'm sure our members would like to know about the circumcision rates in these countries, the attitude of society to circumcision, the attitude of the health services, alternative religious rites, any changing of attitudes, the feelings of being in a minority group, one way or the other. Also, in the English language, the prefix 'un' generally means, to do something positive about something. Uncircumcised (or uncut) is one of the exceptions. What are the uncircumcised called in your country?

I have enough material for the start of the next issue, but, as the Internet information is so polarised in one camp or the other, the truth is the sufferer, so I don't want to rely on that. Therefore my plea. You don't have to be a novelist or an English academic, just write what comes into your head.

PS. It would be nice to know who is sending letters to be passed on. For all I know, I'm doing it for non-members.

Credits

I like to give credit where it is due, and I thought I had done so in the case of the book excerpt which I sent you some time ago, and which you printed in 8/98, as "Circumcision: Rome 16 January 1645, Eye Witness To History (Harvard Un. Press, 1988; copr. John Carey, 1987): pp.178-80." The excerpt in question is from the Diary Of John Evelyn (1620-1706), an intrepid traveller, diarist and dilettante. In his list of sources, Mr Carey cites a 1959 Oxford University Press edition of Evelyn's Diary, edited by E.S. de Beer. I have a World's Classic Edition of the Diary Of John Evelyn, but could find nothing in it about circumcision. Perhaps the editor(s) 'sanitised' it for 'family use'.

I hope this will clear up the attribution.

In 8/98, p.10, I opined in favour of 'low' circumcisions which leave a substantial preputial cuff. Doctors differ, but one medical opinion supporting my view is Dr Frederick Christopher (Minor Surgery, 5th. Edition: Philadelphia; Saunders, 1945, pp.478ff.). Dr Christopher also favoured a 'freehand' technique with suturing; i.e. no clamp. In future I'll try to cite medical opinion favouring 'high' or radical circumcision.

Questions And Answers

Some items from Miriam Stoppard's medical column in The Mirror.

Q. What is female circumcision? I'm 12 and I was watching a TV programme about it in several African countries and it sounded awful and painful. It was done to girls my age and even younger and everyone had to have it in certain tribes. I asked my mum what it was exactly and why they had it done, but she said she had no idea and that I should write to you. Can you help me?

A. Sometimes it's hard to understand or agree with traditions of other cultures, but it's important to realise there are probably things about our life in Britain which foreigners find very strange. Female circumcision requires the removal of all, or parts, of the clitoris, labia majora and labia minora, sometimes combined with narrowing of the entrance to the vagina. The operation is common in parts of Africa, and in the 1980s it was estimated that more than 84 million women in 30 different countries had been circumcised. I'm repelled by the idea as there's no valid reason for the operation. It's designed by men to stop women enjoying sex, and violates the human rights of women. It can cause retention of urine, and make childbirth more dangerous. There are strong moves to end the practice, but so far with little success in some countries.

Me. As a 'follow up', Richard and Judy, on their Good Morning programme a few days ago, interviewed a lovely young lady from Somalia, now living in New York, about her recent book, The Day That Changed My Life, which I think was the subject of a recent BBC programme (which I didn't see), and she gave details of being forcibly circumcised at the age of 5. This practice is a violation of the female body. Only something equivalent to male circumcision should be allowed in these primitive African countries. She now has a son of her own.

Q. Our son has to go into hospital shortly to be circumcised because he has a very tight foreskin. Our other little boy's fine and the doctor says there's no medical reason why he should need the same procedure. But we're worried that the boys will notice how different they are while they're growing up and whether it would bother them. We're wondering whether we should have our other son circumcised as well. Our doctor is dead against any unnecessary operations for our son. He wants us to leave it, but we're not convinced. We'll abide by your answer.

A. My view is to leave well alone unless there's a good medical reason for interference. In baby boys, the foreskin is stuck to the glans and normally begins to separate at about the age of three. Once he reaches the age of seven, a boy should be able to pull his foreskin back over the head of his penis. If he can't, the foreskin is too tight and the sooner it's sorted out the better. If it's left alone it will be difficult to clean the penis properly, and men with tight foreskins can experience very painful erections. It makes perfect sense to have your older son done, and to prevent embarrassing comparisons between the boys, just be open about it and explain the op. My book SexEd. has illustrations that youngsters can understand, and you can talk them through it.

Me. This should bring some response from members. Miriam thinks they shouldn't be the same, but I personally don't agree with her. I don't have any brothers, and my first wife's two sons, aged 9 and 7 when I met them, were both intact, although she was, and probably still is, pro-circumcision. Depending on the age of the boys, especially the younger one, perhaps he could be asked if he would like to be circumcised to be like his brother? The booklet, Circumcision, by Dr John Smith, makes specific comment on this situation on page 8.

Another letter to Miriam was from a young man who was worried that his penis didn't look the same as men in a porn film he had seen. If he continued masturbating, would his foreskin disappear? Miriam put him straight on this.

Book Review

Circumcision; Frankly Speaking

by Gerald N Weiss MD and Andrea W Harter

Let's take out the confusion factor right away. We're talking MALE circumcision here. The abhorrent female clitoridectomy procedure, wrongly ascribed to that word, is not in the frame. This book, as its back cover synopsis heading states, is; 'Dedicated to the education of parents of a newborn son and concerned others'.

There are probably only three types of people on this earth; lets call them A, B and C. A's are against the whole idea of circumcising babies and some even hate the thought that many males carry or choose this 'mutilation' in adulthood. The C's are convinced otherwise. For them circumcision is a procedure for which they will happily submit their sons for reasons of religion, family custom or (God bless America!) conforming to a very secular culture. In between are the B's who are indifferent to or anxious about circumcision. Through lack of information or the confusion of conflicting advice some are undecided and uncommitted. Dr Weiss's book is written for them but it will also be a happy hunting ground for the other two groups. A's will attack it, C's will be content to have their convictions confirmed in it.

Hitherto raising this subject in mixed company has been one of the last taboos. As sex became more explicit, dinner table talk advanced to take in most of it. People have jettisoned their inhibitions to share surprising details of their sexual secrets. Just one topic seemed to remain off limits. Those bold enough to mention c*****n often found it to be a real conversation stopper and to enquire after someone's circ status can still cause surprising embarrassment. People can be very coy about this particular aspect of themselves, their partners or their sons. In such a climate ignorance thrives and I believe the good doctor sets out to dispel it.

Alongside this, the more passionate of the A's have an agenda in trying to prevent C's from following their wish and custom to circumcise. A's are to thank for getting this matter aired on radio and TV chat shows, forums and websites. They are calling for an end to what they deem to be a mutilating and cruel practice that has no medical merit. Nowadays whenever a new book comes out with 'circumcision' writ large in the title we expect it will run over the reasons why we shouldn't do this terrible thing to our sons.

However, here at last is a worthy 95 pages which redress the balance. It's a reasoned book, well chaptered and easy to read. Dr Weiss is clear, calm and polite. He doesn't duck any of the issues, indeed his opening sentence reminds readers that making this decision on behalf of your son can be a sobering experience. He then takes all who care to follow him through every aspect, every issue, steadily building up the information into a powerful pile. Each time a point is made he leaves the reader to decide. Nowhere does he push or harangue; the choice is still yours.

After the introduction Dr Weiss takes his readers on a quick tour of the medical reasons that support circumcision; cleanliness, cancer prevention etc. Then goes on to quote case histories which demonstrate how most people are unaware of these issues and circumcise their boys for cultural reasons of family conformity: outside of a religious context it's just something middle America feels they need to do. They don't ask why, they just do it.

We canoe up the river of history to find the source of this, one of the world's oldest operations. There are backwaters briefly explored but the main tributary is undoubtedly Judaism and the navigating handbook is the bible.

The Jewish people are the religious guardians of this surgery who have preserved, perfected and spread it ever since the diaspora. As with their faith, there has been no great missionary zeal to draw in converts, just a willingness to explain, advise and assist those who are curiously drawn to it. Thus by a process of osmosis the operation has transferred to other faiths and countries. It's greatest manifestations are in the world of Islam and by contrast, also across the great swathe of modern, middle class America.

It's likely that Dr Weiss could promote his reasoning from a Jewish perspective but he makes no mention of this and rests his good authority on his 50 plus years as an eminent surgeon. He concludes this chapter with a brief mention of instruments invented to facilitate the procedure.

This leads us nicely into his next detailed discourse called 'anatomy of a circumcision' which is the meat of the book. It should serve to acquaint parents with several methods by which circumcision may be performed, including that of a Jewish Mōhel. Not for the squeamish perhaps although a clinical description is not nearly so chilling as the real thing.

Many parents who would otherwise be prepared to circumcise their son sometimes shrink from doing so because they don't wish to put their baby through any pain. This is natural enough as maternal and paternal instincts are first to protect. The thought of having their baby taken away to inflict this pain upon him is too much for some so they opt out. Others say better a few minutes of hurting now when he won't remember it, than several days of it in the total awareness of child or adulthood. Dr Weiss addresses this issue square on and doesn't pretend that babies don't feel pain. His most reassuring contribution is to point out that pain in adult experience is a conditioned reflex. We react to what we expect or are told about, or see coming or know. A baby doesn't know or anticipate and doesn't feel in quite this way. The question of anaesthetics is explored with a strong hint at caution.

One of the big arguments of the protagonists in this eternal circumcision debate is 'Does it prevent cancer?' A chapter is devoted to a convincing argument that it does. Many opponents of circumcision who concede this, simply dismiss the prophylactic solution by pointing at the low incidence of penile cancer. To them the statistics are so small as to be of little consequence! I've always thought those 'insignificant' few who suffer should be invited to have the last word. Here Doctor Weiss says it for them in a powerful three word sentence: 'Cancer is cancer'.

In the sexual arena in recent years, AIDS has certainly deposed cancer and syphilis and other venereal diseases as a major concern. These and other health issues in the context of the circumcision argument are given a good airing. Dr Weiss fairly pauses to include a dissenting view from his conclusions. If by now you are confused, you'll find this section ends with his evaluations neatly listed under headings: 'To C or not to C'.

Obviously he feels the medical argument is good enough on it's own, because at the end of this chapter he steps aside from the sexual dimension, explaining it is too personal and multi-faceted. I would certainly like to have seen an expansion of his book into this field. Perhaps here he could have drawn on more input from his co-author Angela Harter as she in turn could have trawled for other female testimony which favours the circumcised state in their menfolk. It's not hard to find.

'Money talks' is a short account of circumcision costs then and now. It ranges from the 35¢ 'cut' done on cowboys at the turn of the century (so that's how the West was won!) to present day fees and insurance coverage.

Those who take the decision to circumcise their son soon realise another hurdle presents itself; when and how to tell him. Some have anxieties about this. The book gives a resume of how growing boys relate and react right through to adulthood. It suggests that parents be prepared and secure in their answers to questions which may come from both sides of the family on this issue. Little boys and girls are going to spot the difference and ask about it. Dr Weiss suggests the emphasis be on your own reassuring rationale and not to enter into speculation on the motives of those who left their sons 'intact'.

Dr Weiss signs off his section in this book with a splendid chapter titled 'What's natural?' It is a common sense philosophy and draws together the religious, sexual and physical strands for us. Alone, it is worth buying this book. I'll leave those who do so to enjoy reading it without further comment.

The concluding corollary comes from Angela Harter who is as frank as Dr Weiss as she relates her own personal experiences in circumcising two sons. It is a journey in which she admits to going along with the procedure through instinct and in ignorance. Her education is in that experience – which doesn't end once the boys have been cut. As a journalist she is ever questioning and passes through belts of doubt and guilt as she explores the motives of her decision to submit her sons to this. Like most parents of circumcised boys she rests happy with her rationale in the end and is well able to share her story as an endorsement.

Don't buy a copy of this book – buy two. One to pass on to friends after you've read it and become better informed, the other to stay on your shelf until that day when your son asks; "Why am I circumcised?" If your son can read, Dr Weiss will do a great job answering that question.

The book (ISBN: 0-9667219-0-X) is available direct from Wiser Publications, PO Box 273085, Ft. Collins, CO 80527, USA at $12.95 plus $1.50 P&P, or through booksellers.

First Time Meeting

Regarding the meeting at High Wycombe and your comment about the lack of new members attending. As I am sure you are aware, it is a big step for some to go to a face-to-face meeting for the first time (and I include myself in that category), having only previously had contact in written form. Is there any way this process could be eased, possibly by asking those who had previously attended if they would be willing to bring another member(s) with them and show them the ropes? Many of us are single/alone, and I am sure would welcome such an offer of support in 'breaking the ice'.

My Answer To I.D's Questionnaire

I discovered that my foreskin was retractable at a fairly early age and achieved this in the bath at my mother's request to do what she quaintly called my "little job". It was something that was never discussed really at school, and so I continued with my bathtime ritual without a second thought. I found it a pleasurable rather than a painful experience, which gave me a marvellous feeling of uncovering something which was really meant to be covered. Foreskins only became of real interest at puberty when I saw other boys and men in the school showers and noticed that some of them seemed to have permanently exposed heads. One boy in particular took my eye and every week I checked to see that his foreskin wasn't covering the end of his penis. It never was, and he thought nothing of standing around exhibiting it to all and sundry. I couldn't conceive how he could bear to rub this most sensitive of parts with a towel and suffer the chafing of clothes. At this time I began keeping my own foreskin retracted until the sensitivity decreased, and I have enjoyed doing this ever since, mainly for the awareness that it is pulled back which does contrast greatly with the forward position. During puberty I found that rubbing my glans on the sheets gave me lots of hitherto unfelt sensations and of course, eventually, I experienced my first orgasm, which promptly sent me into a panic as to what damage I had done to myself (I was quite an innocent child who knew little of such things). My sexual identity took me down the path which meant that I went out of my way to avoid sexual encounters with girls. However, I can answer the last two questions as follows:-

My foreskin moves backwards and forwards during sex, and I find this particularly annoying when wearing a condom as it gets stuck in the forward position, thus preventing any friction on the glans. At such times I wish wholeheartedly that I had been cut, and to experience the tightness of the unfettered glans. Conversely, however, post-coitus, I do let my foreskin cover my glans as it feels too sensitive to continue with my customary retracted position. Does this post-coital super-sensitivity disappear if one is circumcised, I wonder?

To sum up, I have many fantasies about being circumcised, and long for the feeling of 'nakedness' it surely brings, judging by some of your other articles, so many of whom recommend it with as radical a cut as possible. Set against that is the fact that it is an irrevocable operation and there is always the possibility that I may regret it later. Who knows – maybe I'll find out someday.

No Contest

It's ages since I last wrote and I can't help feeling that it's time to shake things up again. Looking through old numbers it strikes me that the articles were much more punchy a few years ago. So let's put the cat among the pigeons and look at a new angle on the disadvantages of circumcision, as seen by a disconsolate, non-gay ex-roundhead.

One thing I noticed browsing through the Celebrity Status lists of past issues was that, in line with rock stars in general, Mick Jagger was uncut. Then the next day I read a report by journalist Toby Young that a "gorgeous new dark-skinned beauty" of a girl friend dropped him after a few days for — Mick Jagger, whom Toby describes spitefully as having spindly little legs, an oversized head, a mouth like a sack and a face like a mummified horse. She tells Toby when he asked what on earth she saw in him that he was the best lay she'd ever had. "He's got incredible stamina" she said. "We're talking five times a night" and it wasn't Viagra! And that's at the age of 55! As Toby ruefully admitted, he'd been dropped in favour of the world's most notorious shagger.

Even in my youth there was no way I could ever have achieved five times a night, but if I had, it wouldn't have done me any good. My partner used to complain all the time that my skinless organ made her sore after one moderate session – five would have been unbearable. The reason of course is that without a foreskin the woman is not cushioned from the battering she gets from a bare, unnaturally flared glans. If I had had a foreskin, the glans would have been narrower and the hard edge restrained within the skin, so that its movement would not have connected directly with her vagina until it emerged at the end of the stroke, ready lubricated, to give much greater pleasure. (I know this from experience after a successful restoration.)

In California where the majority of young men, spared circumcision after the NOCIRC campaign, are just beginning to become sexually active, their girl-friends are starting to appreciate the difference. Older women in the rest of the USA, most of whom have never seen, let alone experienced a foreskin, still have an unreasoning prejudice against it caused by ignorance and reinforced by brainwashing. This attitude is beginning to change as more and more people get convinced by the unshakeable logic of the California-based pro-foreskin lobby. Furthermore a campaign of education is under way to instruct such ladies of the mystery of the foreskin and to show them what they're missing – (see, for a laugh, www.geocities.com/Wellesley/1889/maleana.html which gives numerous pictures of foreskins, including a moving picture of one being manipulated from behind the glans to beyond it), backed up by comments of those who actually know what they are talking about:

"AOL Member, 4/13/99: I have experienced both cut and uncut. Uncut is by far better, the feelings are more exquisite. It is gentler and the man seems to enjoy himself more."

"Sharon, Age 44, April 11, 1999 – Most of my boyfriends have been circumcized. However, I had a few that were uncut. I was totally fascinated at looking at them with all the extra skin, and I discovered that since the penis goes in and out of its own skin, the vagina does not get sore from frequent sex. It is a much smoother process. I have had times when I was having frequent (what I call 'nuclear sex' at the beginning of a relationship) and got so sore and raw, from the common circumcized penis, of men in my age group, I had to sit in a hot bathtub, and then smear cortisone cream on my vulva. With a 'ragtop' (yerwhat?) that does not happen. I wish all guys were uncut, and I would never have a son of mine cut."

"Being American born and 35, the chances that I or my peers to have experienced sexual relations with both intact and circumcised men is a rarity. Of the few friends that I know that have been blessed to experience both intact and cut first hand, we all agree...the anatomically correct intact penis with a foreskin is a much better ride...A Talklist Member, 3/8/99"

"My ex-husband, father and brothers were all circumcised. It was all I was brought up to know about. I recently divorced and started to date again. I fell back in love with a wonderful all American born hunk! We got serious in our relationship and that's when I saw my first uncircumcised penis. I was mesmerised and didn't know what to do next. He sensed my hesitation and asked if I had ever seen one before. I told him no and he proceeded to educate me first hand. I learned and experienced the true nature of god's gift – the endless pleasures the foreskin gives to both of us during foreplay and sex. I found I could last longer without getting sore and could experiment with different oral techniques that I never could have performed on my previous lovers. I feel that opening up and letting the public know about the sexual benefits of having an intact partner would open the eyes of many sceptical women like myself and perhaps spark their curiosity to want to go out and experience it for themselves."

Next a "Personal Account of The Male Experience":

"— Now I'm comfortable with my intact status, though socially careful about speaking up on the subject. I've just gotten married. Since my foreskin is the looser variety, reaching just over the tip when flaccid and automatically rolling back when erect, my wife really didn't know about it at first. (It was, of course, always erect by the time she saw it.) Finally, after our first two sexual experiences together, I pointed my foreskin out to her and showed her what part comes off in a circumcision. She toyed with it a while, then said she couldn't imagine why anyone would want to be circumcised. She decided then that she would encourage any girlfriends of hers not to have their baby boys cut. Later, while I was entering her lying on her back with her knees up high, I reached below us and held the skin back to demonstrate how abrasive a cut penis can be when there's no rolling skin to 'give' just a little with each stroke. She got a look of sudden familiarity – that was how it felt to have sex with her first (circumcised) boyfriend, and she had never liked the feeling. During sex, his fully exposed penis would dry just enough to make the friction slightly painful. She had thought that was the way sex was supposed to be. I think intact men who are considerate can offer their wives a benefit. Before entering my wife,

I roll my foreskin forward, then push slightly inside her to moisten the loose skin and glans. Then I hold the skin still and push the glans through it and into her. She loves this because the head enters her with no 'dry' friction. My wife has been wonderful about my foreskin. She loves and is fascinated by it. Once, on a trip to the zoo, she started laughing uncontrollably in the reptile section. I asked her why, and she pointed to a tortoise just pulling his head back into his collar of skin, 'He has a foreskin, too!' In my opinion, the most persuasive arguments against circumcision are (1) it is unnatural to force an internal organ (the glans) into becoming an external organ, and (2) if God meant for us not to have foreskins, he wouldn't have put them on us in the first place. 3/10/98."

This may be the American experience but the same thing applies to Brits as well. I remember as a young man 30 years ago working with a guy, an ugly, vibrant little Welshman, who I bitterly envied – for his long muscular foreskin. Unlike me he never found it difficult to find or keep sexy girlfriends. On the contrary, he had to fight them off and I remember on one occasion he even had a girl come all the way from Canada to re-sample his uncut dick. She was quite a luscious piece who must have found it easy to get boyfriends, but the Canadian boys she had met were sadly lacking, according to what she told him. Similarly there was an older woman, happily married but not that happy. I remember being in his office when he got a call from her begging him to let her come over for a 'servicing' that evening. 'Sure', he said. 'Why not?' He explained that this was a regular monthly occurrence. He confided that her husband was circumcised and couldn't provide the excitement she craved!"

Finally we should take a look at history and ask who were the world's most famous lovers? Byron, Nelson, Don Juan, Casanova, and then of course the French as a nation – all of them uncircumcised! I rest my case and wait for the fallout!

Best wishes, R.B.W.

Always Ready

Suddenly, from out of the blue, my wife said to me, "Do you like being circumcised because it makes you look always ready?"

Surprised, I thought a moment, and then replied, "Yes, that certainly is one of the reasons."

Further to the comments made by D.D. – Oxford on Page 3 of Issue 2, may I remind the author, and other members of The Acorn Society who are similarly interested in naturist gatherings, of the existence of SCN. Smooth and Cut Naturists (SCN) is a club for smooth naturists (ie at least pubically shaven, hopefully more) with the added interest that the males must also have been circumcised to gain entry. SCN, started in 1996, continues to flourish, and holds nude meetings either indoors or out (if it is warm enough) about twice a month throughout the year.

Cogitations

Let's face it, whatever the size of the cock, the long tapering elephant's trunk type foreskin is an ugly sight! Somehow, the tapering effect seems to diminish the boldness and presence of the cock, and the roundhead, or the cavalier with a short foreskin with some of the helmet showing through, looks far more masculine.

I have this type of foreskin (unfortunately on a rather small cock, which compounds the problem!) and I've found that the long overhanging skin is not only ugly, but also uncomfortable, and I'm always aware of this piece of skin protruding from the end of my cock. Then there's the hassle of either skinning back to pee or peeing through all the length of foreskin – I don't know how I used to manage this in the days before I could retract my foreskin, but I can't

now. (By the way, to what extent do cavaliers pull their foreskins back when peeing – I don't know as I don't look!)

The solution for me was circumcision, which I investigated seriously for some time, mainly because of a tender inner foreskin which was prone to infection and painful sex. I've now overcome this with the use of lubricants (a dab of KY jelly, baby oil or even saliva at the foreplay stage does the trick, and also means that my wife can rub my helmet without it getting raw, sore or shooting off too soon).

I'm off the idea of the cut also because I am aware that the foreskin has so many nerve endings which add to my orgasm. I need to use some of the foreskin to get the full effect – the tight shaft and helmet only leaves me unfulfilled, and I'm afraid that circumcision may deprive me of this fantastic sensation. I don't know to what extent my foreskin moves back and forth during a fuck and this depends to some extent on position, angle etc., but I'm certain that I'm better off with it than without.

The other solution is the foreskin rollover, which means that I retain the full benefits of the skin, but it is rolled over so that about a third of my helmet shows. This has several advantages – it looks better, makes peeing easy and clean (no necessity to skin back), and I have the constant sensation of having the open end of the peehole and part of the helmet against my clothes. I've been wearing my foreskin this way for more than ten years, and there is a definite difference in the colour of the helmet where it has been exposed. Interestingly enough, the surface of my helmet has reduced in sensitivity considerably over the years and I can't distinguish between when the skin is fully retracted or forward. This has disadvantages in sexual stimulation as, when younger, just touching the helmet would mean an immediate stiffening.

Another aside regarding age. I think I'm hairier in the pubic region as I've got older and some of the hairs are going white, especially those on the front of my ball bag and at the base of the underside of my cock. Is this a general occurrence? I am pleased that the angle of my erection is a good 45 degrees, which is what it was ten years ago, and I wake every morning with a good hard-on.

I mentioned size earlier. I'm still not reconciled to having a small cock, and in many ways my lack of girth worries me more than length. It's just about 5" long when hard, but the girth of under 4.5" gives it a definite lack of bulk. Some time ago I bought a cock-ring tickler which I thought might be fun during sex, but it was too large for me. However, having said that, I've always had a satisfactory sex life, and my wife hasn't suffered from a lack of orgasms, so maybe size isn't everything! Sometimes when I see a huge cock I wonder how this would affect a woman seeing it for the first time. I think some guys so well endowed actually have more of a problem than tiny Tims like me!

Whatever our sexuality, we men are all curious about each other's cocks – although we won't admit it. Everyone has a good look in the showers or changing rooms, just to see how they measure up, but once you've seen someone's cock, unless it's particularly noteworthy for size or special features like an outsize helmet or a particularly tight foreskin etc, I find that I don't even notice my fellow club members' cocks. I always found this also at school. I think we men are also to some extent exhibitionists, and want to show off our tackle – perhaps asserting our masculinity.

But, are younger men shyer than older men? This may be so because of the greater sensitivity of the younger cock, and the possibility that it may stiffen in the showers. I also wonder why most cavaliers turn away shyly as they pull back their foreskins to wash. Is this prudish, or is it regarded as too up-front and bad form to expose the bare helmet? I have no worries about this and always leave my skin retracted after showering. It either remains like that when I dress and falls forward naturally or, if I'm private enough, I can do my rollover. But I don't like doing this in front of other guys as they may wonder why I'm playing with my cock in the changing room!

One thing that has never been discussed in Acorn is the size of balls. After all, these are the source of the sexuality, the cock being merely a hosepipe. Despite the smallness of my cock, I think that my balls are at least average size – say the size of a large walnut and warrant my protecting them in the pouch of a jockstrap when I play sport. I can't understand why so many men wear boxer shorts. Surely it's uncomfortable having your balls hanging loose all the time? I know it's sometimes nice to go without underpants, but generally I prefer the tackle snugly supported.

My last point is one which many men may feel but cannot act on. I would like to be able to discuss, compare notes, experiences etc, on matters sexual and cock-related, with other men in a frank and non-sexual way. I'm sure that a lot of us face the same problems and have the same questions, but are too afraid to ask or talk about it. I'm sometimes tempted to ask someone in a changing room, e.g. if he has a specially tight foreskin, whether he has difficulties, has considered circumcision etc, but I'm sure I'd be regarded as somewhat peculiar!

Maybe these views and notes will draw comment from other members.

Comments And Topics

With regard to the letter from R.W. – Surrey (1/99, p6), partial circumcision is a topic that needs more attention and more research. And I don't think Cowper's Glands (named for, and probably by, Thomas Cowper, 1666-1709) produce smegma. Rather, they produce a mucoid secretion, and they discharge into the bulbous part of the urethra. Smegma is probably produced by sebaceous glands in the skin of the penis. The BNA term for Cowper's Glands is glandulae bulbourethralis; and their equivalent or analogue in the female are Bartholin's Glands (glandulae vestibularis major; Caspar Bartholin, 1655-1738).

The comments of The Frenchman (1/99, p14) are interesting to a point; but as for his obiter that "only basically evil and perverted people can circumcise their children", well, one wonders, with F.W. Maitland, when such ungracious remarks will come home to roost; and as the late Stanley Baldwin once remarked (to Lord Brownlow, I think), "Is that the best you can do?"

Some topics for further research (and for input/questions/comments by Acorn members):-

Circumcision in Japan

Circumcision in Mexico

Circumcision in Brazil

Circumcision in Holland

Frenotomies (or frenectomies) without removing the foreskin

Editorial

This is my last magazine as editor. After nearly ten years I think it's about time I hung up my boots and let a younger, fresh editor with maybe different ideas take over and, as I am among the top five aged members of the Society, it is becoming a bit of a burden. I must say though that I have enjoyed it very much and look on you all as a sort of family, as I feel I know you better intimately than maybe your own families do.

Your new editor is working on the next edition and I think it best if I allow him to introduce himself in that. Quite a few will know him from our meetings, where he has been a regular attender, and I think is well liked. I'm confident that he will show the same lack of bias as I have striven to maintain.

A new P.O. box number will be forthcoming, but this one will still be in existence for some time as it is widely distributed on the Internet and in the magazines of other organisations, so I will be forwarding anything that comes into here.

And lastly, of course, I will not be deserting the ship, as after all, I'm still the Society's Chairman.

Circumcision — My Story

Part I

How it began.

When I was still at school around about 14 I started to look up words in dictionaries and things like most of us. I also had a interest in science so I often looked at factual books. I started to see pictures of men and growing boys and noticed that the skin on the end of the penis in most of the pictures showing men was not like mine! I had a piece of skin that hung over the end like, well some say an “elephant’s trunk”! Often I read about the 3 states of a penis 1. flaccid, 2. semi erect and 3. fully erect. Books showed what they said was the average male organ in the flaccid state with the head just showing though the foreskin and as it gets more and more erect so the skin folds back. Well mine did not do that or look like that for that matter! I thought, well, perhaps I am not old enough. It was when I was 15 that I then read about aboriginal initiation ceremonies and read a lot about circumcision. I had also noticed that a lot of men at that time kept their skin pulled back.

My first time with the skin back.

I was 16 and still at school when I decided to pull the skin back, I also decided that I would pull it back in the toilets at school so that I had to do it quickly and not play with myself (I was doing this all the time and knew that I would not leave the skin back if I did) I had to go straight into class with it back so that it had to be left there! So this is what I did. After about 40 mins it started to get uncomfortable and I ignored it as much as was possible. When school was over that day I went straight home and had a look at what had happened. It had ballooned up around the end and was very painful. After about 30 mins manipulation the swelling went down and I got the skin forward. I remember at the time thinking that if I had not got it forward then perhaps this is how men may have got the skin to stay back, of course I was wrong! After that day the skin was a lot looser and I tried to keep it back.

The trials and tribulations of having a loose foreskin.

After that first day I tried to keep my skin pulled back but it kept slipping forward. This is the first problem and one that a lot of men will know if you have a loose foreskin, the hairs get caught between it and the head. (We all know that is why most men end up pulling at themselves so often.) Also I found that when it slipped forward the head was getting slimy and more smegma was produced. I started to not like this, and found it so annoying. Lastly I was forever pulling it back and it was forever slipping forward.

The decision to cut it off.

At 19 I had read a number of things about initiations and circumcisions and most of what I read suggested that it was only performed in these types of rites of passage. So I did not know that I could go to the Doctor saying that I had a problem and have it removed professionally perhaps on the NHS. My parents were very open but I thought that they would freak if I said that I wanted my willy cut! So I decided to do it myself, (and the aborigines seemed to do all right in the bush). So I tried with the thing that was most like a scalpel which I thought was a razor blade, but that turned out to be slow and painful. I then got to thinking about a carving knife, well that was the thing used to cut meat and I might be able to cut it quickly enough to not feel too much pain.

The first cut is always...

I chose the day when I was going to do it, also a day when my parents were going to be out. I psyched myself up by reading some of the things on circumcision and saying to myself "I am going to do it!!" over and over again as I washed the carving knife and cutting board. I then sat on the kitchen floor with my back to a wall and my legs spread with the cutting board in between them, I was determined to do it! I just wanted to have the tip of my head showing when soft, and for it to pull back when hard. So I pulled the skin slightly forward and rested the knife on the skin, it felt cold to the touch. By then I had learned to let the knife do the cutting. So I ran the knife over the skin in a straight line careful not to lift the knife off, so as to run the blade over the same place with each stroke. With the first stroke I did not notice the pain, it was there but I had a natural high from what I was doing. But I do remember feeling every burr and pit in the knife blade as it cut into my flesh. The feeling as I pushed and pulled the knife over the skin harder and harder was so intense (not so much pain as intense feeling). I could almost hear the sound the knife was making when it was running over the skin, like running a fingernail over the teeth of a comb.

The pain is too much.

I managed to get half way though the job when I started to cut into the sensitive inner skin. This is when the pain got to be too much for me and I ended up stopping. I did try to continue but just could not. I managed to stop the bleeding and in fact I was not bleeding too much at all. I have always healed up relatively quickly so I wrapped a dressing round my cut willy and went around for two days like that. So I ended up with two holes in the foreskin I could push my head through.

Finishing the job (3 cheers for the NHS).

Something had to be done as it was not normal for a man in the UK to have two holes for the head to go through! There was also a bad infection that I was getting worried about as it was starting to smell somewhat. So I went to the local hospital's A and E department, it took me 3 goes to get the courage to talk to the nurse. When I did it was most embarrassing since after they took the details she shouted "split foreskin" down the ward. Well, I saw the Doctor and he said that he would try and save as much as possible but because of infection I had to have a circumcision and it would be done under a general anaesthetic. So it was done and I ended up with a job that was not either loose like I wanted or tight. But I was cut!!!

The end of part I

I was never absolutely happy with the job but that was because of me trying a DIY job instead of getting it done professionally. I lived with it and had a good sex life until I was 30 when I experimented with piercing and then with re-circumcision but I had learned a lot and did a better job and I am much happier now but this is for part II. Please see a Doctor if you want anything done but make sure that you get what you want!

From France

Your readers' letters are quite interesting, but I cannot see what all the fuss is about – except for Joseph's letter (2/99), which I will respond to later.

I was happily uncircumcised until the age of 29 when, after working in Malaysia, I developed a persistent type of athlete's foot under the foreskin and elsewhere. On my return to France I was treated for a year with creams, lotions, pills and jabs, but it kept returning. After a visit to England, when my granny told me her brother was circumcised when about 12 because he had "problems down there", I asked my doctor whether circumcision would solve the problem. He replied "100%", and when I asked why he had not suggested it before, he said that people here did not like it. It is true that the French are very rarely circumcised. Some friends over here even asked how I was going to make love afterwards!

Anyhow, in I went at 8 in the morning and out at 4 in the afternoon after a little cut under general anaesthetic, stitches out 8 days later, and gently making love a week later. I am now a happily circumcised man! My girlfriends who knew me before and after, prefer the 'after' version, especially during intercourse as they have more sensations due to the skin being tightly drawn back and thus rubbing with the whole shaft length. If you are uncircumcised, try holding your foreskin tautly back during intercourse and see what she thinks of it. Personally I have the same erections and ejaculations whether solo or accompanied. The only difference is that previously the pleasure was mainly concentrated on the glans whereas now it is spread over the whole penis and the groin, which gives a slightly fuller, deeper pleasure.

Most of the women here have never had a circumcised partner, and are quite happily surprised afterwards. I still have persistent athletes' foot on my right foot and belly button, but amputation of my foot does seem rather excessive, though circumcision, apart from curing my little problem, has had no disadvantage, and I could say even a slight advantage insofar as the little extra pleasure it gives to my partners.

In answer to I.D. of Herts' letter, I had a foreskin that wholly covered my knob without any excess when limp, and half covered it when erect (at 18cm if of any interest), neither tight nor loose, and a frenulum long enough for it to be pulled back wholly and smoothly. My glans has not flared since the operation 5 years ago, but a friend of mine says his glans increased greatly after being circumcised. I have never had problems with smegma either, water and soap being abundant and cheap. Surely, if a man has a cheesy knob, then he probably has a sweaty bum, musty balls, B.O. armpits and socks that stand up by themselves, so I don't think circumcision is a remedy for that problem.

What I really would like to say to you all is that circumcision has no negative effects, so if you need circumcising for medical reasons, then go ahead and do it rather than suffer from a tight foreskin or whatever. If you are circumcised already (usually at birth), and are not too happy about it, you have no advantage in being uncircumcised, so don't let your genital state hinder your present state of mind. I have also heard talk of mutilation, but all men have a genital scar that runs from the anus to the frenulum via the scrotum and the underside of the penis, which is more or less visible, as it is with the trace left by circumcision. Uncircumcised, my willy was pink and brown when retracted, and circumcised it is the same. We all also have another scar; the belly button – except for Adam.

However, if you simply wish to be circumcised for no medical reason, then why not have it done. Men and women undergo cosmetic surgery in order to feel better about themselves, and why should the removal of a piece of nose be any different from a piece of skin? I think the only problem here is that the wish to be circumcised may be a way of blaming a sexual dissatisfaction on a foreskin, and the operation may not resolve your problem, though it will do you no harm. The same applies to those circumcised who wish to be uncircumcised, if that were possible.

As for A.F. of Berks, regarding the cost of private circumcision in the UK, he should go to France. A ferry trip there and back and a few nights in a hotel near the clinic before his return (hotels are cheap in France). My circumcision cost 2500 Fr. all included (about £250). You need to see a 'URULOGUE'. The appointment can be made by phone and there is no waiting list.

I was also very touched by Joseph's letter as, if I now had a baby, I would have him circumcised when young, but with anaesthetic. I was horrified a few years ago when I learnt that circumcisions on babies, as well as other operations such as tonsils, were done without anaesthetic. I just cannot believe that in our 'civilised' world we actually practice barbarism in our hospitals. Joseph's problem is not that he was circumcised, but that he was tortured. He should not fight circumcision, but the lack of anaesthesia and respect for toddlers. Would you have your appendix removed without any anaesthetic whilst fully conscious? Then don't operate on your children without ensuring they will receive an anaesthetic. And that applies to Jews and Muslims who may claim traditional rites but are quite happy to accept progress when treatment for cancer etc. is on offer.

R.H. – France

Reply To 'Distraught', (2/99)

You don't really expect us to believe that after 51 years you can suddenly be overwhelmed with distress at your circumcision, especially in such detail. Might I suggest that you are looking for a scapegoat upon which to blame your feelings of inferiority, fear and disgust – feelings about what?

OK, so you distrust women. Have you been to some whacky Regression Therapist lately who has put these thoughts in your mind? Are you so afraid that you have never, in 51 years, had sex with a woman? How did it feel if so? Sounds to me like you are closeted and don't want to admit it.

So now you say you no longer have a normal life, surely your normal life has been for 51 years without a foreskin and a fear of women and I don't think anything has changed. If you intend to push the bandwagon against RIC then please ensure that you have all the facts and realise that whilst RIC is not an individual choice on the part of the child, it certainly has proven benefits.

I would like to know if anyone else in your position feels the same way or does anybody have thoughts similar to mine as to your state of mind and ridiculous assumptions?

Chris – Aussie

The Time Has Come

Iam to be circumcised tomorrow. I have only just found this site and it is interesting to find so many favourable testimonials from guys who have been done as adults. With so much anticirc debate going on I thought I was in the minority for wanting such a procedure. I have wanted this for a long time. In some ways I almost feel like I am being initiated into the realms of adulthood; strange as it sounds.

I have weighed up all the arguments and now its 10 hours to go till surgery. I am nervous but I have made my decision and I can't wait. It has taken me years to pluck up the courage and finally its all going to happen. If you could e-mail me more information regarding the Acorn Society I would be most interested.

Many thanks.

Comments On 'No Contest' (3/99)

I don't believe any chap at 55 years old, or even younger, makes it 5 times a night, whether he be circumcised or not, But I suppose we all like to brag a little when the ladies are around. I would like to comment on the fact that a circumcised penis is likely to make a woman sore. I find this a bit far-fetched with the amount of juice that a woman should produce, and also the amount that a man produces. This should lubricate a woman and not cause undue friction. (They say it's a poor fanny that can't supply its own grease.) Personally I have found women get a bit too wet at times, and the friction is not enough to make me come sometimes.

My wife found my long foreskin to be very uncomfortable and insisted that I be circumcised. She said that my foreskin was like a roll of lino being pushed up her. After I was circumcised we both found that the result was right, we have always encouraged our friends to be circumcised if possible, and out of those that find the condition quite satisfactory, none have ever complained about soreness.

For those who like oral sex, the circumcised state is very much the best and a lot cleaner, as is the shaven woman. Getting your mouth full of hair when you try to suck her clit is not as nice as a shaven one.

In this day and age, most women know all about foreskins and pulling them back. That is one thing that comes naturally, they shouldn't need educating on the subject. If Sharon at 44 has only just found foreskins fascinating, she must have lived quite a sheltered life.

Since I was circumcised I have had much more feeling in my penis, especially when I visit a massage parlour and the girls rub oil into my knob, which make it very sensitive. All the parlour girls I have had dealings with, and they are many, all like the circumcised penis for their looks and cleanliness.

I am a naturist, and being circumcised and shaven makes me feel a lot more naked. As for the comment that God meant us to have foreskins, he also gave us testicles, appendixes, kidneys, and many other bits and pieces which all get removed sometimes, so why not remove foreskins if you like your body without one, as I do.

I watched mine being cut off and loved every minute of it. In fact, I have contacted the clinic in Byfleet which was mentioned in the last issue and I have an appointment for the 25th of September to see if I can have even more foreskin removed to tighten things up a bit. As you can tell from my comments I am very much in favour of circumcision and cut as short as possible. Being a naturist I get around the house and garden naked, and the girl next door sometimes joins me sunbathing. She says she likes to see my circumcision and is trying hard to get her boyfriend circumcised. I always look forward to the Acorn magazine and we need a lot more women's response to circumcision. I'm always happy to correspond with male or female through the magazine with those interested in circumcision, and exchange photographs any time.

After Frenulum Surgery

Good morning! I had the frenulum until I was twenty and I made sex, then I injured it with my nails; after a year the urologist operated the frenulum in 5 minutes with a cut: it remained only the tip of the frenulum and a scar underneath.

My question to you is: What differences exist, in the same psychological conditions, making sex (more stretch feelings or what uncomfortable sensations or feelings?) and in its performance (ejaculate frequency and distance) and during, before and after the frenulum's injury and in particular after the surgery?

Being sure that I will receive a reliable reply, I thank you.

102909@ticino.com (Pier Serta)

[I'm not sure whether he means the frenulum or the foreskin in this. If any members can interpret what he is meaning, and can answer some of his questions please either reply to him by e-mail or through me. – D.A.]

Acorn Inspections

Thank you for the latest edition (No 3/99) of Acorn, and for including my short article about Smooth & Cut Naturists (SCN) on page 13.

Following on from the penultimate paragraph of the article called 'Cogitations' on page 15 of the same issue and as the issue also contained an invitation to the next Acorn Weekend in November, my mind focused on the missing link in Acorn activities which would make the club more enjoyable.

It is basically that one essential thing is missing amongst all the excellent Acorn organisation and the magazine itself: It's all writing or talk with no inspections of the parts we are talking about!

All males (and a great number of females) are interested in the male sex organs – sex organs which, although all of a basically similar design are in fact all individual and different in so many ways, making everyone curious as to what 'equipment' the other fellow has. Shoot the person (probably a woman?) who said, "If you've seen one, you've seen them all" – absolutely NOT TRUE!

The author of 'Cogitations' (Anon) states: "I would like to discuss, compare notes, experiences etc. on matters sexual ... with other men in a frank and non-sexual way". I think most members would agree with this. He goes on to say that "lots of us face the same problems ... but are afraid to talk about it".

In my view, placed in the right environment, members would most certainly have mutual benefit from such discussions and an even better environment would be one where, if they wished, those present could be nude or at least openly able to compare their 'tackle' (especially circumcisions, of course) in an honest and open way.

So why not select a private venue for an Acorn Weekend where, for at least part of the time, members would be encouraged to discuss matters of mutual interest freely – illustrated by inspections and comparisons?

Such venues do exist – as a devoted nudist, and Organiser of Smooth & Cut Naturists, I am organising an exclusive nude weekend for SCN members at an hotel in the very near future.

What better environment (exclusive to Acorn) in which to be open about discussing mutual problems and comparing notes (etc!) with other members?

How about it Committee?

Smoothie John

Dear David,

Firstly many thanks for getting my newsletter 3/99 released. I do hope the system does not collapse – I enjoy reading some (but not all) of the letters.

Bearing in mind your comments on lack of copy, I attach below a report on a statement by the AAP which is extremely relevant to our organisation and which should fill a slot or two. I know I've recently sent you some notes on the BJU supplement on circumcision which was equally relevant (hope you got it) so I'm doing my best, even if it may not be to everyone's taste.

Report on the Policy Statement of the American Academy of Paediatrics Task Force on Circumcision

My impression on reading the statement is one of a dismal and depressing document. An attempt to clear the decks and help American doctors and parents to make an informed decision on the matter has succeeded purely in clouding the issue. The authors' claim "to give parents of all male infants accurate and unbiased information" is patently false: in every case they trot out the tired old claims for the benefits of circumcision, most of which have been so thoroughly discredited in the past. Very much in second place, they then state the case against circumcision, dismissing it in as few words as possible.

Some of the most telling factors of all, such as the violation of human rights of the victim, are not even mentioned. No mention is made of the word 'mutilation', although this is unequivocally the right description and one they do not hesitate to use elsewhere in connection with similar operations on females. Their use of adjectives provides clear grounds for an accusation of bias: they demonstrate the 'potential' medical benefits of circumcision, which to the layman could indicate 'expected to be considerable', when it should in fact be 'negligible'. Most notable is their claim that "there is no 'absolute' medical indication for routine circumcision", with the implication that the next word should be "but - -". Understand that the word 'absolute' did not figure in a previous statement but was added subsequently to placate the pro-circumcision lobby, when they first introduced the largely spurious claims about UTIs in an attempt to counter the mounting publicity of the anti-circumcision lobby.

In fact a large section of the statement is devoted to "Circumcision Status and UTI (Urinary Tract Infection) in Males". Much play is made of the fact that intact males are up to 10 times as likely to develop them as circumcised ones. They then shoot down their own argument to some extent by stating that differences in statistical methodology can cause confusion, i.e. that the results are suspect. But the most telling point of all, that such infections are usually only of minor importance is hidden in the phrase “UTI usually necessitate a physician visit and may involve the possibility of hospitalisation” [my emphasis]. So what? The same could apply to most childhood diseases. The point is that the layman will read huge tracts of bilge which, without actually saying so, give the impression that UTIs are a real problem for intact boys, when they patently are not.

Even worse is the emphasis put on the claimed higher incidence of cancer of the penis among intact men. Once again a whole page is devoted to this subject when it should have been dismissed as a non-factor after the first paragraph – in which it states that the incidence among predominantly circumcised American males is slightly higher than among the non-circumcised male population of Denmark. Instead of accepting this as a valid comparison, since Denmark enjoys a similar life-style and first world status, it goes on to mention the much higher incidence in third world countries such as Brazil and India, where conditions are in no way comparable. The authors admit at the end that “in a developed country such as the USA, penile cancer is a rare disease and the risk of it developing in an uncircumcised man, although increased compared with a circumcised man, is low”. Even so the reader is bamboozled into thinking that, since so much space is devoted to it, it must be an important factor. Otherwise why make all the fuss about what is essentially a non-issue?

In the section entitled “Penile problems”, there is a refreshing honesty in the admission that in a study in New Zealand, “circumcised infant boys had a significantly higher risk of penile problems (such as meatitis) than did uncircumcised boys”. They then spoil it by stressing that after infancy, intact boys suffer much more from balanitis and inflammation of the foreskin, without mentioning that such problems usually clear up spontaneously or are easily treated with medication. They fail to mention that meatitis is a much more serious condition often requiring surgery. They also fail to mention that infant ‘phimosis’, by which they mean an unretractable foreskin, is not pathological, is also usually resolved spontaneously with time and if not, can successfully be treated with the application of steroid creams. However they do admit that “there is little evidence to affirm the association between circumcision status and optimal penile hygiene”. This, of course, is the reason most frequently given for perpetuating circumcision when there is no other excuse.

The paper gives large coverage to epidemiology and embryologic and anatomic consideration, which is of peripheral interest only to non-medically qualified readers. It does however make the point that “there may [my emphasis] be a concentration of specialised sensory cells in specific ridged areas of the foreskin” and the corollary that sensitivity and therefore pleasure are degraded when the foreskin is removed is ignored. According to a presentation from a distinguished medical source on the subject at last year’s symposium in Oxford, there’s no ‘may’ about it. The tip of the foreskin is packed with sensory cells which are lost through circumcision. The authors do say that “there are anecdotal reports that penile sensation and sexual satisfaction are decreased for circumcised males” but then quote Masters and Johnson who “noted no difference in exteroceptive (?) and light tactile discrimination on ... the glans penis between circumcised and uncircumcised men”. Once again, Masters and Johnson’s claim has been thoroughly discredited in recent years because of deficiencies in the way in which the test was conducted. The paper goes on to mention that circumcision is uncommon in Asia, South America, Central America and most of Europe. This totally obscures the proper emphasis which is that, apart from the religiously motivated Muslim countries and the Jews, the Americans, who have no such motive, are the only developed people in the world who routinely circumcise their male children.

In the section headed “Complications of the circumcision procedure”, once again statistics are quoted which are at odds with the most recent findings. The paper states that the complication rate is between 0.2% and 0.6% and that most of the complications are minor. Statistics quoted in NORM-UK circles suggest that this greatly understates the real situation. They go on to mention some of the more distressing effects of circumcision but brush them aside as ‘isolated cases’. What they do not explain is how you apologise to a child whose penis has been burned off. Even one ‘isolated case’ is one too many, a totally unnecessary tragedy for some poor child, mutilated for so little reason.

Having subtly weighted the paper in favour of circumcision, the authors then establish their humanitarian principles by insisting that analgesia should always be used if circumcision is performed. So that’s all right then. They spoil it by admitting that analgesia is only partially successful. However they do accept that circumcision causes severe trauma to infants.

There is a brief discussion about the relationship of circumcision to HIV and the authors suggest that foreskins are more vulnerable to infection. No attempt is made to explain why uncircumcised Europe suffers only a fraction of the incidence of HIV compared with circumcised USA but they do concede that behavioural factors are far more important than circumcision status. In other words another red herring.

When it comes to ethical issues they start by stating that “the practice of medicine has long respected an adult’s [my emphasis] right to self-determination in health care decision making” and mention the importance of “informed consent”. They go on to say that “for children who lack the capacity to decide for themselves, a surrogate, generally a parent, must make such choices”. The illogicality of such a statement in the context of an unnecessary bodily alteration as opposed to essential medical treatment is breathtaking. The rights of a child to bodily integrity are totally disregarded, as is that of the same child when he becomes an adult, whose stated right to self-determination has thereby been violated. What is also depressing is the total disregard of the distress, anger, desolation and sense of deprivation being expressed with ever increasing vehemence by victims as they find the courage and the voice to do so – and of which the authors must be aware.

The question arises, after initially expressing their view that circumcision was unnecessary in a previous statement, why has the American medical establishment retreated and written a paper which clearly weights or misuses evidence in favour of the pro-circumcision cause? The best that can be said is that they are trying to avoid the issue. The answer to the question is that they wrote it whilst looking over their shoulder, fearful of the unrepresentative but influential body of Americans who demand circumcision with all the blind unreasoning fervour which one associates with fanatics.

The cynical may also suggest that common sense can never prevail whilst the foreskin harvest nets so much gain for those of the medical profession who practice it.

And More

Some celebrity sightings this month include little dancer Wayne Sleep, who is uncut and surprisingly well-endowed. I suspect that this might be an optical illusion as he is only about 5' tall, though?!!

Likely lad Rodney Bewes is also uncircumcised, but not very well-hung.

Stanley Baxter at the age of 70+ has kept his figure and is also well-endowed and uncut.

K.G. – London

[We seem to have crossed lines regarding Stanley between this and the next list. – Ed.]

And Even More

Here's a new celebrity list. All the information below is based on personal experience. As usual, foreskins in lower case, circumcised in capitals.

Response To 'Cogitations' (3/99)

I empathise with Anon's feelings on the long tapering elephant's trunk type foreskin being an ugly sight. While not coming under that particular description, I had foreskin problems most of my life, so I've got the baseball cap, the t-shirt and C.D.

It would appear that he and his wife have a perfectly satisfying and fulfilling sex life, so why not leave well alone. After all, he has elected not to have the 'cut' and feels he is better off with his foreskin than without it. I took a gamble and opted for its removal.

He also is still not reconciled to having a small cock. Well, if he can boast 5" when erect, he is certainly not a tiny Tim, and his wife hasn't suffered from a lack of orgasms. I, personally, can only boast 4.5" in length and a girth of 5" when erect, but, since being circumcised nineteen years ago, my sex life has improved. I should also add that my frenulum was removed, and I think that all my nerve endings now converge on that spot, which nearly drives me crazy when aroused. And I'm still enjoying an active and fulfilling sex life at 71 years of age. By the way, I'm 71 years young, not old and, contrary to popular belief, it doesn't fall off, you know!!

Like Anon, I used to have a 'hang-up' about being under-endowed but, let's face it, there is not a lot we can do about it. Instead of thinking the other man's grass is always greener, why not concentrate on perfecting the quality of what we do have.

Yes, we men, whether we like to admit it or not, are curious about each other's tackle, and I also find that younger men are shyer and tend to wear trunks or boxer shorts in the showers. It may be due to their conditioning, or because of greater sensitivity, or even a genuine coyness about exposing their privates. Don't forget that we still live in a homophobic society, and growing up and maturing can be quite a traumatic time for many young people. I remember I was in my forties before I would walk about naked in the showers or changing rooms. As far as adjusting the foreskin to wash one's penis is concerned I think that is a very personal thing, and there are some things that should remain private. I don't honestly think prudishness comes into it.

Regarding 'ball' size, like Anon, I have a smallish cock with larger balls, while my best friend has a large cock and quite small balls. It is simply a matter of coming to terms with what we are given, and the wearing of jockstrap, briefs or boxer shorts is very much a matter of personal choice. Is it not also the case that the continual wearing of tight-fitting underwear can affect one's fertility?

In conclusion, I would be only too happy to discuss any matters sexual and cock-related with Anon in a frank and non-sexual manner. But, one last word of warning (and I speak from personal experience), be very cautious about approaching any stranger in the changing room regarding his genitalia. I don't think the majority of men are sufficiently well-adjusted yet to cope with that.

J.C. – Ayrshire

P.S. While I fully appreciate the editorial comments about the ratio of letters passed on to items submitted, I still feel very strongly that if a member does send a personal letter for forwarding, the recipient should at least have the common courtesy to acknowledge it, even if only to say that they neither wish nor are in a position to carry on personal correspondence. In the past year I have sent six such letters and had only one acknowledgement. If members are so 'screwed up' or 'secretive' about discussing matters concerning the male genitalia, then they should state in their articles that they are not in a position to enter into personal correspondence.

The Gilgal Society

The Gilgal Society is a non-profit organisation which exists to provide accurate, medically approved, information about male circumcision and its benefits in terms of health and self-image.

Its publications include a video of an adult male circumcision, a guidance booklet for those considering circumcision for themselves or their sons, and a leaflet answering some of the questions teenagers and young people have about the operation.

The leaflet is available in English, French and German whilst the guidance booklet is in English and French with a German version to follow later. It is hoped to be able to increase the range of languages in due course.

A provisional list of doctors, clinics and hospitals willing to perform circumcisions is jointly published with the Acorn Society.

The Gilgal Society acts as the sponsor of a web site for the International Circumcision Information Reference Centre, an on-line resource set up to provide correct information and to counter the lies, half-truths and distortions with which anti-circumcision activists have flooded the web.

The Gilgal Society and ICIRC believe that parents have a right and duty to exercise their choice as to whether or not to have a son circumcised, in the light of available evidence regarding its medical benefits and risks as well as its social and religious significance within their community.

For more information and prices of publications please send an S.A.E. (and a loose 1st Class stamp for expenses) to The Gilgal Society (Dept A), PO Box 21675, London, SW16 4WY.

Editorial

Welcome to the first issue of the year 2000, and my first issue as editor. I would like to say a big thank you to David for his outstanding job over the last ten years. There is no question that his role has been crucial in keeping the Society together and his unbiased approach has made the newsletter a robust forum for discussion rather than just one sided ranting as is the case in many other organisations. I shall do my best to continue his work.

Please note the new box number is now up and running and it should be used for all correspondence to the Society. The old box number will be phased out in due course.

We will get at least four newsletters out this year as evenly spaced as possible. These four issues will make up the balance of issues that were due in 1999, and therefore it has been decided there will be no additional subscription for the year 2000. I know that this reduction in frequency will disappoint many people, but the biggest problem is a lack of good content. We have a small core of members who have written many articles, and the large bulk of us have contributed very

Skiathos

My partner and I have recently enjoyed a two week sojourn to the Greek island of Skiathos. Although a relatively small island, Skiathos boasts quite a number of very beautiful beaches. Two of these in the south are designated Naturist and can be reached by bus, followed by an arduous twenty minute walk or, as we soon discovered, by boat.

Aptly named: big banana and little banana (because of their crescent shape) they are separated by an outcrop of rocks forming the stalk. Big banana, we discovered is a mixture of textile and naturist, totally textile at one end, totally naturist at the other with a small mixed area in-between. Little banana however was totally naturist and this was the one we preferred. It boasted a very nice Taverna, sun beds and shades as well as the most amazingly crystal clear water seething with fish.

Whilst lazing away the hours, soaking up the sun, I decided to undertake a bit of investigation on behalf of Acorn, so here are the approximate results:- 75-80% of the beach population were heterosexual couples. The remaining 20-25% were gay men, with a smattering of assorted others. The predominant nationalities were British, Dutch, Scandinavian and a few Greeks. The ages ranged from 17 – 70+ and I would estimate that 85-90% of the males were uncut.

Of the men who were circumcised there did not appear to be any connection to age, although the majority seemed to be British. I was surprised to note that quite a number (perhaps 20%) of the uncut men wore their foreskin rolled back to sunbathe and swim. Having read so much in the Acorn magazine about the extra sensitivity of the uncircumcised glans, I would have thought they would have found exposing it to the sun very uncomfortable.

My Prince Albert was very much in the minority and I only spotted two other genital piercings during ten or eleven visits to the beach. Initially it did arouse some curiosity but fortunately no hostility and soon became accepted, along with my other piercings.

The freedom of a naturist beach is something I can really recommend for a holiday and a great way to loose some of the inhibitions and worries about the shape/size and surgical status of your wedding tackle!

V.W. – Leicester

PS: A lot of pubic hairdressing was in evidence, the most popular style for men being shaven scrotum and short neatly trimmed bush, although some were completely depilated, whilst a few favoured the wild and natural look. Most of the ladies sported the bikini wax.

Piercing Sensitivity

Although its not a strictly cock related issue, I wonder if any other Acorn members can explain why some men have erectile, sexually sensitive nipples whilst many of their more unfortunate brothers have little or no feelings there at all. You may have gathered that I am one of the lucky ones and the merest touch on one of my erect nipples can cause stirrings down below. The brush of a shirt or hand can send electrical feelings straight to my groin and, since having them pierced, the movement of the rings as I bend or turn can cause a quick thrill. However a friend who had non sexual nipples found that his piercing made no difference at all. Most people seem to associate male nipple play with S&M and consequently tend to be rather rough but a gentle tickling and stroking can be a far more effective method of foreplay, leaving the heavier stimulation for later. I would be interested to hear the views of any other nipple buffs.

V.W. – Leicester

The Guide

Just by chance the other day I was passed on an American monthly publication called The Guide which appears to list, comment on and write about most things on the American gay scene, much as perhaps Gay Times does here in the UK.

I have never ever seen this magazine before and just casually glanced through it to see what it was all about. However the point of interest was this months leading article entitled 'Restoring Your Foreskin'. I read this article and its contents were most informative. The article covered four A4 size pages, and in brief listed various methods that could be used to stretch or re-grow a foreskin on a penis that had previously been circumcised. The article, written by Scott Richards, was not only very informative but also listed various organisations where further advice could be got and also a list of suppliers from where the various apparatus described in the article to aid the re-growth of a foreskin could be purchased. As well as all this there were a list of various publications that may be of interest and listings of internet websites that would be of interest to those wishing to restore their foreskin.

Having read on many occasions articles from Acorn members about the restoration of foreskin tissue, it occurred to me that while the topic had over the years been well aired in print as yet no informed or too serious advice had been given on the subject. Having read this American article it appears to go a long way to remedy this shortcoming.

As this magazine was already three months old, by the time this letter gets in to print it will be twice this time out of date so its not much use suggesting people write to its publishers for a copy. However I will be more than pleased to send any one a photostat copy of this article should they be interested to read it for themselves. Please send your SAE via the Acorn box number to me and I will forward a copy by return.

Wm. – Dorset

Browned Off

Having studied the topic of circumcision ever since I discovered myself a preputial amputee, my presumed 'mastery' received a setback when I was asked to explain a distinct brown ring on an American nudist's circumcision. Recalling decades of study I could not find the cause for such a phenomenon. From shower room sightings at school where the circumcision rate was a heady 45%, and at work, baths, changing rooms and the beach where Plastibelled neatness was an occasional occurrence, not one brown ring was present on any of those hundreds of circumcisions seen.

It took much reading before I meanderingly came across two mentions of a brown ring!

1) A Sacramento man recalled as a young boy noticing a brown ring around his penis whilst bathing. Asking his mother what it was, he was told... "That's where you were circumcised...to keep it clean."

2) A tightly circumcised 40 year old from Missouri admitted to having a  $\frac{3}{8}$ " wide brown ring around his penis.

Was this a phenomenon of the land of scars and stripes never encountered in Britain's ever decreasing minority of circumcised males?

The reason was simply an instrumental one. It resulted from the skin crushing of the Gomco clamp, the most often used circumcision clamp in the U.S.A., remaining unchanged since it's introduction in 1935. Though Aaron Goldstein's Gomco clamp remained across the Atlantic, the disposable Hollister Plastibell, first used in 1965, has gained favourable acceptance in Britain, and never produces the wide brownish stripe, and only very rarely slight discolouration after healing.

Yes, the brown stripe has become a strange distinguishing feature of many American post 1935 circumcisions, even ritual ones on Liberal and Reform Jewish babies where the mohel uses a Gomco clamp. Though the cut edge is exceptionally neat, even near invisible, the wide brown band visually separates the denuded glans from the natural remaining shaft. The ring, hardly one of confidence outside America, will, like vaccination marks, widen with growth up to a possible ½" in width.

In comparison, the Plastibelled penis is of relatively uniform hue after healing and consolidation of tissues with growth. With a recent sighting, the scar was barely visible and well incorporated into the infant's shaft tissue slightly below the glans.

For years I have taken 'browened off' as highly synonymical of 'cheesed off'. In the smegmaphobic U.S.A. it is clearly possible to have one without the other!!

Lubrication

I had always been a little envious when seeing a roundheaded guy with a large, prominent and flared helmet and considered this a great boon in sex, being able to stimulate the walls of the vagina more easily.

However, surfing the Internet and reading articles now it seems that this is perhaps not the case and that such a helmet may cause irritation rather than pleasure.

The modern theory is that the foreskin assists greatly in sexual intercourse not only for the woman, but for the man as well, with its enormous area of nerve endings to heighten sensation.

So, maybe I'm lucky in having a long foreskin and now that I've overcome the problem of insufficient natural lubrication (my original cause of investigating circumcision), I want to make the best of what I have.

For years I've worn my foreskin rolled under itself, so that part of the helmet shows – comfortable, looks better than a tapering skin and I don't have to pull it back to pee. Occasionally, I'll have it all the way back, but not for long periods and only when there is some tight clothing to hold it in place – when it gets cold, it flops back of its own accord anyway.

Recently I've been trying wearing my foreskin in its original, full length state – a strange feeling with this extraneous bit of skin protruding beyond my helmet – sometimes it causes irritation, other times it tingles with sensation. My latest trick is to put a spot of lubricant, usually KY jelly on to the helmet under the skin and then roll the skin completely forwards, so that the cool lubricant is trapped – it gives a delightful, icy feeling. I try and do this before having sex and, as my foreskin still remains covering the whole helmet even when hard, my wife then rolls it back in foreplay and there is the lubricated helmet, ready for action – better than having to stop halfway through the proceedings and apply the jelly!

I'd be interested to hear from others, both roundheads and cavaliers, about lubrication and how much they need. It is important to apply just the right amount – too little and it causes irritation, too much and one slides around without getting any sort of grip. I'm never sure to what extent my foreskin is coming forwards over the helmet during sex, but sometimes the sensation is almost unbearable, so maybe this is when the helmet is bare on the inward stroke.

Having grown up as a cavalier in a minority group, it is quite nice now to look around a changing room and see that my cock and its long foreskin are quite normal and in the majority – one sees far fewer cavaliers with protruding helmets than with long overhanging foreskins.

Mind Over Matter

A small excerpt from page 75 of the book Mind Over Matter, Ranulph Fiennes, Mandarin, 1993

I buried the pants, my only pair, and the crotch-rot did in due course begin to get better. But the remaining two protective layers of underclothing were not enough even at sea level and, with the sharp winds off Berkner, my private parts were nipped and swelled up. When I mentioned this to Mike, it turned out that he was having the same problem only worse, with a blistered end. He was circumcised and therefore, in effect, had one less layer of insulation. I made a note of this factor in terms of selecting future candidates for polar expeditions.

Reply To A.B. & Other Thoughts

I really enjoyed the last newsletter and one of the articles 'reactions' by A.B. of Bucks. particularly interested me.

A.B. says that her brother is gay and has recently got himself circumcised because a gay friend of his told him that it would make him more 'acceptable' in gay circles. She also states that his penis looked 'traumatised' after the operation.

I don't think anyone goes and has a painful, irreversible operation on their cock without thinking about it carefully first and I'm sure A.B.'s brother thought about it long, hard and carefully before going ahead and becoming a roundhead. As far as making him more acceptable in gay terms, I don't think that's true. In my experience the only age group where circumcised cocks are in the majority is those men aged 50 – 70 years old. I don't think that as a whole gay men prefer cut meat, although I know I do! There are certainly men who love it uncut as evidenced by Uncut magazine, etc.

Secondly, what does A.B. expect her recently post-op brother's cock to look like anyway? It's hardly going to look like the final healed roundhead. It's of course going to be swollen, have stitches and look a mess for up to a month. After my first circumcision age 16 it took the best part of 3 months for my cut cock to finally smooth out and take on its final appearance.

I also think that A.B.'s comment about her brother's choice re a revision is again very short sighted of her.

If someone is going to get their cock altered then they sure want it to be perfect and looking how they want it, and I think that people who are dissatisfied with their current shoddy circumcisions should pull their fingers out and go and get them re-shaped.

I would also like to reply to Anthony's article, in particular reference the change in shape of the glans post circumcision. I have always thought that after removal of the foreskin the glans rim does become more prominent and mushroom like. This was based on seeing other lads in the swimming pool changing rooms at school. However these lads may have had large helmets that meant they necessitated circumcisions due to relative phimosis. This is certainly true of a friend of mine who was cut when aged 21 when he went and emigrated to Canada. His helmet is huge and has a roughly 1cm overhang all around it at the coronal sulcus before the very mushroom and bulbous head joins his quite short and thin cock shaft.

I personally noticed no change in the shape of the glans after my first circumcision because there was an awful lot of loose skin left behind that nestled my glans the whole time, and never put any tension on the shaft even when erect. In contrast to this immediately after my second circumcision 7 years later at the age of 23, I noticed a very big difference. This is because the surgeon used the cuff resection technique and radically exposed my helmet at rest. The look in the mirror when I got home was great as now lots of the excess shaft skin that bunched behind and over the glans rim had gone and left me with a relatively more narrow and tight shaft and a well protruding helmet which was very prominent looking.

The angle that my cock rested at seemed to change after the second op and instead of being vertical when flaccid, it just jutted out a little because of the tension in the shaft skin.

Another first hand experience I have of seeing an adult uncut cock head change shape and flare out is when my partner became a roundhead. His prepuce covered his glans completely and his helmet wasn't particularly prominent through his foreskin. When erect the glans didn't become fatter than the diameter of his shaft. After his circumcision there was a gradual change in the size of his coronal overhang and he noticed and commented on it before I said anything. Now it looks great especially when flaccid because his cock is still quite large when limp and his mushroom shaped glans really fans out beautifully and stops any of his slightly loose shaft skin moving forward and encroaching on his helmet. When his cock is erect now, it looks very prominent and bulbous, with a great overhang at the coronal rim.

As a young lad my dad used to walk around the house naked and the shape of his cock head was extremely pronounced and prominent. He had been circumcised around 1940 as a baby and I recently found out that he had wanted to have me cut as a baby too. He said (and was quite right) that I had a very long foreskin and that he had been circumcised and loved it and wanted me to have all the benefits of cleanliness and also the same look as him. However the hospital refused and my mother said I could always get it done later if need be. Dad's cock was probably the most obvious circumcised cock I've seen at a swimming pool with trunks on, the coronal ridge juts out whichever way his cock is and looks really good.

He commented after my first circumcision that he thought my cockhead would enlarge and flare out more because he said that several boys from his school days had had theirs at 16 and their helmets had enlarged. He was disappointed with the result of the initial circumcision like I was because it just looked shoddy and from the other end of the changing rooms you'd have trouble telling I'd been circumcised at all. The day I came back from hospital he came up to my room and asked if he could see what the result looked like. When I showed him he wasn't impressed and thought they should have removed more of the shaft skin.

In summary I think that lots of factors about being circumcised and the way it changes the proportions of the shaft and glans etc. make it always look more bulbous. I also think that guys with large helmets are more likely to get cut because their helmets are so big anyway. I also believe that there is a variable flaring 'mushrooming' of the glans post circumcision that is highly desirable and makes roundheads very sexy, bulbous & prominent. I put this to good effect down the gym when I wear my lycra cycling shorts which show my well defined exposed helmet off very well and don't leave people in any doubt as to what my status is!

New PO Box Number For Acorn

Please note that we have a new PO Box Number to which all correspondence should now be sent. The old Box in Weston is being phased out.

The address is now:- The Acorn Society, PO Box 296, Ipswich, IP2 8SH

Revision

I was circumcised as a young boy and since joining Acorn two years ago I have been increasingly interested in being re-circumcised to remove some of the slack in the skin on the shaft of my penis.

Through reading articles in the newsletter I am aware that this operation can be performed quite successfully, but my problem is that I'm unsure where to go to get such an operation performed. I am aware of a Dr. Sifman who can be approached but I'm keen to hear from Acorn readers about other doctors or clinics who may provide this service. I'm also keen to find out about the methods used.

This is quite a big step for me and understandably, I want to be sure that I'm going to get what I ask for. Therefore, if any reader has personal experience of, and can recommend, a sympathetic doctor or clinic who will understand what I am asking for I would be very grateful.

Australian Holiday

A recent and wonderful holiday in Western Australia gave me the opportunity to size up the scene in Oz. Here are my findings:-

The saunas seemed to be the best starting point. What a variety of establishments, and what a variety of clientele! All races, religions, colours, shapes and sizes meet in Australia. Uninhibited behaviour in the saunas reveals all the goods on offer in a very short time and what a selection there is.

Oz is a half cut country. About 50% of the males appear to be cut, as a general rule and disregarding colour and creed.

Aboriginals by tradition are mostly circumcised but unlike in the UK many orientals are cut too. Oz white men whether of British or Irish descent are generally cut if born in Australia. Immigrants are far less likely to be so. Australians of Greek and Italian descent are generally uncut. Vietnamese likewise. Thais and those of Malaysian descent are often cut.

I chatted to many people and formed the opinion that as a routine 'at birth' procedure, circumcision is going out of favour. However, many young men are cut later in life. I was unable to find out who performs the operation and at what cost. That research must wait until my next visit.

Reply To R.H.

I felt interest in reading the last issue (no4, 1999) of Acorn and specially R.H.'s letter.

I totally agree with his thoughts about the positive effects of circumcision. I think, me too, that circumcision cannot be a remedy for unhygienic problems.

R.H. wrote his glans has not flared since the operation, but a friend of his saw his own glans increase greatly after being circumcised. I knew a similar situation and during the three months after the operation my glans began more bulky (around a third more).

Am I to understand I'd be this friend and so have I already seen this R.H.'s nice circumcised... dick?

Restoration

I am 51 and gay and have consequently observed many penes (I think that is the correct plural). I joined Acorn in an attempt to see things from the other side as there are definitely two camps, one for the knife and the other against. I have never been able to reconcile the idea of circumcision as anyone 'uncut' can easily retract their foreskin to expose what is hidden beneath but nature's own can be restored after use. Those people that I have encountered who have been circumcised all suffer from a very dry glans and have to resort to lubrication in order to masturbate satisfactorily.

I was circumcised very badly at birth, the frenulum was cut away leaving a second aperture in my urethra on the underside of my glans where it had been attached which made urinating very difficult with two streams in opposite directions. Various skin tags and stitch tunnels were also left although fortunately the skin was not stretched tight for the chop and left the basis for restoration.

My ambition is to 'restore' my foreskin, by stretching or other means. I have read many books on the subject of restoration and they nearly all suggest stretching using various appliances. I have tried these and find them all to be rather awkward or inconvenient. I have now stretched the remains of skin so that it will cover my glans completely but without an attached frenulum and frenar band the skin retracts. However, by stretching two of the stitch tunnels, left after circumcision, I have effectively formed two piercings in my new foreskin and with a ring inserted it helps to hold the skin forward. I have noticed a very considerable difference to the feel of my glans now that it is covered. It is now moist and feels very smooth and soft to touch. It is far more sensitive than before which can be a problem as I do tend to reach an orgasm more quickly. Previously my glans was dry, tough and wrinkled with much less sensitivity.

I would like to investigate the possibility of surgery to either re-attach my frenulum, it appears to remain attached to what is left of my foreskin although it has been cut from the glans. Additionally I would like to find out if it is possible to reform the end of the skin into a tighter aperture as it is currently the same width for its length. I am too embarrassed to ring around general surgical clinics but I would be pleased to hear from anyone who may know of a clinic which could offer help in restoration rather than removal.

America Re-visited

Longtime readers of the Acorn Magazine may remember my contributions to the magazine under the heading "Ian's Tail" and "More of Ian's Tail" etc. in issues 4/93, 5/93 and 7/93. These articles told much of my own circumcision history, (circumcised at the insistence of a midwife shortly after birth, an untidy job, hated my state as a child, became reconciled to it in adulthood with the intervention of a doctor I worked with in New York and had a revision to circumcised normality after returning to England). Having worked in a New York hospital for a year and in addition to becoming familiar with the New York circumcision scene I also established friendships which have endured.

I have returned to America for holidays of two or three weeks at a time most years since 1970. On each occasion I have kept both my eyes and my ears open for any information I could glean about the attitude towards, and practice of, routine circumcision in infancy. One of the ways I have done this is to visit the larger reputable bookstores and to look through the index of recently published books written to give advice to parents on child care. Throughout the 1970's the editions of Dr Spock's advice to parents strongly supported the circumcision of infant boys, on the grounds that it made them regular little guys, and like all the other kids on the block. Publications by a number of other authors also supported routine circumcision, usually as a measure of good hygiene and to prevent trouble later. There appeared to be a general agreement that circumcision after infancy was both embarrassing and painful, the increased cost of circumcising an older boy was occasionally mentioned. The embarrassment of a teenager or young adult I can understand, the idea of it being painful was, I believe exaggerated, as pain control, even in the 1970's, was not difficult to achieve.

I was interested to note that when Militant Feminism came along, and the movement of Lesbians that wanted children, men were useful only for shooting their sperm into a bottle, or into the turkey baster, depending on the degree of sophistication to be used for insemination. However, those women who rejected the input of men (please excuse this expression), certainly wanted their male offspring to remain intact; they howled against circumcision as something brutal, done to the infant male, by the mature male. This was contrary to the opinion I had formed in both England and the United States where I had found women to be in charge of child care to the almost total exclusion of the man, be it father or partner.

Following the Statement on Routine Circumcision of Infants, published by the American Academy of Paediatrics, the advice to parents was bland, usually something like "If your child is a boy you may wish to discuss with your Obstetrician whether or not your son is to be circumcised".

On my recent visit to America (September 1999), I again visited the bookshops and find a significant change in the advice offered. The only advice against circumcision that I could find was in the few childcare books originating in the United Kingdom. American publications, and there are lots of them, appear to encourage circumcision but emphasise that it is now a matter of parental choice. The following are quotations from recent publications:

"If your tribe or religious group believes in it (circumcision), go ahead.

If the child's foreskin can not be retracted by mid-childhood have him circumcised or a less radical procedure.

If Dad and all the other males in the family are circumcised you may want to have him circumcised to avoid invidious comparison."

Elmer R Grossman MD. Everyday Paediatrics for Parents. Pub. Celestial Arts.

"I always ask the father, if its a boy do you plan to have him circumcised? I think the father should make the choice. Most fathers want their sons to be like themselves." "...this is of deep significance to a male, the father's choice needs to be based on his emotional reaction rather than on the fairly inconclusive studies that have been done so far. I will support the father in either option".

T Berry Brazerton MD. Touchpoints. Pub. Perseus Books.

"I encourage you and your baby's father to follow your hearts. My boys are circumcised primarily because I am a product of the 1950's and wanted to share the circumcision bond with my sons".

Alan Greene MD. A-Z Guide to your new baby. Pub. (sorry, not recorded).

During this visit I caught up with Peter whom I first knew as a young schoolboy, he is now married, has moved away from New England and is the father of two sons, Joseph, aged 5 and Michael 2. Peter was making a visit to his mother, the neighbour of my hostess. Peter's wife, mother and my hostess decided on a girls' night out leaving Peter and I to care for the boys and to catch up on what has happened to us in more than ten years since our last meeting. During Peter's bathing of the two boys I noticed that both were radically circumcised. When we settled down with a beer I remarked to Peter that I had noticed that both boys were circumcised and said that I understood, from magazine articles, that this was no longer a routine practice. Peter's reply was along the lines that I should not believe all that I read. I pressed for more information with a question about whether or not there had been need for discussion about it with the doctors. On this occasion Peter's reply was succinct. "What is there to discuss, I am circumcised, they are my boys, they are circumcised." Our conversation moved to other matters.

Before returning to England I had a 'telephone visit' with Arthur, a doctor with whom I worked in New York in 1965. Arthur helped me to accept my circumcised state and encouraged me to have the revision which took place after I returned to England; Arthur is now a practitioner in family health in Vermont. During a conversation of more than an hour I asked about the effect of the American Academy of Paediatrics Statement about Routine Infant Circumcision. "It didn't have much effect here, we are a small and stable community, folks did what the family had done in the past. Most all the boys here are circumcised before they leave the hospital. We have a small Hispanic community, they disallow it, and a couple of French families that came here from Quebec. I actively encourage it only when there is already a circumcised boy in the family, sibling rivalry will always come up sooner or later but I think brothers should be alike in this department." I asked "What's the bottom line on your own opinion?" "I'm a Hicksville kid, born in a shack in the mountains, I have two brothers both a lot older than me, none of us were cut as kids. There were only two or three uncut kids in my year at school, and it was like that when I went to College and Med School. I married just before I went off to Vietnam. Sex was great but if it got a bit hectic I was a bit sore for a day or two afterwards. My circumcision was a present to myself, I had it just before my discharge from the Army – I have before and after experience, I've no regrets, I like it, I just wish it had been done when I was a kid."

Stan & Eddie

Regarding the dispute over comedian Stanley Baxter's status, I sat opposite him, virtually knee to knee, in a sauna, and he certainly looked circumcised to me. I suppose there is a chance he could have had his foreskin pulled back. Add to the list Eddie Izzard, outed as a cavalier by the theatre critic Nicholas de Jongh when reviewing the play Lenny. De Jongh could not take seriously Izzard, with a foreskin, playing Jewish Lenny Bruce. Subsequently a line was added to 'explain' this situation.

An Alternative To Circumcision

I was in our local bath's changing room recently, and happened to notice the only other occupant, like me appeared radically circumcised. A second glance showed his shaft to be unusually thick and near the scrotum were three tiny gold rings. Seeing we were alone I asked him the reason for the nearly invisible gold rings being put where they were. He explained that several years ago he had gone to one of the body piercing shops and asked them to keep his foreskin permanently retracted for him, with as neat a job as possible. What they did was to initially insert the open rings in the tip of the foreskin. The latter was then fully retracted, and the rings inserted in to holes made in the skin at the base of the shaft, whereupon they were closed and sealed. The foreskin was then unable to return leaving the glans permanently free as if it had been circumcised. He was, he said, delighted with the result, and said that his wife enjoyed his thickened shaft.

Thinking about this later, it occurred to me that now that the medical profession make such problems about circumcising infants, this would be a good alternative for them, as the parents had only to take the baby to the piercer. By keeping the foreskin of a young infant retracted like this the enlarging and flaring of the glans would naturally occur as in a genuine circumcision, and say by the age of five the rings could be removed with no risk of the skin slipping back to cover it. I only wish I had known of this technique when my sons were born, as the doctors refused to circumcise them, and this would have achieved the same result.

Anyone contemplating circumcision which of course can't be reversed if for some unlikely reason you don't like it, this technique is fully reversible and gives a chance to savour the delights of the bared glans.

Anthony Strikes Again

There was a bold fireman from Ryde,
Whose foreskin was tougher than hide,
He declared it his hose,
Directing the flows,
At old flames and lovers beside.

A teacher whose foreskin was 'taut',
Got a 'lesson' with help which he sought,
The bit that did 'flop',
Was given the chop,
With a new 'head' revealed as it ought.

Circumcision — My Story

Part 2

In part 1, I told you about my first self-circumcision attempt and my subsequent trip to the hospital. After that experience I was left with a divided frenulum, a loose lowish circumcision and a skin tunnel along the top of the scar area where one of the dissolvable stitches did not dissolve and was not taken out.

For some time I lived with this situation and wasn't terribly unhappy. I had a number of sexual partners and they didn't complain about my cock.

Anyway at about the age of thirty I discovered the internet, and went back to my early fascination with circumcision. I found out about people who had re-circumcisions, removed their frenulums and other modifications.

So my search started for someone who could perform a re-circumcision and frenotomy. I found that most of the places that I could get this done I could not afford, so the next port of call was the N.H.S. Of course this meant coming up with some symptoms – tightness and soreness mostly around the skin bridge and the divided frenulum. I went to see a surgeon who said he was willing to remove the skin tunnel on the scar and to remove the part of the frenulum on the shaft; he was not willing to remove the part of the frenulum on the head or to do a re-circumcision.

The task was carried out at the local general hospital, under local anaesthetic it took approximately 15 minutes. Healing took about three weeks. I was very careful to follow the surgeon's instructions about stitches to prevent any new skin bridges forming. After healing I found that I was not completely satisfied with the end result. The surgeon had done a good job, but I wanted complete removal of the frenulum! Also removal of the skin bridge had left me with two nodules on the top of my cock. I then decided that because there was not much of the frenulum left I could most probably remove this by crushing and cutting. I had read of people doing this on the internet and so decided to have a go myself.

I cleaned up my cock, I also got together some gauze, lint and micropore tape as I knew that there could be bleeding, but I also knew from my past experience that this would most probably be (in my case) not a problem. I also cleaned up a set of electrical side-cutters, these are used for cutting wire etc. The cutting edge is not particularly sharp. Carefully placing these so that they were as tight against the underside of the cock head as possible with the remnant of the frenulum in between, I slowly started to squeeze the handles. When I began to feel a little pain I stopped and waited for it to subside. I continued the process squeezing tighter and tighter until finally I felt things give way. I had finally got rid of the residual piece of frenulum. As it turned out because of the crushing there was no blood but in order to protect the area at least for a day or two, I applied a small piece of sterile gauze with micropore tape.

Part 3 will go into my last circumcision experience using a home-made plastic ring and some fishing line as a crushing device. Will I ever be satisfied?

Editorial

Many thanks to all of you who have sent in articles for this and future issues of the newsletter and to those who have welcomed me to this new post.

I am sorry to have to inform you that Brian has decided to leave the Acorn Society. Brian has done a huge amount of work for the Society over many years and his single handed production of the magazine, at such low cost has enabled the subscription to be kept at a modest level. Another major task he undertook was the organisation of the meetings. Aside from his hard work, Brian will be missed by us all.

We are now working on how best to move forward. Unfortunately, it has not been possible to organise a Spring meeting, however, there will be an Autumn meeting as usual. We have plans for the production of the next couple of issues, but the long term solution needs to be found. If anyone has any good ideas, or has the time, means or skill to help, please let us know.

I think that there are some interesting articles in the newsletter this month, please keep them coming!

Third Time Lucky?

This is my first letter to Acorn, although I've been a member for a year. I was so glad to find this society, as I couldn't get enough circumcision stories. It's great to have a magazine that doesn't apologize for publishing articles and letters about circumcision. This said I'd like to read more letters per issue, and also read more detailed descriptions of circumcised cocks.

I've got quite a lot to talk about, and for this reason I'm going to send the information in 'installments'. Logically enough I'll start with how I came to be circumcised, and why I've probably been circumcised more times than anyone else. In following letters I'll talk about my experiences of being circumcised and reactions to it and describe the operations on my cock, masturbation and 'fetishes'.

So, I first heard of circumcision when my best friend noticed I wasn't circumcised in the toilets at 6 years old. He'd recently 'been done', and told me you had to have it done to be a 'real man'! This stirred my interest, and by the time I was ten I was madly into circumcised dicks, and desperately wanted to have the operation done. To add insult to injury my brother had the operation at about the same time. Just seeing a circumcised cock would turn me on (but not uncircumcised ones), and I started to wonder how normal this was, and if I was homosexual. In fact, I've always fancied girls a lot, and have never had any amorous feelings towards men just circumcised cocks. I've only had one sexual experience with another man (this year, and I'll talk about this 'planned one-off' in a future letter). I have a sort of fixation or fetish, which I've had to accept, I wonder if any other members are in a similar position?

I wanted to be circumcised for the appearance, which was different and the fact that something so private was made public and vulnerable. Later on, I felt 'dirty' and longed to have a clean, smooth glans for girls to suck. I fantasised about them noticing and talking about how much they liked my circumcision.

In fact, I never had any doubt about wanting to be circumcised, and the desire for it never abated. I prayed that I'd have a medical reason to have it done, or some valid excuse. And it wasn't until I was 29 that I finally plucked up the courage to speak to my GP about it (I had been within an inch of it the year before); I live in Spain and was in England on holiday. Amazingly, she told me that I could get it done on National Health. So, I made an appointment to see the surgeon. He told me that I couldn't have the operation done since I had a normal foreskin, and why did I want it done? I said for aesthetic reasons (a mistake). You should always say for health reasons at the very least. In the end, I asked him why the GP had sent me if I was just going to be wasting my time.

In the end he agreed to do the operation putting 'routine circumcision' as the reason to justify it to the NHS I suppose. He described briefly how he'd do the circ, and that it would be done under general anesthetic. In fact this is why I decided to cancel, since I'd been told in another clinic in Spain that it could be done with a local one, which I believed was 'safer'.

Next, I phoned around hospitals (seemed cleaner than clinics) in Spain until I found one. I'd cancelled the day before the op in a private clinic due to getting strange feelings about the place.

After scouring the yellow pages under 'Urologists', I chose a surgeon at a hospital. He was a bit old, but I reckoned experience would tell. To get this far had meant me plucking up more courage than you could ever imagine, and getting cold feet and hanging up on the phone many times.

I had the operation (took a couple a pics before hand – still not developed), in a proper op theatre, and was bandaged up and walked straight out of the hospital.

I had asked to have the 'minimum circ', which to me meant cutting the skin to just behind the glans. To my later shock only the tip was cut off. I felt as if my whole world had collapsed around me. So much stress for this! I went back and demanded to know what he'd done and soon found out where the misunderstanding had come in. He agreed to do a 'full' circ, but was surprised I wanted be like the Jews! I said that's exactly what I wanted, although I don't think either of us knew how much is cut from a Jew.

Anyway, I readied myself with relief, for the second definitive chop. To my total disbelief, I got the following: 1 inch of mucus membrane left (top-side) and only the skin cut level with the corona, meaning the skin slightly covered the glans, definitely what I didn't want. The good news was that a small very sensitive 'hot spot' had been left on the back just below the scar, and when erect it looked extremely circumcised. Shortly afterwards I started going out with a new girlfriend (I'll talk about her interesting reactions in my next letter).

A year later I was still unhappy with the appearance when flaccid, and had become a fan of tightly circumcised cocks. I looked up more info about it on the web, and reckoned I knew what I wanted; the inch of mucus membrane pulled tightly back behind the glans when flaccid. The only thing that held me back from a third circ was losing the 'hot spot', but I wanted the tight circ so much that it outweighed the disadvantages. Strangely, I went back to the first private clinic as I remembered that the surgeon had asked if I'd wanted a full or part circumcision.

He remembered me. I said I'd had the op done on the NHS in England but was very unhappy with the result. I left the 'foreskin' as far forward as possible to prove it. I told him exactly what I wanted, and in fact on the operating table we negotiated the drawing of the lines so "there won't be any surprises". In fact he won the negotiation and surprised me because he left half an inch of under-skin (acceptable) but cut just below the corona line (unacceptable), because it leaves a small 'rolled up' ring of mucus membrane just touching the corona on the top-side. When I went back for the check up I complained but he shrugged it off saying the stitches would have burst if it had been any tighter when erect. So, after 3 attempts I still don't have exactly what I want.

I now favour a tight circumcision, and would love to have my remaining mucus membrane pulled back when flaccid to highlight the glans even more. Due to my diminished sensitivity I'd probably be mad to go for a 4th circ, but if I could be sure I wouldn't be much worse off, I'd be willing to undergo a record-breaking one. Any suggestions on private clinics that could give such advice?

Below, I give more detailed information on the operations and my cock.

Surgery information

All the 3 circs were done under local anesthesia and each circ hurt more than the previous one, as more was cut off I suppose. The injections hurt a lot, but were just about tolerable. The penis soon goes numb luckily. The stitches dropped out after 2 weeks in the hospital case and 4-5 weeks in the clinic due to a different suture being used. The clinic's operating theatre was a small room with minimum equipment and strip lighting, with the surgeon taking emergency phone calls during the op! My hunch had been right the first time. I had the operations 4 years and 2 years ago. The first 2 cost in the region of 200 Pounds and the 3rd about 175 Pounds.

After the first time, I had almost full sensitivity, and it was a neatly done job. The second time it was a well-performed operation, although big stitch scars could be seen round the back, although I kind of liked this. I had a sensitive spot too.

The third operation has left an uneven scar on one side, which I don't like much. It was the last part to be stitched up as the local anaesthesia wore off. Sensitivity has now dropped considerably especially around the frenulum area. Although I always asked to have as much left as possible, the little 'thread' at the back is far less sensitive, and doesn't 'drive me mad' any more, and I don't have any 'hot spots' either. I would have accepted all this if I'd been circumcised as I'd wanted.

The glans is also much less sensitive than when uncircumcised, and in general sensitivity increases when a) I haven't masturbated for several days b) I rub in baby oil. The glans is only too sensitive to touch just after coming. Ejaculation is normally very pleasurable (luckily).

Description of Penis

When flaccid my cock measures 4 inches with half an inch of inner skin (smallest point, top-side) which rolls into a thin pink cuff touching the corona. Due to the shape of the glans there's an inch of inner skin behind the glans with a small thread of frenulum. The glans has a more sharply defined shape now, (especially the underside) and the 'thread' has 'crept' up to the pee-hole.

The penis is 7 inches when erect, and pulls the half inch of inner-skin back. To pull the skin over the glans I have to 'borrow' skin from the base of the penis (the pubic hair area), and with a 'comfortable' pull  $\frac{3}{5}$  of the glans when pointing the cock upwards, and just cover  $\frac{1}{5}$  when pointing it down.

How would my cock be classified in terms of tightness? Loose – medium tight? Well, that's all for the first installment. I wonder how many other members can relate to my experiences and feelings.

Growing Up With An Acroposthion

I went to a minor public school in the early sixties. It was still the case then that boys from the aspiring classes were more often than not circumcised since it was considered one of the marks of a 'gentleman'. I unfortunately was not, since my parents were Hampstead socialists and although my uncircumcised father wanted me done, my mother, a forthright woman of powerful will, indignantly refused on the grounds that it would betray her left wing principles for me to have a cock associated with the hated upper classes. Anyway I was given a really hard time at school. The masters said little but when my long prehensile foreskin was exhibited in the changing room wriggling about like a worm as I changed, they indicated fastidious disapproval implying that possession of a foreskin was evidence of a character defect. Meanwhile the attitude of the other boys was one of horrified disbelief that I had been so neglected and interestingly, badly concealed envy from boys who recognised the fun-potential of a long sleeve of mobile skin in the universal wanking games which they organised and in which I was a sought-after partner. Those who enjoyed the exercise most though, saved their consciences by exclaiming how filthy foreskins were (although mine wasn't) and how glad they were to be circumcised, even though their actions showed clearly that they weren't. Anyway the fact is that I was being picked on by boys and masters and was consequently in a state of deep unhappiness. Finally I decided I'd had enough and on my next holiday, asked my mother if I could please be circumcised. She nearly went through the roof and accused me of being ungrateful after she'd carefully preserved my foreskin from all the pro-circumcision pressure and proceeded to instruct me in how lucky I was and why. With remarkable prescience she described the so-called benefits of circumcision as an old-wives' tale ("load of bollocks" to use her actual words). I'm afraid I was not convinced and still felt I'd be better off without it. Anyway, after she'd calmed down I told her how I'd been treated and she once again blew up, picking up the telephone and giving my housemaster the rough side of her tongue, before telling him that he had just lost a pupil.

I was then enrolled in one of the famous (now infamous) progressive co-ed schools where pupils were allowed virtually to do what they wanted provided that they did not overtly break the law. What a revelation! Firstly it was co-educational and since the sexual revolution had just started, sexual activity whilst not compulsory was virtually universal. Secondly the kids at the school all came from arty-farty or show biz backgrounds, including a sprinkling of pop stars, where circumcision was not on the menu except for religious reasons. It was interesting that the few circumcised boys around suffered absolutely no abuse as I had done, although there were sniggering discussions and quiet disapproval expressed when they weren't there.

Whereas in my first school – a buttoned up single-sex school where sex was swept under the carpet, it was clear that in the environment of my new school, sexual expression was allowed to occur freely, although the older girls were discreetly supplied with the pill and the boys with condoms to prevent the unwanted publicity of pregnancy. My first shock came when I joined the weekly swimming session. Although compulsion did not exist in the school we were expected to establish our trendy credentials by all taking part in nude mixed swimming. The Head was very keen that children should not be shocked by nudity of any sort and therefore insisted that all staff (of both sexes) should also take part. This was not the imposition it might seem since the staff were all chosen for their progressive attitudes. A number of their wives came along too. I was shaken to the core at finding myself in a pool with a mass of nude people of all ages, including several in their late forties and fifties. The first thing I noticed was that, unlike most of the boys, nearly two thirds of the staff were circumcised. This formed a discussion point which we never tired of airing, with views being expressed for and against by both boys and girls. One particular thing which caused a great impression among the older boys (and some younger ones, including me) was the fact that the physics master's wife, a large brassy blonde, had shaved her pubic hair off, revealing with clear enjoyment her impressively developed pudendal slit, thereby causing the more susceptible of us to rise stiffly to attention as we looked at her, much to her amusement. (The others pretended not to notice.) Her husband also attracted a lot of attention, being endowed with a cock like a rolling pin from which drooped the longest foreskin I've ever seen. One of the more precocious girls gave the opinion that his wife was to blame for pulling it too much!

Sexual activity was of course widespread and although open displays of sexuality and orgies did not happen very often, when they did it was usually under the influence of drink (there was no prohibition on social drinking but getting pissed was discouraged). Amongst the younger kids, sex usually took the form of mutual handling and unlike the 12-year old shaggers today, full sex seldom occurred. A group of them would pair off and head for a secluded nook called the 'fornicatorium' where mutual masturbation took place. For the sake of those interested in wanking techniques, nearly all the boys – and girls – preferred the traditional method of whipping the foreskin up and down over the knob. One or two boys found this a problem due to tightness but other than arousing a certain amount of curiosity, no one got upset about it. The older ones naturally enough indulged enthusiastically in rumpy pumpy and it would be true to say that virtually everyone lost his/her cherry at some stage. Two events stand out in my memory, both fuelled by booze. The first was joining a queue of boys at a 'production line' where a couple of girls serviced a line of boys, getting the first one's cock out and rubbing him to climax before taking on the next one. The other occasion was an outrageous display by four knickerless girls, known for their loose morals, sitting on a bench with their skirts up round their waists making fountains for the entertainment of the crowd of boys who stood round sniggering.

In later years I was lucky enough to have no sexual hang-ups and no urge to play away, since I was (and still am) happily married. However when my wife went off to look after a sick friend in Canada, I took a couple of weeks holiday in Ibiza – and I can tell you the goings on there made school high jinks look like a tea party! I've never seen so many people, mostly youngsters, so hell bent on getting their ends away, girls even more so than boys and the sights to be seen in the streets and clubs when the booze had been flowing were unbelievable! The highlight of the club scene was inevitably a live sex show with several couples stripping off and misbehaving in the most scandalous fashion on the stage in front of huge audiences, including a girl performer who stripped off and then, believe or not, pissed over the edge of the stage into the front row, to the huge delight of the rest of the audience! Apparently this practice was initiated by an all-girl band – banned in UK of course – called Rockbitch whose party piece it was to piss on one another on stage. Now this might seem like the raving of a seriously deranged fantasist – but it's not. It all happened and still is happening! But to return to the subject, public nudity in such an environment is almost a foregone conclusion and large numbers of drunken clubbers could be seen with their private parts in full view if not totally naked. Contrary to the assertions of the circumcisionists who claim to have seen lots of unhooded cocks in Europe, I never once saw one in Ibiza, either in the sex clubs or on the nudist beaches.

I notice in recent newsletters that some people have a hatred for the so-called "elephant's trunk". In virtually every case they are men who have had themselves circumcised for some reason and to whom it seems that the less penile skin remaining the better. I'm afraid they (and I) are in a small minority. Most women in my experience find a long foreskin attractive and my wife reckons mine is dead cute – otherwise I would certainly be circumcised myself now. Not just my wife though. In June a urologist, Frederick M. Hodges, published a paper entitled Phimosis in Antiquity. (See www.cirp.org/library/history/hodges1/) The following are quotes: "...useful Greek word acroposthion, which designates the visually defining, tapered, fleshy, nipple-like portion of the foreskin that advances beyond the terminus of the underlying glans penis. The acroposthion, especially in early youth, can run to impressive lengths. As demonstrated by their visual art, the Greeks highly esteemed the foreskin as a defining feature of the male body. Indeed, Galen speaks of the foreskin as a brilliantly useful adornment." Apparently the Greeks were so offended by the sight of a bare glans that athletes with short foreskins were required to wear a kynodesme, a string tied round the tip of the foreskin after it has been pulled forward off the glans to avoid displeasing the ladies or frightening the horses. On the subject of long foreskins Hodges says, "One common misuse of the word phimosis by nineteenth-century and some modern medical writers concerns the length of the foreskin. Penises were and are frequently misdiagnosed with phimosis because the foreskin has arbitrarily been determined to be 'too long', 'redundant', or 'hypertrophic'. The Greeks, however, recognised no such disease. In antiquity, the problem was not having too much foreskin, but having too little. Consequently, classical medical writers were concerned with a deformity called lipodermus, a condition in which the foreskin was not long enough to cover the glans penis completely. Galen, Soranus, Dioscorides, and Antyllus among others, published lengthy descriptions of lipodermus and made detailed recommendations for its correction. Greek medical writers also devoted considerable space to surgical and non-surgical methods of foreskin restoration following posthectomy" (removal of the prepuce) presumably for the benefit of unhappy Jewish subjects.

More Questions

I was delighted with No.3/99 newsletter which contained much fascinating material about foreskins and less of the interminable methods of circumcision. It also included the first answers to I.D.'s questionnaire, which of course was fascinating to me, having been circumcised in infancy – probably for no very good reason. There are two further questions that should be added to the questionnaire:-

How much of the glans is covered when flaccid, and how much on erection?

Do you pull back your foreskin to pee?

This is advised in some books, presumably for better hygiene(?): but in my experience this is practically never done. Why not? Far from pulling back, most men seem to finish by pulling strongly forward several times, presumably to get rid of the last few drops.

All you lucky cavaliers, let's hear your answers, please.

Demanding Cut

When my partner pretended to have phimosis and we superglued his normal foreskin together, it completely fooled his G.P. who said she would refer him immediately to the Urologist.

The next week we went for the appointment and the Senior Registrar told Barry that he thought he would 'get away' with frenuloplasty and not have to do a full circumcision. This wasn't what we had expected and Barry was a bit surprised and so at the time said nothing. We afterwards discussed the matter and decided that we would just have to re-superglue after the frenuloplasty and hopefully get a full circumcision the second time round.

However on the morning of the operation the Surgeon came to consent Barry for his frenuloplasty and Barry said that he would be very disappointed if the op failed and that he'd be angry if he had to have the full circumcision after all because it meant more time, pain and embarrassment. He said that he'd rather have the full circumcision straight off and get it 'all sorted'. The Surgeon said that he thought a frenuloplasty would do the trick and that a full circumcision wouldn't be necessary and was besides a longer op and more painful as an adult. Barry then said to him that he would hold him responsible if he had to come back again and that he wanted his preference to be put in his notes that he would prefer to be fully circumcised and not have the frenuloplasty. The Surgeon got a little bit angry at this point according to Barry but eventually agreed to do a full circumcision that morning even though he didn't think it 'medically or surgically the best option'. Barry therefore surprised me when I saw him the next day with a fully cut cock and great fully exposed helmet.

Psychology Of Circumcision

I watched the recent TV programme about amputees with some interest. There are apparently numbers of men and women who feel certain parts of their bodies don't belong to them. A woman had tried everywhere to persuade doctors to remove her legs as she longed to be rid of them as being alien to her. One man interviewed, had succeeded in getting one of his legs amputated and was, he said, delighted to be on crutches.

Well it struck me that many of us have had similar lifelong compulsions to be circumcised. In my case it started as far back as I can remember: At least as early as three when I used to play with our next door neighbour's son of the same age. He was circumcised and I loved to look at his clearly exposed knob in contrast to my long foreskin. In the 40's and 50's some 50% of the boys I saw at school were circumcised and I longed to be like them. One friend I had at about 12 years old was radically cut with inner foreskin going well over half way up the shaft. His knob was a lot bigger than mine with the typical flared edge of those cut at birth. Also the rim beside the sulcus was quite smooth, unlike mine which was covered in tiny bumps, which with the foreskin covering them had remained, unlike his, which had long ago withered away having no use without a foreskin.

I used to try and keep my foreskin retracted by such devices as surgical tape, rubber bands, etc. and even had it bare for three days before the constant friction and awareness of the organ caused me to wank, when I would become too sensitive to try retracting it again for a while. I soon realised the only option was to remove my hated foreskin. As an older schoolboy, I was too shy to go to the old GP so I had to live with it for a few more years until I became a student. One particular girlfriend I remember taking my erect member out, and when she saw the long foreskin she dropped it with an exclamation of revulsion. That finally convinced me that I had to be circumcised! Sadly in the 50's clinics couldn't advertise and I knew of only our GP and couldn't go to him. I therefore decided on a DIY circumcision which if anyone is interested in contacting me I will describe in detail.

Going back to the psychology side of the subject I thought I would, once cut, be rid of my fascination with circumcision. Far from it I still find the word a quite magical one, and love to sneak a glance at the all too few men with cut penises one sees at the sports centre changing rooms. A few days ago I was in to the changing rooms of the local swimming baths and saw several boys of about eight taking off their trunks and noticed one had been circumcised. The circumcised boy even at that age had a glans twice as big as the others and made no attempt to hide his penis unlike the others who attempted to keep theirs covered with towels. Incidentally, from the neat appearance, I imagine he had been circumcised using a Plastibell.

I would welcome any correspondence and having recently heard about docking would like to meet someone who still sports a foreskin to demonstrate how its done.

Answer To Anon

I thought I would answer Anon on p9 of the last issue of Acorn by saying that a revision of his slack circumcision is very possible and indeed, highly desirable. As many readers of my DIY exploits (Acorn 1/93) will know I did a successful but slack cut at the age of 24. The skin when flaccid just lapped the corona which annoyed me greatly, and I decided to remove the excess. Having once circumcised myself I had no fears regarding pain or competence etc. however, if I was to achieve a radical result, I would risk the inevitable erections damaging the healing wound. I overcame this by use of good quality surgical tape which dragged shaft skin from the base down towards the glans so that the wound skin was kept in a state of slackness.

It is important to note that I did not use stitches during either operation for two reasons: 1) unnecessary pain by prolonging the op. 2) the cut edges joined together after healing leaving virtually no scar at all. All those who have seen the result have been very impressed.

R.F.W. – Surrey

A Suggestion

A suggestion; could you find someone who would write a comprehensive article describing the various forms of circumcision, ranging from the small snip of the end of the foreskin as used to be the kind done by the Jews to the complete stripping of the foreskin and skin of the penis back to the pubic area performed by certain Arab tribes.

If no member of Acorn has such knowledge, then perhaps Dr. John Warren of NORM UK or one of his members or medical colleagues may be able and willing to help.

Such information could be of interest to anyone who is thinking of being circumcised themselves or has responsibility for another person's proposed circumcision (e.g. a father).

A cut cock might look attractive but I believe that a lot of sensitivity is lost following the operation.

Anon

[There is a 'book' available, Circumcision: An Ethnomedical Study by A. Thomas which can be obtained by sending a cheque/P.O. for made out to A. Thomas to the Acorn box no. This is a very comprehensive study running to 264 pages with full illustrated descriptions of both infant and adult operations, as well as religious and tribal rites. There are also personal accounts, glossary, bibliography etc. — Ed.]

Replies To Dan, Anon & R.F.W.

Prominent Glans Rim: How fortunate for Dan to have a father who was circumcised himself, wanted the same for his son, and was evidently supportive when Dan obtained his first circumcision at age 16 and the revision seven years later which gave him the result of which he is so proud.

Dan has achieved the prominent glans rim that he wanted, after his revision circumcision radically tightened his shaft skin and removed the roll of skin that bunched behind and rolled over his glans, so that he now has a relatively narrow and tight shaft and a well protruding helmet which is very prominent looking. Indeed, Dan tells us that when at rest, instead of hanging vertically, his cock juts out a little because of the tension in the shaft skin. This is just the 'skinned back and ready for action' look which I think is so admirable in a well-cut cock. There is at least one such penis to be seen in the swimming pool changing rooms at my local Leisure Centre.

But, as with faces etc., the structure of the penis does vary with individuals, and even the tightest circumcision does not always produce the result which

Dan achieved. I was circumcised at 14, and was very pleased to have the bare glans which I so much wanted and which allowed me to join the roundheads, among whom were the school-friends I most admired. I still have a sense of pride and achievement when I remember being able to show it off for the first time. That, too, was a loose cut which was tightened when I was 21. The shaft skin is tense when I am erect, and well clear of my glans rim when flaccid, except in extremes of temperature (cool in the pool, hot in the sauna), when the shaft shrinks to a minimum and a wrinkle of skin covers the glans rim.

But whether flaccid or erect, the thickest part of my penis is the shaft about halfway along, and not the helmet. I have wondered whether there is some way to tighten the circumference of the shaft skin, so as to make the glans rim look more prominent. I have concluded, however, that the cigar-shaped shaft I have is the one I will live with.

Revision: Anon writes to ask about a revision. Circumcision is always done on a flaccid penis, and the main difficulty is to judge how much slack to allow for erection. A medic faces the risk of a charge of unprofessional conduct or even 'abuse' if he stimulates the patient to an erection. Yet this is really the only way to ensure that the right amount of foreskin is measured up and marked off for removal, and it has to be done before injecting the anaesthetic, which may cause some swelling and will almost certainly bring an erection to an end. For these reasons, a really tight circumcision is usually only achieved in one of two ways. Either the boy is circumcised before puberty, so that when the penis grows it takes up the slack in the shaft skin. Or a first circumcision is followed by a revision, when the proportion of skin to be removed to achieve the desired tightness is relatively small. Having seen the results achieved by Dr Sifman, I would happily recommend him for both sympathy and effectiveness. Alternatively, a request to VQ, c/o Acorn (together with two loose 1st-class stamps) will also bring a list of circumcisers, although without specific recommendations.

An alternative to circumcision: RFW tells us about the man he met with three small gold rings placed to keep glans bare and his foreskin tethered to the base of his penis. This is, indeed, a reversible alternative to circumcision, especially if sufficiently strong ball-closure rings are used. It would be well worth a try by any adult or teenager interested in feeling what it is like to have a fully exposed glans. But I take issue with RFW's suggestion to try it with an infant, since the foreskin may not be fully retractable in the first 3-4 years, and its bunched-up presence would be difficult to keep clean while the boy was still in nappies.

Impatiens Glandulifera

In response to Dan's article in the last newsletter which made reference to several well shaped helmets and of interest to those readers who like uniforms, I thought the following horticulture tip might be of interest to our gardening inclined readers, and anyone who might have joined Acorn thinking it was all about gardening for future generations.

A truly wonderful plant to grow in one's garden that is very easy to cultivate is Impatiens Glandulifera growing up to six feet tall in a season, its bronze stems and leaves are an architectural asset to any garden. Its pink flowers prolific throughout the season, their shape giving this plant the common name of Policeman's Helmet. Now there's a talking point to introduce Acorn issues. Its Latin name also should appeal to those who prefer to call bodily bits by their correct name. Will collect seeds for next season should anyone be interested.

Acorn Issue 4/99

This was one of the issues you sent to me and I was particularly interested in the article "Comments On 'No Contest' (3/99) by CP – Wiltshire.

I note that CP advised he was going to the clinic in Byfleet to see if he could have more foreskin removed to tighten things up a bit. I would like to know how he got on. During the eleven years since my full circumcision there have been many, many occasions when my wife has masturbated me. She applies an aromatherapy blend called 'sexy' to my glans, masturbates me very vigorously and the effect is mind blowing. However my wife pulls the shaft skin back very hard so that there is considerable strain on my penis and on the circumcision scar in particular. On the occasions I masturbate myself I also pull the skin back hard. Over the years the skin has stretched a little and now when my penis is flaccid a small amount of skin rolls over the top of the glans and the neat fully exposed look I had directly after circumcision has disappeared. I would like to get this look back but have, up to now, thought it unlikely that a surgeon would consider trimming my penis again. CP how did you get on??

Circumcision Hailed As A Way To Curb AIDS

The following extracts are from an article on page 13 of the Sunday Times, March 26th 2000 by Brian Appleyard:-

New evidence suggests that circumcision of all male babies could help to halt the global Aids epidemic. With 50m living cases and more than 16m deaths, the disease is now the worst human health disaster since the black death.

The thesis – laid out in a scientific paper to be published soon – seems likely to create huge controversy as it represents a complete change in accepted ideas about the transmission of Aids.

One of the paper's authors, Roger Short, professor of obstetrics at Melbourne University and a respected scientist with long experience of Aids ravaged areas, has been told that he cannot address the subject at a forthcoming international conference.

Short and his co-author, Dr. Robert Szabo, are convinced that a high level of receptors – sites which invading organisms attach themselves – on the inside of the foreskin make it responsible for transmission.

Short and Szabo noted a sharp difference in the prevalence of HIV infection in the 'Aids Belt' countries in Sub-Saharan Africa. In some areas the infection rates are as high as 25%, in others as low as 1%. The lower infection rates were clearly associated with the practice of male circumcision.

"The presence of an intact foreskin" says the Short-Szabo paper, "has consistently been shown to be the single most significant factor associated with the much higher prevalence of HIV in the Aids belt."

The article goes on to describe further differences in infection rates of circumcised males as well as differences between countries with high circumcision rates versus low rates. They are hoping to shortly begin experimenting on 'newly removed' foreskins, and though not advocating adult circumcision, believe that future generations could be saved if mass circumcision began now. The article concludes:

“The whole of my life’s prejudice has been anti-circumcision” said Short. “I’ve written papers against it. I didn’t believe the benefits outweighed the costs. If God had made us the way we were, why remove a sound organ? But I have been totally converted.”

Partial Cut

In a recent issue, one of our circ-curious colleagues listed several topics about which he would like to know more. The one topic that caught my eye was partial circumcision. As older members will know, I was circumcised in 1995 at 49 years old. Unintentionally, I was partially circ’ed. How did this occur?

I was cut for medical reasons – diabetes, its resulting urinary infections and balanitis. At the time I was quite untutored about the operation, but, when my doctor suggested the procedure, I began a rapid study. I made sure I knew the terminology that applied to my penile anatomy and had a general idea that I didn’t want to lose my frenulum. I had always enjoyed the feelings that originated in this spot and had noticed that most cut men seemed to lack this sinuous flesh.

During my pre-op consultation, I told the urologist that I didn’t want to have a tight cut, since I was dieting for my diabetes and losing weight quite effectively with the help of pondamin – a now discredited medication. I was afraid that if I were circ’ed tightly, the loss of weight might tighten my shaft skin even more, causing discomfort. The urologist agreed with my reasoning and scheduled the op. He did a freehand job – a dorsal slit. When I came to my senses after the procedure, everything was swollen and tight. My glans was prominently exposed to the cold (this was January) and to my briefs. I did note with satisfaction, however, that my frenulum was still in place and very swollen.

It took several weeks for the swelling to subside and several months for the frenulum to return to its supple form. However, in the meantime, I had to stop taking the weight reduction drug and I gained back 30 pounds. I am proud however, to maintained 100 pounds of my weight loss for over five years. The effect of this gain was a partial circ! Unfortunately, avoirdupois pushes downwards. Now my cockhead is  $\frac{2}{3}$  covered, most of the time. With very little provocation, however, it reappears and completely uncovers – something that never occurred before the circ. My glans has never gotten tough, but remains moist most of time. As for sensitivity – it has lost some – I can touch it during masturbation. The cockhead dries out quickly when uncapped, allowing me to stroke it. I could never have done so before. During sex the slight loss of sensitivity has given me staying power.

All in all, I'm very satisfied at the partial circ result. I never had another urinary infection and sex is better than before. I would recommend it to any guy who wants the cut experience, but is isn't obsessing about the high and tight look. It's the best of both worlds.

I hope to react about other men's experience with a partial circumcision. So many in Acorn write about second and third cuts, I wonder if a partial cut has satisfied anybody else.

A Great Cut At 44

I sent a message to Acorn last year hoping for advice or help with my decision to seek a circumcision.

Well, I did proceed and the result has been fantastic. But I would like to thank a small group of people who encouraged me. I don't want to name anyone in particular but I have received e-mails of encouragement from subscribers of Acorn. I don't live in the U.K. so Acorn is a publication I am not familiar with.

I grew up in the minority at school being uncircumcised and was forever the subject of mockery and ridicule. Then when I left school, I was deterred by a doctor who was against such a procedure. I think he felt he knew best and the patient's needs and wants were secondary. His advice was simply at the age of twenty-one I was too old. And so, because of ignorance, I waited twenty-five years to have my circumcision.

With the advent of the 'net' and all the information that could be found there, I started researching the subject. I stumbled over anti-circ sites, one after the other. Then finally a small group of men who have experienced adult circumcision was revealed to me at certain sites. One by one they wrote of the revelation and enjoyment that being free of a foreskin meant both in every day life as well as in bed. With their encouragement I faced the doctor's scalpel last year. I have to say I enjoyed every minute. It almost felt like an initiation for me. It is something I would do again to feel the way I do now about myself.

Well, that's my story. The result has been fantastic, such was the surgeon's skill and so I wear my scar with pride.

AUTUMN MEETING 2000

Another year is rushing by and the summer has been and gone, but before we get to Christmas, there is the Autumn Meeting. This will be held at Hemel Hempstead (not Milton Keynes as had been hoped). I know that many of you were disappointed that we didn't hold the Spring meeting, but I think that this one will more than make up for it. Already nearly twenty people have signed up before the invites have even gone out, so I think that this may be one of the biggest meetings yet.

This Autumn Meeting will follow the same basic format as previous meetings. Please do try and come. Members will start arriving on Friday evening where we will meet informally in the bar & then have dinner later on. More members will arrive during Saturday morning;

Correspondence

Please send all correspondence to:

THE ACORN SOCIETY
PO BOX 296
IPSWICH
IP2 8SH

Letters for forwarding should be marked with the recipient's identifier in pencil. They should be stamped 1st class and enclosed in an envelope addressed as above.

E-Mail may be sent to: acornsoc@aol.com

we will have a very brief business meeting starting at 2.30 pm, after that we have a private meeting room where we can all chat about our favourite subject and any others for the rest of the day until supper at approx 8.30 pm. A lazy morning on Sunday with rooms vacated by 12.00.

You are welcome to come along for as much or as little as you would like. Already nearly twenty members are definitely coming so it looks like it may be the largest meeting yet! If you would like to come but are 'unsure about it', let us know and we'll give you a call and explain everything. If you would like to meet up with someone beforehand, we'll see what we can organise. If you can't get there, let us know and we'll try to arrange a lift. There is no excuse not to go! Although there is plenty of space at the moment, the hotel will become fully booked up nearer the time, so please book early (we have tried many hotels, but most were fully booked already!)

Please fill out the enclosed form and return it to the PO Box.

The Sights Of Europe

In the interests of science, on my recent holiday, I did a tour of the gay saunas in Prague and Vienna. Of well over two hundred sightings I was amazed to find only one circumcision. We've had only one member from Austria, and he wanted a circumcision.

It would appear that in gay saunas it is not the done thing to talk to other people unless they are bosom (or is it bottom) pals. Anyway, they had to put up with me, although all I enquired about were their nationalities, as these are cosmopolitan cities. I found that there were Hungarians, Italians, Romanians, German and Swiss as well as their own nationals.

No attempts were made to keep foreskins retracted, unlike on the naturist beaches in this country. Maybe circumcisions are so uncommon there, and they know so little about the subject, that they don't think about imitating circumcisions like they do here.

Anyway, the vast majority of the foreskins were very normal with a gap at the tip and just a few long and short ones. All very interesting.

Lateral preputioplasty for phimosis

J R Coll Surg Edinb, 1999. 44:310-2

TM Lane and LM South, Department of Surgery,
The Maidstone Hospital, Hermitage Lane, Kent, UK

Abstract

There exists a lack of understanding of normal preputial development which is reflected in large numbers of inappropriate referrals for circumcision. While the scarred prepuce invariably responds best to formal circumcision a more conservative approach is recommended in those symptomatic patients with non-retractile foreskins. In this study, patients referred to the out-patient department with phimosis were assessed. Those with a phimosis and secondary preputial scarring were listed for circumcision. Those with a narrowed foreskin and a history of recurrent balanitis or local symptoms such as fissuration, thought suitable for a more conservative approach were listed for preputioplasty. N.B. Those with a phimosis but without local symptoms were reassured and discharged (no treatment was considered necessary or appropriate). Thirty patients were referred for preputioplasty. One patient developed a post-operative wound infection which settled with oral antibiotics prescribed by his GP. This left him with further preputial adhesions and he later underwent circumcision. The remaining patients reported no post-operative problems at follow-up. Cosmesis was good with high levels of patient satisfaction expressed. All had easily retractile foreskins at follow-up.

Large numbers of patients might reasonably benefit from a lateral preputioplasty when presenting with a symptomatic phimosis in the absence of significant scarring of the prepuce. It avoids the needless loss of the foreskin, the importance of which is only now beginning to emerge.

Reply To

'Circumcision Hailed As A Way to Curb AIDS'

I feel that I have to take up the cudgels in defence of the foreskin over this article.

It is true that some African countries such as Zimbabwe have a fearful high rate of AIDS, and the two main tribes, Shona and Ndebele do not ritually circumcise. But the same can be said for those countries that do circumcise, and, as An Ethnomedical Study shows, most tribes in Central Africa do ritually circumcise. I can remember Jomo Kenyatta making an edict that every man in Kenya must be circumcised. If what the article suggests is true, why isn't it rife in China, Japan and India, where there are millions of foreskins. I suggest that the authors should look more at ethnic cultures to find out why one country has a lower rate of AIDS than others.

Let us now move onto the Western World. No one would doubt that there would be much difference between the promiscuity rate of American and European homosexuals. By 1995, half a million American gays were dead from AIDS. In Europe it was a few thousand. One would then, by the authors' hypothesis, be led to think that no Americans are circumcised and all Europeans are, although the reverse is true.

The poor old foreskin has had a torrid time of it in the last 150 years from the medical world. Imbecility, gout, piles, ingrowing toenails, gall stones and a host of other diseases, caused by masturbation, which in its turn was caused by the foreskin. (Think what all the circumcised are missing nowadays because they don't masturbate, their circumcision having taken away the urge to do it.) Then we've had cancer to women, penile cancer, and all sexually transmitted diseases. The whole lot have been unfounded. And now, up comes AIDS. What next!!

Day Surgery

I recently had to visit the day surgery unit of our local hospital in order to have a cyst removed which repeatedly kept bleeding.

In the next bed was a young bloke who was clearly anxious to talk to someone and before long we were chatting away. He had never had to be a patient in hospital before and was very fearful of his present situation, he was about to be circumcised.

He had never been able to retract his foreskin and see his helmet, but this had never caused him any problems, he had never known anything different. He had two previous girlfriends but neither of them had mentioned his tight foreskin. He had now met a pretty Malaysian girl and was rapidly falling in love with her but she kept on asking when she was going to see his helmet; this was beginning to interfere with their relationship.

After giving the matter much thought he had decided to see his local doctor who confirmed that he definitely needed circumcising and if he left the matter he did run the increased risk of developing cancer of the penis – this had shaken him. He was concerned that even if he was circumcised there was no guarantee that they would not split up but he hoped very much that this would not happen and had decided to go ahead with the operation. For two strangers we found ourselves having a very intense heart to heart about an intimate subject. As I left the hospital, he was beginning to come round from the anaesthetic.

I told him that I had been circumcised as an adult some thirty years ago now. At once he was relieved to hear from someone who'd had a similar operation and he naturally had a number of questions he wanted to ask.

It had been possible to retract my foreskin which was long and often used to get red and sore particularly after sex. After the operation the surgeon had told me that my foreskin was abnormally long and this condition often does aggravate balanitis and that the only permanent solution was circumcision.

I told him that he would have a number of stitches and that any discomfort could easily be controlled with painkillers. I did warn him that to begin with his helmet would be very sensitive and that it would take some time to get adjusted to his new situation.

Quite by chance six weeks later I met him again in outpatients. We had both come to have checkups. This time his attitude was very different. He was very pleased with the result of the operation and his relationship with his girlfriend had deepened, and they were seriously considering getting married. Apparently a high percentage of Malaysians are circumcised. He was still adjusting to having a permanently exposed helmet, but things had turned out very much as I had described. Good luck to both of them.

A Tight Pullover

What do you do when you discover in early adulthood that you have a foreskin that is mobile and retractable when your penis is flaccid and soft but will not retract over the glans without pain and discomfort when erect? Sometimes it even gets painfully stuck behind the glans until the erection subsides. Over exuberance in intercourse results in several days discomfort and recovery time. On the other side you know of circumcision but don't want unnecessary surgery particularly when recognising your foreskin's major contribution to pleasurable sensations eg. during masturbation.

To heighten your dilemma, it's not an easy problem to discuss and you can't illustrate it to a doctor. You consult medical books and the diagnosis is that horrible word phimosis. Like tuberculosis and asbestosis it sounds like a disease, and bad news, but your foreskin is perfectly healthy – just tight. The books also state that the only cure is circumcision and also warn that if you have any penis or foreskin problems, don't under any circumstances put anything down your penis – consult a doctor. You do, and he merely confirms what the books said, in a conversation which makes you feel you should never have asked.

Some years later I consulted a specialist whilst going through a vasectomy, he also confirmed the diagnosis (phimosis) and the cure (circumcision). So its circumcision or soldier on with the considerable help and understanding of my wife and in the strong belief that my foreskin though long (but not really knowing exactly what long is ) was meant to be there, and also learning that circumcision is all or nothing – you can't just have an inch or so removed – I soldiered on. After all everything was healthy and worked OK, it was just too tight.

Why oh why did none of the books, or the doctor, or the specialist suggest stretching my foreskin – a gentle non surgical treatment just like a brace on a tooth? Perhaps because it was 20 years ago though I don't believe much has changed today unless you probe beneath the surface of standard medical information and practice. NOCIRC and NORM are doing this albeit from the viewpoint of those unhappy with their circumcised state. Finally the foreskin which nature provided all men with, is deservedly starting to get a better press and make a comeback.

The kick start for my cure was a NOCIRC piece on TV's Good Sex Guide showing downward stretching by weight and tension for foreskin restoration. If you can stretch downwards and you can put something down your penis (or at least inside the foreskin) why not stretch by width? Eureka! Suddenly I could see the light.

Several plastic and rubber devices of increasing diameters and lengths later (basically tubes) and nearly three years, the stretching is successfully and painlessly completed. The successful conversion of my foreskin from a pain into a pleasure. I don't accept that my problem was phimosis, just everything was intact but too tight – a 'tight pullover'. I'm also sure that for anyone starting from where I started now – the job could be done in much less time.

These questions remain on which members might have views, answers or observations:-

- 1) How common is the 'tight pullover' condition? Difficult to assess, but I don't believe my condition and the long overhang that undoubtedly encouraged it, is that unusual. If there are others out there, believe me there is an easy painless way to make a massive improvement in your sexual sensation and performance.
- 2) Having completed the stretching exercise successfully, is there any danger of the overhang foreskin retightening since it doesn't have the dilation effect of contact with the glans? As an insurance policy against nature undoing the benefits of stretching, I use a small dilator or sleeper in the form of a rubber thimble. Whilst it's easy to wear, day or night, is it necessary?
- 3) Now having the full benefits from the pleasurable sensations in all the nerve endings of a corrected foreskin begs the question is there an optimum length of foreskin? When it provides so many benefits, logic would suggest stretching further in length to provide additional benefits of pleasurable sensations during movement and retraction – or can you have too much of a good thing?

I await views and observations.

A Well Cut Cock

Recent articles appearing in Acorn have prompted me, regarding what is considered to be a well cut cock, and that which is loosely cut, to write and give my views on what I consider to be a well cut cock.

From a purely personal point of view I give my definition of a well cut cock. When in the flaccid state there should be no loose skin around the base of the corona. The skin on the shaft should be smooth, without any wrinkles. When erect, the shaft skin is stretched tight, and if necessary skin is pulled up from the scrotum area. At no time should there be any noticeable folds in the skin whether flaccid or erect.

As some members know, I was circumcised some thirty five years ago. I was given the opportunity, by the Doctor who did the circumcision for me, to have a tight circumcision, or what he called a French style of circumcision. This, it transpired, was a partial circumcision, and only about half of my foreskin would have been removed. Fortunately, as far as I was concerned, I chose to have a tight circumcision. I was told that there would be no need for me to have a revision, and it would do me for the rest of my life. How glad I was that I chose the latter.

When all was healed, I ended up with a fairly 'radical' circumcision. There was no loose skin behind my corona and the knob was fully exposed at all times. Initially, when erect, there was a tight feeling and skin was pulled up from my scrotum area. This had the effect of causing my testicles to be tightly bunched, and not hang down in the sack. This has proved to be no disadvantage over the years. The compensation is a very aesthetically shaped cock, which has been admired by many people.

I once had the opportunity of giving advice to a guy I knew, who was having a circumcision done through the NHS. I advised him to insist on a tight circumcision, and not to be fobbed off with anything less. When he went in he was told that the surgeon would only split the foreskin, and not remove any of it. He protested strongly that he wished to be fully circumcised so that there was no need for a repeat operation. I believe he had quite a problem in convincing the surgeon what he wanted. He was finally able to get a tight full circumcision.

I since saw the final result, and he certainly got what he asked for. After some years, he said to me that he had no regrets at insisting that the job was done properly, and he used to thank me for putting him on the right path. He said that he would not have been happy with a very partial circumcision.

As far as sensitivity is concerned, I would probably agree with those who say that when the frenulum has been removed there is a slight loss of sensitivity. However I would say that after thirty five years I have not found this a problem, and everything still works very well!

If I were to have the chance again, knowing what I do now, I would probably have tried to have a Muslim cut. This, I believe, entails keeping as much of the inner foreskin, whilst removing the skin on the outer foreskin. I am told that this allows the nerves of the inner foreskin to be exposed, and therefore maintains sensitivity. The resultant scar is some distance down the shaft. I have never been able to confirm this or not, as I have not had the opportunity of speaking, or corresponding with someone with this style of circumcision. If anyone has either got a circumcision like this, or has first hand experience of this I would be very interested to hear from them.

Returning to my original comment. A well cut cock has to have no surplus skin around the corona whilst flaccid, exposing the knob the whole time. I am sure that there are many who would argue the other way. Such is life.

If anyone would like to contact me I should be happy to pursue this further with them. I can also be contacted at: john@shakerley.fsnet.co.uk

Byfleet Clinic Closure

Reference to my article in Acorn Issue 4/99 saying that I was hoping to have a Revision Circumcision done at the Emergency Plus Clinic in Byfleet Surrey. Well I had a booking for 10 a.m. on the 6th June. After doing a round trip of 250 miles I arrived to find the Clinic closed and all the windows had been whitewashed. On making a few enquiries no one next door was prepared to comment.

Me being me I rang the General Medical Council who very kindly gave me the address of the Surgeon who would have done my operation. I have been in touch with him and he gave me the run down on the situation. I have also written to the nurses that made my appointment and am waiting for a reply from them.

If anyone is interested and would like to call me or write to me on this problem I would love to hear from you, male or female, there may be hope in a couple of months time when the Surgeon is hoping something will open up again and he will contact me personally, although he only works for the Clinic and is not a part owner, he is very much in favour of surgery at the right price for the every day people who cannot afford the high private hospital prices for first time circumcisions and revision circumcisions plus many other procedures for men and women. I have all the other procedures details if anyone would like them and very good prices, although obviously at the moment they are not available due to the closure.

He is quite disappointed that the Clinic closed in this way and assures me that things will sort itself out with new owners. Please do not hesitate to contact me on this problem and I will give you all the information that I have. As soon as I have some useful information regarding another Clinic I will share it with you all. My details are with Steve Acorn.

Another Prince Albert

An article in the Kentuckian Gay Nudist, April 2000, states:

Did you know that the Prince Albert who gave his name to the form of genital piercing popular today, was not Prince Albert, consort and husband of Queen Victoria?

He was Prince Albert Victor, Duke of Clarence, a grandson of Queen Victoria, and the eldest son of the then Edward, Prince of Wales – the future Edward the VII. Prince Albert Victor was well known in society for his hedonistic and debauched lifestyle, and he was even rumoured to have been Jack the Ripper. The Prince died in mysterious circumstances before his father came to the throne and he is now almost forgotten, apart from giving his name to this rather strange form of personal adornment.

[Any remarks? — D.A.]

Thoughts On Acorn

Congratulations on taking over the mantle of Editor from the excellent David, though you may wonder at the moment if you've not been given a poisoned chalice! David told me of the problems being faced which was not just lack of suitable copy but a haemorrhaging membership.

In this respect I do think that if we want to expand the appeal of Acorn, we need to make it acceptable to a wider audience. For example in the last issue just received, all the letters bar one very brief one, were from pro-circumcision members. Consequently people like me who are not pro-circumcision will wonder if there's any point in continuing as members if our letters are not going to get published and our point of view is disregarded.

This is fine if it is the intention of the club to re-write the rules (which give equal emphasis to the foreskin as well as circumcision) but it is rather sad for people like me – I shall always be grateful to Acorn for giving me the opportunity to express my life-long anguish and distress at being circumcised without the option. By unloading your pro-foreskin members you will virtually restrict your membership to gay men who have had themselves circumcised as adults and who get their jollies from talking about it. This is necessarily a tiny cross-section of the population and as a result, membership will never increase.

If on the other hand you do want to appeal to a wider audience, you need to get away from the endless diet of revisions, re-revisions, DIY knife and fork jobs and so on and I suggest you take a leaf out of NORM-UK's book who are going from strength to strength, with a rapidly growing membership, charitable status and a national figure as its President. It also has a very powerful and effective women's section and a strong Jewish and Muslim membership.

So as well as re-instating pro-foreskin material, I suggest we expand to include women's issues, with articles about female circumcision for example – or the function of both male and female genitals in general. At the same time the price needs to go up quite drastically to pay for production expenses – if you rely too much on volunteers you will inevitably be let down. If people think that what we are saying is worthwhile, they'll be prepared to pay for it. That is certainly NORM-UK's experience. But it must be worthwhile!

As a case in point I submitted a report on the BJU's Circumcision Supplement (enclosed) to David some time ago which he said he would publish since it is a landmark publication totally relevant to our chosen subject. Although it will make uncomfortable reading for a lot of our membership, we should be made aware of these developments, like them or not. Do hope you can find room for it.

Best regards – and good luck.

R.B.W.

[Many thanks for your letter which raises some good points.

I would love to have a large stockpile of letters, so that each issue could be well balanced. However that is not the way the letters come in, so the balance comes in over a number of issues rather than in just one. Issue 1 was fairly anti/pro-foreskin/restoration & unbiased observation, issue 2 was more pro, this issue is somewhat anti – a rough balance is achieved, I hope.

Any comments from members on your letter would be welcomed.

PS: The report on the BJU circumcision supplement runs to three closely typed A4 pages, and is rather large for the newsletter. If anyone would like a copy of this report, please send an SAE to the Box No. At least one member is planning to bring the full supplement to the Autumn Meeting & I will bring your report on it. — S.A.]

Childhood Wish Fulfilled

After reading the letters in the Acorn issues you sent I felt I had to write with my own experiences.

Born in 1948 in Germany (father BAOR). This period was still open season on foreskins and many boys (including HRH) were circumcised if their parents wanted it done. My father and brother (born ten years earlier than me) were both circumcised. According to my mother when she asked that I be circumcised she encountered some opposition from the doctors in the military hospital who did not want to perform the operation on me and it was some weeks after my birth, when my mother, claiming that my foreskin would not retract, finally persuaded the doctor (even though, I assume, it was known then that the foreskin is not necessarily retractable at such a young age) that my penis needed attention. However I was not fully circumcised but had what is called a dorsal slit presumably to allow my foreskin to retract over the glans. My foreskin was sliced apart on the top by about half its length. My mother must have been content with this or else she could not get a doctor to cut any more foreskin away, because no further attempts were made to remove my foreskin and I lived with my penis like this until I was 39.

During my early years my foreskin covered my glans but as I grew up it receded until, on the top of the glans it sat just over the rear of the glans the remainder of the top being uncovered but the underside and sides of the glans were well covered. If I gave the foreskin a tug it would cover more of the glans but after a while it would peel back to its normal position. (I hope you can get an idea of what it looked like but it is not easy to describe.)

During my school days I was the only one in my class who had been cut this way (the other boys were either totally circumcised or not cut at all. It was shortly after I started school at 5 before I realised that penises were different. My father never undressed in front of me and my brother was away at boarding school and being that much older than me I had not seen him naked either. I am sure there were occasions when I was nude with other boys and girls but these did not register. It was when I was in the toilets having a wee that a classmate also 5 made any reference to my penis. He challenged me to see which of us could wee up the wall the furthest and during the contest we obviously looked at each other's penis. I had pulled back my foreskin fully exposing my glans which was the usual way for me to wee. The other boy's penis was fully covered by his foreskin which was also quite long. He must have thought that I had an advantage by pulling my foreskin back and he tried to do the same thing. It must have been the first time he had tried to do this or he wrenched his foreskin back too firmly because either his foreskin and/or the tip of his penis started to bleed. Needless to say the game ended immediately. I do not remember the boy having time off school but I assume he must have had some time off because on a later occasion (it was only a few weeks after the earlier episode) when he and I were in the toilets playing the same game that I noticed his long foreskin had gone and he had a red scar round the shaft of his penis. He told me that after our earlier game he had told his mother his penis had been bleeding and after a visit to the doctor he was taken into hospital and circumcised. That was the first time I had heard that word. When you are young significant episodes like the one just mentioned really stick in your mind.

Needless to say when I went home I told my mother that a boy in school had just been circumcised and the skin over his penis had been cut off. At this point my mother told me that she had asked the doctor to circumcise me when I was a baby but that he had only sliced through my foreskin which was why my penis looked the way it did. She also told me that my father and brother had been fully circumcised.

It was not until I was 11 and started secondary school that nakedness became a more familiar state. At the infant and junior schools PE was not really on the timetable. Our school did not go swimming and we did not have any proper facilities, consequently what little PE we did was done in our normal school clothes; we did not change into PE kit and there were no changing rooms. At 11 the boys in my class (I went to a Co-Ed school so each class was about 50/50 boys/girls) found ourselves thrown together with another class of boys of the same year for PE; PE was a recognised formal lesson and on the timetable; in fact we had a PE lesson almost every day. Now changing rooms were provided including showers and we were required to change out of our school clothing and into PE kit when we had a lesson. I remember our first lesson was gym and we had to strip off all our clothes including underwear and were just clad in our white shorts. On return from the gym we were all lined up naked to go through the showers. There were about 30 boys in the PE class and the showers only took 10 at a time so there was a queue. As this was the first time most of the boys (including me) had been made to stand naked in a queue, looking, even staring, at the other boys' penises was what most of us did and as I recall about half the boys were circumcised.

At the age of 23 I was married and my wife and I had two children (a boy and a girl). Our sex life was great until I was 38 when I started to get a problem with my penis. For reasons I could not understand the underside of the glans became very red and sore and looked as though the first level of skin had been peeled away and the inside of my foreskin became 'manky'. My doctor prescribed a cream and this appeared to do the trick. However a short while later the same problem flared up again but went away with the use of the cream. This problem occurred on a number of occasions during the next year but I was able to contain it by use of the cream. As you can imagine my wife was very concerned about the problem and wanted a permanent cure. On my next visit to the doctor he suggested that I consider a full circumcision. My wife and I pondered this proposal for a while but as we were just about to move house and location I had to put any decision on hold. However shortly after our move the old problem reared its head again and my wife and I decided that the operation would be the best solution. Having just moved and changed doctors I did not feel like going through the same routines with my new GP.

Fortunately my wife saw an advertisement in the Observer newspaper that circumcisions were available privately at the Surgical Advisory Service for £190; I immediately wrote off for more information. The response was immediate; the letter gave clear information about the operation and advised there was a two week waiting list. I wrote back enclosing the deposit and an appointment was made for early August 1988. I opted for a local anaesthetic for my circumcision although a light general was available. My appointment was for 1:30 pm and I arrived about ten minutes or so early. The waiting room was comfortable and there was one other guy sitting there when I arrived. Not being one who just sits in silence and ignores people and as there were only the two of us we got chatting. This guy had been circumcised about half an hour earlier and was waiting for the surgeon to inspect his penis to ensure he was not bleeding. The door opened, in came another guy and the guy I was chatting to was called out. The guy who had come in had just been circumcised and was required to sit and wait for half an hour to ensure he was not bleeding. The nurse called my name and I was led to a small room and told to remove all my clothes below the waist. I sat there for a few minutes when the surgeon came to see me. He asked why I wanted to be circumcised and when I told him about the infections I had been suffering with he just said fine and led me into the operating room (I would not call it an operating theatre as it was pretty basic). During the chat with the surgeon I made it quite clear that I wanted a total circumcision with no foreskin left to cover the glans and he agreed.

I laid down on the table (I wanted to watch but the surgeon said he wanted me lying down so unfortunately I did not see what happened) and the surgeon applied some fluid and then injected my penis at four points. He then waited for a few minutes chatting to the nurse; returning to me he pricked my penis and asked if I felt any pain. Having established that my penis was completely numbed he commenced to circumcise me. I felt my foreskin being gripped and pulled forward at various points and I could feel/sense the foreskin being cut away. It took a very short time to remove my foreskin and then the surgeon was sewing me up; some gauze was applied and a bandage was wrapped round my penis. That was it. Back to the waiting room to wait my half an hour. There were two guys waiting; the guy who had been circumcised just before me and a new guy who I learnt had come to be circumcised. This guy asked if it hurt and I told him the only minimal discomfort I experienced was when the needle injecting the anaesthetic had been inserted in my foreskin. I told him the whole procedure took only a short time and that we seemed to be on a conveyor belt: one done, one being done and one waiting. The literature had advised that loose clothing be worn so that minimum rubbing of the penis would occur. I did not have any underwear on and just wore a pair of tracksuit bottoms so my penis was able to hang free in its bandage. I pulled the top of my tracksuit out so that the guy could get a view of what his penis would look like in about 30 minutes; that is all wrapped in a bandage. After my wait and a quick check I was given a prescription for a couple of things which I got in a nearby chemist and I was on my way home.

I had travelled to London for the operation by National Express so I had about a four hour drive home. During the trip the anaesthetic wore off and I could feel my penis coming back to life. Surprisingly my penis did not hurt; it was a little uncomfortable but certainly not painful. Maybe I was lucky but the sort of stories one hears of regarding pain etc were not so in my case.

After three days I sat and soaked in the bath as the leaflet I had been given by the Surgical Advisory Service advised. I peeled off the bandage and the gauze and saw my fully circumcised penis for the first time. True to his word the surgeon had removed my foreskin completely and I had a circular cut round my shaft that was held together by numerous stitches. Even at this time I did not experience any significant pain with my limp penis soaking in the bath water. As I came out of the bath I had my first real erection since the operation. It was not painful and my penis tingled more than anything else as the cut area and stitches came under strain by my erecting penis. I think I can say the experience was 'pleasurably painful'. The skin on the shaft was very taut and I was hardly able to get any movement of the skin. The skin on my glans was also tight and was drawn back towards the cut and stitched area. The stitches were dissolvable and with a little help from me all disappeared within a week or so. The wound healed up fairly quickly (within a few weeks) and I was and still am left with a circular scar round my penis. The skin on my shaft appeared to slacken a little and I had considerably more movement than immediately after the operation. It may be that this movement was always there but I was rather hesitant at putting pressure on the cut when it was still open.

Since my circumcision my sex life has been great and my wife became more willing to engage in other forms of sexual stimulation. My wife certainly likes my penis fully circumcised. We are both naturists and my wife has often said that she finds the look of some of the uncircumcised penises (not all, but those with particularly long foreskins) one sees on the beach quite 'off putting'.

I have never regretted being circumcised and to some extent wish I had taken the decision earlier. I do however consider that the decision to be circumcised or not should be taken by the individual and not for them by parents unless there is a real medical need or religious requirement. To my knowledge my son, now over 20, still has his foreskin and it would have to be his decision to get circumcised.

In Answer To Revision (1/2000)

In answer to the revision question (Issue 1/2000) perhaps my story may be helpful.

I'm 41 and was always fascinated by the sight of a circumcised penis. When I was a kid I used to pull my foreskin back in the vain hope that it would stay there and I would be 'circumcised'!

When I was 21 I went to my local GP and to my surprise, he referred me to the local hospital even though there was no medical reason for the operation. I saw a consultant and 6 weeks later I got a letter calling me to go into hospital the following week. Great! my dreams had come true. Not so!

Whoever did the operation didn't know what he was doing because it ended up a right mess. Very loose, an extremely jagged scar line and a 'blob' of skin (I can't think of any other way to describe it) on the underside. When hard, most of these defects weren't that noticeable but when soft, not a pleasing sight.

A few years later I started to notice adverts for circumcision in the London Evening Standard and I decided to book an appointment with the Surgical Advisory Service. The Doctor there was so horrified at what he saw he wanted to sort it out there and then. I wasn't ready to go ahead that day but went back a week later for a revision.

He removed the blob of skin on the underside, tidied up the scar and all in all, did quite a good job, but it still was fairly loose. Although because of my first op I'd never have the 'high and tight' I'd always wanted, I did want it tighter.

About 6 months ago I heard about Dr Sifman through a guy I spoke to on the net. After some initial hesitation, I went to see him. I wanted to find out whether two things could be done: to be tightened up and have my frenulum removed. Why I decided I wanted my frenulum removed is difficult to answer but that's what I wanted.

He didn't give me an easy time. I was a bit nervous and he was of the view that there was nothing wrong with the circumcision I had. He was cautious about doing anything but said if that is what I wanted, he'd do it for me. So, after thinking about it for a week. I arranged to have my final revision!

He tightened me up, removed my frenulum and did an excellent job. The main difference in his technique which he sometimes uses and which I had is not to use any stitches. On adults this, I think, is unique. Given my previous circumcisions, I had a pretty good idea as to what I'd expect to see and how the healing process would progress. By not using stitches it was all very different.

When I first took the dressing off I was horrified. I thought he'd made the most horrendous job of it and I went into a blind panic. Fortunately, Dr

Sifman had contacted someone else on whom he had performed a similar operation. This guy rang me and after I had told him my fears reassured me that everything was ok. And it was. I was warned that the healing process could be at least six weeks. After 4 weeks I had my first careful wank. After six weeks, I was back in action.

When soft, the skin lies nicely on the shaft without any bunching near the head. When hard, there's almost no skin movement at all. Sex is fantastic and all for only £300.

I would certainly recommend Dr Sifman. Although any revision is always restricted by how the original circumcision was done, from my experience and others I have spoken to who have also been circumcised by him, he will try to give you the circumcision you want. Some, I believe, have taken pictures from magazines along to him of the sort of circumcision they wish him to emulate.

Re 'Replies To Dan, Anon And RFW' In 2/2000

I do not believe the comment made by Tony Acorn in the article is quite correct. His concerns about a medic stimulating a penis to erection are noted but I watched a programme on Channel 4 TV – Under the Knife – which took us through the operation on a penis for Peyronie's disease. The whole operation was undertaken on an erect penis and the surgeon injected the penis to make it erect and pumped a fluid into it during the operation to maintain an erection.

If this procedure is acceptable for this operation and if the patient consents to his penis being erect for the operation of circumcision I fail to see why there should be any problem. May be Tony Acorn or anyone else could comment further. If by making my penis erect was the only way I could get a tight result I would have no difficulty in consenting to this procedure.

I was quite impressed by the surgeon's (a woman) performance as she made every attempt to make the penis aesthetically pleasant and this involved cutting round the old circumcision scar and skinning the penis down to below the area where the disease was. On completion she sewed the skin up more or less along the same line. It would seem a relatively simple procedure to the competent surgeon to make two cuts and remove the small amount of skin between and sew up the result. This would certainly give a tight result. The only down side I would assume would be the cost. If a surgeon was prepared to undertake the procedure for a reasonable price I would suggest he/she would be on to a winner.

Editorial

As another year draws to a close, I guess its time to take stock of where we are. A few members have left during the year, and unfortunately a few have died, however we have welcomed several new members and the membership remains slightly up at just over 180. We have recently had a successful Autumn meeting, though due to the problems on the railways, several members were unable to attend. We are solvent and although we have gone down to having only four issues of the newsletter per year, I think that the majority of the contributions remain interesting.

A membership renewal form is enclosed, together with a proposal for a gathering in March next year. If we are to go ahead and arrange this meeting, we will need to confirm it by mid January, so if you would like to come, please reply a.s.a.p. I think that the meetings are one of the real bonuses of this group. To be able to meet people with similar or related interests and talk freely and openly has certainly helped me to a better understanding of my feelings towards circumcision.

The October Meeting

A meeting of the Acorn Society took place in Hemel Hempstead during the weekend of the 27/28th October. Members from Cornwall, Dorset, Somerset, Surrey, Essex, Greater London, Suffolk, Norfolk, Cambridgeshire and Merseyside made it to the hotel by road, rail and air during a weekend when travel was made difficult by Railtrack's massive action on the railway service following derailments and serious flooding which occurred in some parts of the country. We numbered twenty-one in total and we were pleased to welcome Peter to his first meeting and to see again Don and Edward. A further three members were expected from Sussex and Lancashire.

Having done some 'market research' about a date and possible location for a meeting we hit difficulties in finding a hotel to accommodate us. Eventually, and though the suggestion of Ian, a long time member of Acorn, I contacted a Conference Organiser who proved most helpful, found us a suitable hotel and negotiated favourable terms for our stay. For the first time we found ourselves in a hotel with sauna, steam room and swimming pool.

During a short business meeting members exercised their minds on three particular topics, the magazine, the accounts and the question of future meetings.

The Magazine: Our Editor, Steve, explained that there had been some difficulty in obtaining copy for the six magazines issued in the last year. After some discussion it was agreed that a target of four editions of the magazines, with a possible bonus of a fifth edition, would be the intention for the year 2001. It is a pity that we are reduced to this, we know that all our members have a story to tell or opinion to express and wonder why they are so reluctant to share their story or opinion. Without contributions the magazine will fold and with it the Acorn Society.

The Accounts: Douglas, our Treasurer, presented a financial statement for the period Jan 1999 – Sept 2000. We are financially secure. Recognising the objective of four or five editions of the magazine in the year commencing January 2001 a subscription of £5 plus the additional cost of postage for our overseas members was proposed and agreed.

Future Meetings: At breakfast on Sunday morning, that time when telephone numbers and e-mail addresses are exchanged, there was general agreement that the meeting had been a success. However, twenty members staying at least one night in the hotel is about the lowest number for which reduced terms can be negotiated. Meetings held in Leicester have attracted the largest number of members, is this location the most convenient to our members? Our Conference Organiser has suggested that a lower cost event could be negotiated if members were willing to meet in a hotel between, say, Brighton and Bournemouth rather than within ten miles of the M25. We would like to know your opinions.

Reply To: A Well Cut Cock

In reply to I.S. of Guernsey (3/2000 – A Well Cut Cock), I am the proud possessor of a ‘Muslim cut’ as J.S. describes it, or ‘high and tight’ as it is often described in the U.S. In my case, this was the result of a forceps-guided circumcision by the skilled hands of Dr Sifman, with an additional half-inch of shaft skin removed all round at the same time.

As in a muslim circumcision, the foreskin and shaft skin were pulled hard forwards beyond the glans and clamped. This resulted in almost all the inner foreskin remaining behind the forceps and still covering the glans, and all the outer foreskin and about a third of the shaft skin being clamped off beyond the forceps and removed on circumcision. In order to ensure a suitable degree of tightness an additional half-inch of shaft skin was then removed, which allows the skin to stretch smoothly over the shaft when erect and avoids covering the corona when soft. This has resulted in a circumcision scar which lies about halfway along the shaft between the corona and the base of the penis. The scar itself is quite pale in colour and is a ‘Q’ shape (rather than an ‘O’) as it continues towards the glans with a ‘T-junction’ on the underside, resulting from the removal of the lower part the frenulum. About an inch of the frenulum remains by the glans. There is a distinct colour change between the darker skin of the shaft and the pale pinkish inner foreskin. I think that the corona of the glans has expanded to some extent since circumcision, giving a more mushroom-shaped appearance rather than the more bullet-headed appearance when it was regularly covered by foreskin. This may, however, be due in part to the skin on the shaft no longer bunching behind the glans, and the sleek shaft emphasizing the true helmet shape of the glans. In any case, it is quite clear to any observer that I am tightly circumcised, and the clear contrast in skin colour across the scar shows that I was cut as an adult. This has resulted in several interesting discussions after the showers!

On every occasion the topic of sensitivity has always come up (as does: “was it painful”, and “how long did it take to return to normal?”!). Having been circumcised well into adulthood, I feel I can comment on this, having had experience of both states.

One of the main concerns of those who were uncircumcised, but felt that they might like to be, was the alleged resulting ‘loss of sensitivity’. From my experience with my style of circumcision, there is no loss of sensitivity, rather there is a change in sensitivity. My uncircumcised glans freshly uncovered from beneath the foreskin was certainly sensitive: a sort of raw, sharp, prickly sensitivity, rather like touching your eyeball. If touched, even very lightly, it would make me jump – obviously not the best of reactions in the sexual situation! – and would require a bit of drying-off time before getting too far. My circumcised glans is still equally as sensitive, with what I can only describe as a smooth, mellow, velvety feeling (but still with some sharper feeling), which will withstand a lot more stimulation, making the final orgasm deeply satisfying. The tight shaft skin and the prominent coronal ridge keeps me much more 'in touch' with my partner (and the feeling is reciprocated!). Before circumcision, the glans often seemed to slip back into the foreskin on the outstroke, so that the sensation was little different from masturbation. Any dryness of the glans is soon rectified with a little lubrication (from whatever source!) – rather like licking your lips – giving the full range of feeling. The remaining length of the frenulum also adds to this.

Moving up from the glans, the almost complete inner foreskin, now turned inside-out and covering half the shaft, provides a further sensitive area. Before circumcision I had always found the inside layer of the foreskin to be much more sensitive than the outer shaft skin, and enjoyed the feeling when the foreskin was pulled well back, unrolling the inner skin along the shaft, but regretting not being able to keep it that way permanently. Circumcision made it permanent. I really enjoy the continuum of sensitivity of the glans and the inner foreskin now stretched halfway up the shaft. The stretch and tightness of the skin is also enjoyable in itself, together with a slight lifting of the scrotum.

An unexpected, but entirely enjoyable result of my style of circumcision occurs at the scar. The sudden transition from sensitive inner skin to the less sensitive (but by no means un-sensitive) shaft skin halfway along the shaft provides a surprising sensation almost entirely absent in the uncircumcised state. Caressing across the scar line, and also on the 'T-junction' with the frenulum scar and up towards the frenulum, can be enough to bring me to orgasm, even without touching the glans! This is something I never found with a foreskin, even at the frenar band (the crinkly bit at the tip of the foreskin where it turns inside) either with the glans covered, or with the foreskin pulled hard back. The scar itself, on stimulation, also gives a slightly tingly, itchy sensation which is also rather interesting.

Is there, then, anything I now miss without a full foreskin? Well, yes. It has to be said that some of the sexual nuances involving a covered glans cannot now be achieved. Masturbation is certainly different, and a 'quickie' involving a vigorous romp with the foreskin is no longer possible. However, provided there is some lubrication available, quite a quick one is still possible.

As with so many things, circumcision (or not) and circumcision style is (or should be) very much a matter of personal preference. It really is a pity that teenagers and adults find it so difficult to obtain a well balanced view of circumcision (if they can find any information at all!). From my point of view, had I known all the advantages of circumcision which I now enjoy, I would not have waited so long. However, I did want to ensure that I obtained the style to suit me.

I certainly feel that my high and tight 'muslim' style of circumcision, which retains almost all of the sensitive inner foreskin, provides the ideal style of circumcision, providing the maximum benefits with the minimum disadvantages. The maximum area of sensitive skin is retained, whilst providing the additional stimulation of a tight shaft and prominent glans, together with the unexpected extra of the scar line sensitivity. Not only does it feel good, but (I think – as do others) it also looks good. It is comfortable, convenient, and (of course, that old excuse) clean. The three 'Cs' of CirCumCision!

Cavalier Reasoning

First, some background: I am 56, 5'8", weigh approx 150lbs; Cavalier cock 5" long when hard, approx 4.3" circumference, bends slightly upwards (an advantage, I think when fucking), angle when hard about 45 degrees; long overhang foreskin, which is very loose; if foreskin in full extended length, then it does not retract over helmet when hard – if lubricated, will slip back over most of helmet of its own accord. A sprinkle of hair on chest!

My interest in circumcision stems from schooldays when I was in the minority and wanted to be like all my roundhead friends; since then, I have had a few bouts of balanitis (am going through one now) and this also made me consider the cut. In 1984 I was advised by the doctor to have it done and stop messing about, but I was worried about the result, so persevered and the infection cleared up.

I joined Acorn in the late 80s to find out more about circumcision and have learned a lot – that it's not just a matter of cutting off the foreskin. I have made contact with a few members circumcised as adults to find out their pre and post experiences – but not very successful; a couple were gay and so could not report on heterosexual sex before and after. What I also noticed was that the cuts were not very clean and stitch marks were left. I prefer the look of a tight cut, but I think this is more US style and most UK roundheads seem to have some skin bunched up behind the helmet.

So, I've decided to stay a cavalier, unless, of course, the balanitis can't be cured – quite apart from the pain and hassle, the unknown sexual result, I'd go through hell being mocked by my mates at my sports club. (As one of our members was a few years ago, but I've never had the courage to ask him why he had the cut!)

Although I still think a circumcised cock looks better, I think that cavaliers have it better sexually – I’ve proved this to myself by wanking with the foreskin held back as far as possible, leaving the shaft skin taut and the helmet totally exposed – there is a definite reduction in sensation without the extra skin movement.

My reasons for keeping my foreskin rolled under itself to expose some of the helmet are – I have slight hypospadias so that my pee-hole is almost split in two and very tender. I always used to pee with the skin forwards, but then experimented with the roll-under – this helped to toughen the end and I now pee almost straight rather than in two differently angled streams! I notice my helmet skin has a slightly different texture where it’s been exposed. This also means that I can pee without pulling the complete foreskin back.

The other reason is appearance – I’m very aware of my small cock – not only length but more importantly, girth – it’s strange that when talking about cock size, it is only length that is referred to. With my foreskin fully forwards, tapering to a point, my cock looks so infantile and pathetic! At least with the skin rolled under it looks slightly thicker and stubbier and with a bit of helmet showing through, a little more aggressive! I also now find this most comfortable to wear – nice to feel the end of the helmet against one’s underwear and I find the fully extended foreskin OK for a while, but then uncomfortable and I’m always aware of this bit of extra skin hanging off the end of my cock! I always wank with the foreskin fully retracted and use lubrication over the bare knob.

When fucking, I find there are various different sensations to be had depending on the angle one goes in at-

- tip of helmet and frenulum area underside
- top of helmet
- base of cock

these give very different orgasms.

I’ve also been experimenting with different lubricants, apart from the standard KY jelly

- Wet or Wet light (from sex shops)
- Liquid silk

I think both have some ingredient which slightly irritates the end of the pee-hole and causes a better orgasm (I think this is the origin of the Spanish Fly claims!)

I think I am probably obsessed with my cock! I don’t know if other guys are, but I have a sneaking suspicion that everyone is, but most are too shy to talk about it! There is no doubt that cocks are observed in showers and changing rooms (I find that I’ll notice someone the first time, but then, unless it is a particularly huge specimen, take no notice thereafter) – as I do a lot of sport, I'm always in and out of changing rooms and showers.

As I said in my article in Acorn, I'm sure many guys would like to discuss this subject more openly, but feel inhibited and that they would be regarded as gay if they did. I think also we all have that desire to exhibit our cocks and show the world what we have!

Response To Issue 3/2000

Whilst those members opposed to circumcision are entitled to their views, I really must take issue with some of the items in Issue 3/2000.

The attitude of Drs Lane and South towards some of their patients with phimosis is nothing short of deplorable. To turn away patients with phimosis, but no other current symptoms, is to condemn them to a life of sub-standard sex to say nothing of the high risk of balanitis or worse later on. The foreskin is supposed to be easily retractable when both flaccid and erect. Anything less inhibits both cleanliness and proper stimulation of the penis and vagina during sex.

David's comments regarding circumcision and AIDS must surely have been made solely to stimulate discussion. Whilst some early studies in Africa failed to take other cultural matters into account, more recent studies have compared neighbouring groups with almost identical lifestyles and geographical locations. These studies have confirmed the benefit of circumcision in the fight against (heterosexual) AIDS. Comparision of Africa with China (say) really would fail to take cultural and other factors into account and lead to false conclusions.

That AIDS ravaged the homosexual population of the USA long before it was established in Europe is due mainly to the repression of gays in much of Europe compared with the USA. By the time AIDS started to take hold in Europe the need for protected sex was well established.

Why is AIDS still such a problem in circumcised America? Whereas AIDS in Africa is primarily a heterosexual disease; in the USA it is still primarily a homosexual one, and the partner at greatest risk is the 'passive' one receiving anal sex. Clearly it makes no difference whether the recipient of anal sex is circumcised or not as his penis is not involved. If one were to look at the AIDS rate amongst the 'active' partners alone the correlation with circumcision status would be more obvious. The other large 'at risk' group in the USA are intravenous drug users where again circumcision status is totally irrelevant.

Anti-circumcisionists repeatedly try to redefine standard medical terms to their advantage. What do they think phimosis is if it is not a tight foreskin?

Phimosis is defined simply as 'a foreskin which is too tight' – no more, no less. In the infant the foreskin is too tight if he has difficulty urinating because of the very small opening (note nothing to do with retractability whilst adhesions are normal). By the onset of puberty all adhesions should have gone and any which remain can usually be broken down by the doctor with a blunt probe. At this point the foreskin should be freely and painlessly totally retractable both flaccid and erect. If, in the absence of adhesions, the foreskin is unable to expand enough to be retracted over the corona then phimosis exists. Phimosis at and beyond puberty is a developmental abnormality and a phimotic foreskin cannot be described as 'healthy'.

Where the phimosis is only very slight it is quite possible that gentle stretching might just allow it to expand enough to uncover the glans properly. However, as the specialist no doubt knew, it is very easy for the foreskin to develop minute tears during stretching. These heal with scar tissue which is even less elastic than the original phimotic ring and only make matters worse. Additionally, where the phimotic area is in the form of a considerable overhang beyond the glans there is every probability that it will tighten up again if the stretching exercises are not maintained.

Stretching the foreskin lengthways will do nothing to add to the number of nerve endings it has, and hence it is hard to see how it could add to pleasurable sensations. Indeed, stretching it out significantly beyond the tip of the glans is more likely to cause it to narrow to provide for the extra length, thus creating a new phimosis. It is also very doubtful whether the primary sexual stimulus actually comes from the foreskin at all. The glans is much more highly enervated and it is the stimulation of the glans, through the foreskin, which is significant. Remember also that some 80% or more of sex is in the mind and not in the penis at all!

Acorn started life as an entirely pro-circumcision forum. Issue 4 carried the first anti-circumcision piece – culled from INTACT in the USA it was clearly offered simply as information on the activities of the fledgling anti-circumcision groups there.

Since Acorn has no official position for or against circumcision it is very different from activist groups like NORM-UK. For activist groups to function they must have impressive looking publications and, usually, a permanent staff to deal with the hoped for flood of enquiries and to generate political pressures. Acorn does not attempt to pressure anyone. It has no need of flashy publications, articles concocted by 'experts', or rigged 'International Symposia'. It relies entirely on members' contributions (which are unfortunately often thin on the ground) and is doing quite nicely with its volunteer magazine production staff. Funds are currently quite adequate to meet expected needs even if we had enough suitable and balanced material to produce 8 issues a year again.

Finally, with reference to the Prince Albert article culled from Kentucky: Acorn Issue 4 (originally labelled 'D') carried an article from John McC. about the origins of the Prince Albert piercing which is probably more accurate.

Vernon – London

Observations In China

A colleague and I have recently returned from working in China where we had few experiences which may be of interest.

Using the communal showering and changing facilities at the factory, which have never been available on previous visits, we quickly gained an audience, which stood and stared at us. This was rather embarrassing and they were told to 'shove off', but it also gave me an opportunity to make some observations. All of the Chinese had short foreskins some of which were worn retracted behind the glans. In conversation with our company agent, who is Chinese but lives in New York, we told him about our experience, his reply was that western men are reputed to have big dicks and we were being checked out to see if it was true.

The Chinese people are polite and well mannered, but are also very curious and at times their curiosity can get the better of them. In general conversation it is normal to be asked about life in the west, also why, both of us being English, we look so different me being blond haired, fair skinned and green eyed, my colleague being dark haired, sallow skinned and brown eyed. Eventually one of the men who I was working with had been set up (you can always tell when they have been told to ask something), to ask why our penises were so different that I looked similar to them, but my colleague, with an ample foreskin looked so different. I explained, with the aid of a dictionary, that I had been circumcised but he hadn't. The impression I perceived was that he knew the word circumcision but didn't know what it actually was (neither did I until I was circ'd). That night he must have done some research as the next day he asked, 'Did a Dr cut off part of your penis', he looked flabbergasted when I said yes, I also replied that some of his colleagues were circumcised. He said they weren't but that at puberty some men's foreskins retracted and stayed retracted.

That evening I told my colleague about this conversation. He asked me how I felt about being circumcised, that twice 'His banjo string had split and had to be stitched' and the Dr. had recommended that he be circumcised, but that he had refused on both occasions. I told him that I had been cut for medical reasons and had no problems and that if the Dr.'s were recommending it that he should take their advice.

A number of Japanese were working in the locality and resident at the same hotel as we were. Using the changing rooms at the leisure facilities I was able to make some discrete observations. They all had bared glans, most with foreskin bunched behind the glans, but some, mostly younger men, had no bunching and appeared too tight to just have a retracted foreskin and looked 'obviously' circumcised although there did not appear to be any change in skin colour on their shafts. My understanding had been that Japanese men wore their foreskin retracted and that circumcision was rare. Does anyone know if circumcision is becoming more common in Japan or are some foreskins so short that their owner appears to have quite a tight circumcision?

Tony

Sightings And Thoughts

I have just read and enjoyed Issue no 3 and thought I would mention a recent sighting – a convert to roundhead status. The chap in question used to be at the local swimming baths when I was there: he was obviously well endowed with a long foreskin. Then one day he mentioned that he was changing jobs in the near future. I didn't see him for a while and then one day he re-appeared, but this time he was circumcised! Unfortunately I never got the opportunity of commenting on this change in his status to him, and he has not been back as he then started at the new firm.

J.S. – Guernsey: comments in his article on a 'well cut cock'. I do agree with him that those left with a slack circumcision are never satisfied as it is neither one state or the other, and this surplus skin bunching behind or even lapping the glans is extremely irritating. I know as my first DIY job left me with a lot of surplus skin and I used to look in envy at a 'well cut cock'. I put up with it for ten years before doing my revision which has given me a cock admired by all with a smooth unwrinkled shaft skin even when flaccid. My one regret is that the scar line is only about  $\frac{3}{4}$ " from the corona. I firmly believe that the muslims have got it right by leaving all the inner skin and a scar well back on the shaft.

Finally R. – London comments on his stitchless circumcision. I did both my DIY circumcisions without stitching – too painful without anaesthetic – but both left a barely noticeable scar. Far better aesthetically than the nobbly-puckered effect stitching gives. I had to use surgical plaster to drag shaft skin down to allow a loose join to the inner skin at the cut line. I assume R. – London was treated similarly: it's a pity he didn't go into any details as it would have been interesting.

Finally re. Membership: have you advertised in H & E etc? I'm sure there are lots of people dying to know about Acorn!

R.F.W.

Piercing As Adornment

Circumcision: not for me. And that's for 2 reasons: the skin involved is so sensitive, that I never want to miss it. The other thing is: I have a piercing right through the glans and without the foreskin I would not be able to cover it when I'm naked and I don't want to show it (for instance in a sauna).

The piercing is called 'ampallang' and it goes from side to side through the head (acorn) of my penis: so you see only a 6 mm steel ball on each side halfway down the glans. My decision came after considering it for more than half a year, so it was really no impulse deed. I moved from my original country Holland to Ireland and, as I wanted it to be done in Amsterdam, I just had to wait this six month, before I returned for two weeks. So plenty of time to think about it, during which I often switched from 'I do it' to 'forget it' and back. It could be too much a sort of mutilation, or it could be too obvious, or it might be too painful (I hate dentists, so...).

But at last in Holland it was: don't think any more, just do it NOW! I went to Body Manipulations, going through the usual procedure of signing a form and having some food first (no empty stomach recommended). I asked for a male piercer (no woman please for such a delicate treatment!) and after some time waiting I was called in a cubicle. During a reassurance talk – 'are' you nervous, 'will it bleed' (probably only the first few days during nightly erections), 'how painful' (different for everyone, but it is really not too bad), advise about not to swim during the first month and how to clean it, and don't use alcohol the first day: it makes the blood thinner and this can cause complications by easily bleeding – he prepared the 'operation': cork, needle, gloves, forceps, 4 different lengths of bars, white paper on the treatment table, etc.

Then he asked me to lower my trousers and to lie down. He put a green sheet with a hole over my genitals and let the penis through this hole on top of it. After disinfecting the area he began marking the two spots, where the needle should go in and out again. This took quite some time: to low, to near, not in line. At last we agreed about the pen markings and I asked if the steel would go through the urethra. "I'm not sure now, but if you want it...". It didn't matter for me, only if it did the healing would be quicker: 2 smaller piercings instead of 1 big one in fact. He still made another correction, handling the glans very carefully: 'the needle will go crooked, if I squeeze your penis the tiniest bit.'

The piercing itself would take only one second, the quicker the least painful. He had a apadravia piercing (a vertical bar from next to the frenum to up in the middle of the head) done himself a few months ago and he experienced it as: 'Is that all?'. Now the length of the bar to be used was measured and estimated: oversized, to allow for erections (rather important) and proper cleaning. (Some shops let you measure this when in fact erect.) After a month I had to come back for a size-down, then having the right size taken during a hard-on. First the clamp was put into place, exactly over the markings: this numbs the penis a bit (well: a bit only it appeared), as there was no anaesthetics used (it mostly gives deformation and so no straight piercing). My glans was strangely flattened now. In the one hand he took the hollow needle, in the other a cork. I thought for one short moment: "Stop here, I can't stand it", but I persevered. After some checking for the right place and angle, he told me to take deep breathings and at an 'out' he pushed it through in one go. I saw it coming out on the other side and then the pain came in: I felt being against the ceiling!! But it lasted only about 30 seconds: it eased off then and after another minute or so the pain was completely gone (a normal chemical reaction causes this).

He observed me carefully to see if I was doing well (no fainting or whatever), but all was ok. He then applied some lubricant on the bar and pushed the needle out with it. Only the balls screwed on and sliding it a bit to let the head expand again, and it was over. Indeed: is that all? (the dentist IS really worse in my opinion). I did like how my penis looked now and never regretted it later. Not a single drop of blood; the next night, when I woke up, the tissues around it in the protecting bag, in fact a rubber glove round the penis, were completely soaked with blood due to erections. But as I was warned for this, it did not upset me. It was never painful, only a bit sore sometimes. You had to be careful with cleaning and peeing the first days, but it's not too bad.

All together this ornamental piercing (mine is one and a half year old now) is apart from the very attractive view (not for everyone I have to say) also recommendable, because it feels very good as well: the penis becomes far more sensitive. So who's next??

Kees – Dublin

P.S.: piercing is addictive: you have one, you want more. About 3 years ago I thought of this practice as weird or whatever. Now I have 12 of them!!! Anyone with other experiences, please write or contact me via the Society. Thanks.

Circumcision — My Story

Part 3

In part 1

I told you about my first self-circumcision attempt and my subsequent trip to the hospital. What I was looking for was a shortening of my foreskin so that when I am flaccid the skin just covered the cock head and as I get harder the skin rolls back by itself. After that experience I was left with a divided frenulum and a loose lowish circumcision that stayed back all the time. I also ended up with a skin tunnel along the top of the scar area where one of the dissolvable stitches did not dissolve and was not taken out. I thought at the time “oh well, if this is what a circumcision is then that is it and I’ll just have to get used to it”. At that time I did not know that more skin could be taken off as easily as I do now. I thought that if I wanted to have anything else done then I would have to go for plastic surgery, and that I could not afford. So I got used to it.

In part 2

I told you about my experience with the NHS in the UK at trying to clean up the first circumcision. As you will know if you have read both parts I was not too happy with the job, but things are slowly coming together. After some 5 months of healing the nodules that were left after the skin bridges were removed were not really disappearing to my satisfaction.

And Now

Well the frenulum has gone and now the little bumps have to go! I met someone in the UK though a UK group that has members who’s interests cover circumcision, foreskins and other cock modifications. This person, I’ll call him Bob, told me about his self-circumcision and showed the results, which looked good. He told me how he did it, and what he used. It was a bottle top (in the UK there is a drink that comes in a black plastic bottle with a neck that just fits over the head of an average size cock) and this is what I used, once removed from the bottle and polished. The skin can be pulled up over the bottle top and then tied off using some strong but thin string. Once tied off the skin dies and after 8 days or so the skin has shrivelled then the whole thing will come off leaving you circumcised. Leaving one with a bare scabbed area where the skin has been crushed it takes about 2 to 3 months before the skin becomes smooth and normal.

Tying the knot.

Now you have read about the theory, this is my experience. I followed the above almost to the letter but made some mistakes, I hope by reading this you will not make the same mistakes. First it is not an easy job done by yourself unless this is a first circumcision and you do not wish a tight job. The problem is holding the skin over the top and tying the string tight at the same time. At first I thought that I did not get the string tight enough. Luckily I had a good friend living nearby who I know would be OK with this type of thing. (As you can imagine if this is not the case, the exercise would have stopped there and then.) With his help we re-tightened the string enough. I was told that after one hour or so that the skin should turn blue if the string is tight enough. Well my skin was not turning as blue as I thought (in the end I should have had faith that it was tight enough) and therefore thought that it was not as tight as it should have been. So what to do after one hour of pain and it was just going numb I did not want to take the string off as this would have been painful and I am not into pain. So I decided to tie another piece of string over the top of the first piece, OOPS! It slipped in the night and I ended up with two crush lines. (This gives a thicker scar that is slightly puffy and will need removing. See end result.) Through the first 5 hours PAIN!! It does go but it is most definitely painful getting the string tight enough and the pain builds up for about the first hour or so before it starts to go away. After this the inconvenience and slight discomfort that one has to put up with for 8 days or so, for me it was 7.

7 Days

It is quite strange having a piece of plastic hanging from your cock for 7 days knowing and seeing the skin that is on it dying off. It starts on the first day with some pain. I went out so that I did not have the chance to remove the string, the pain level in the first 5 hours might have convinced you to take off the string but this would have been a bad move. After the first day the skin is quite numb and cold. On the third and fourth days I was quite interested with this thing hanging there and in fact I used it to wank off with using the top, on the morning of the fourth day. By the fifth day I started to notice that parts of the glans was getting sore under the plastic, as most of us know plastic next to skin sweats. I started, as I should have from the start, to be very thorough about making sure that under the bottle top was dry and clean. Wiping down the inside with cotton buds soaked in salt water then drying with cotton buds. I was lucky as I had the week off work and I suggest that if anyone goes down this route that perhaps they have longer. Also on day 5 I noticed that the dead skin has now shrunk to about half its size and is forming into one black scab. This is not a procedure to use if you want to preserve the skin! By the end of day 6 all that is left is a ring of black scab like dead skin. Day 7 and I felt that there was no point in keeping the string on there and off it came and with some gentle manipulation off came the bottle top with the dead skin. What a relief! The feeling is really good after being confined in a plastic top and having a slightly sore cock head. Free at last!

8 Days and more.

So it is off and I have done a little cleaning up. Be gentle, as even though there is a good join it still has to heal quite a bit more. This is where I started to have problems because I put two pieces of string on ONLY EVER USE ONE!! The two crush lines made by the two pieces of string were in places about 1cm apart. This is because when the skin is over the top it is a double layer so all distances are double. Anywhere the crushes were the furthest distance apart, which was on either side of the cock, the skin started to pull apart. I was not ready for this as I should have been. You need to have some Surgical Tape or stitches ready because if the parts stay open for any length of time (2 or 3 days) then they will and did take a long time to heal. In my case they actually turned up at the edges slightly like bacon turning up when fried, leaving about 2mm of the inside surface of the skin on the outside. It is hard to explain as I do not have a pic. After this heals there is a little puffiness there. Luckily it is hardly noticeable unless you know where to look.

The end or is it?!

So after 14 days most of the thing was healed but the two bits on each side took another 5 days to heal up. Is this the end? Maybe, maybe not. The skin on the shaft is still quite loose, I can still wank by moving the skin up and down. I always wanted it tight so I would like more off. But can I find a way to do it myself? I would also like to do a sub-incision but to keep the PA. This is a little harder as most sub-incisions are performed from the slit down. I have seen one keeping the PA so I know it is possible. Finding the practitioner to do it will be a hard task.

Would I do it again YES using the knowledge I now have I think this is an easy way to do a circumcision. BUT do it right and have a friend to help that is what I say.

Penis Puppeteers

On Channel 4 last night, 15th Sept, in a programme called Frontal, a couple of Australians dressed only in brief cloaks made an outstanding contribution to Ozzy culture. They style themselves the Penis Puppeteers and went down a bomb with the teeny bobbars at the Edinburgh Fringe. Their party piece is entitled The Eiffel Tower – a mind-blowing exercise in penile manipulation in which one of them, in close up, pulls his foreskin down to knee level and then stretches it out sideways to touch both knees, representing the base of the tower, whilst the other end of his shaft represents the top of the tower disappearing into his bush (the clouds). The female audience went apeshit!

Depending on your attitude to foreskins, you either feel insanely jealous or you email him recommending a good Jewish clip joint. But a thought – surely most Aussies over the age of 10 have been circumcised?

I do wonder what Channel 4 will do next – a possible ladies' long range pee contest perhaps?

Foreskin Thoughts

It is disappointing to read of our declining membership. I agree wholeheartedly with R.B.W. that we need to get away from “an endless diet of revisions and DIY jobs...”

It seems that we have many older members who were born when circumcision was fashionable; but today mercifully, this is no longer the case. To attract new younger members, it might be a good idea to dwell on the pleasures of foreskins, rather than their disadvantages. What are the young reading today? If it is Forum for instance, I suggest an advertisement in that magazine offering a back issue of Acorn to any new member may be worthwhile.

On the more cheerful side, I very much enjoyed F.S.'s 'A Tight Pullover' piece in 3/2000, leading to several questions, which he would like answered; such as whether there are any others with tight pullovers? and what is the optimum length of a foreskin?

Meanwhile, here are some questions I would like answered by any of our members lucky enough to have retained their foreskin.

- 1) At what age did you first retract your foreskin? Was it easy or painful at first?
- 2) Who told you how to do it? Parents, older boys, or did you just find out for yourself by chance?
- 3) It seems to me that parents have a responsibility to inform their boys at an early age (did F.S.'s parents try and help him with his tight pullover?)
- 4) I am always interested in their first sexual activities. Many boys seem to have started at school. So would you relate any adventures at school.
- 5) At what age did you begin having adventures with girls. Did the girls enjoy playing with your foreskin?
- 6) When having sexual intercourse, do you prefer the foreskin to remain forward or back?

Answers please all you cavaliers!

I.O. – Herts.

Editorial

Well finally here is the first issue for the year 2001. It's late, partly because I have been very busy, but also due to a continuing shortage of contributions. Thanks to all of you who have sent in contributions and to all of those who wrote in asking when the next issue was due out, how about sending a contribution instead? It would enable it to be produced far more quickly.

The spring meeting had to be cancelled due to not enough people having booked by the cutoff date we had to give the hotel. Unfortunately, by the weekend itself, just about enough additional people had expressed an interest in coming that the weekend could have probably gone ahead after all. Please, if you want to come to the weekends, do let us know as soon as possible, even if it is only a provisional booking. We are hoping that the next weekend will be held over the weekend 2nd/3rd November – most probably somewhere to the north/west of London. More details will follow nearer the time.

My Experience

As a relatively new member of Acorn, I have read the various articles in the last few newsletters with immense interest. Again and again I have agreed so much with the various experiences of other circumcised men that I feel I must write even if my own history mirrors so many others. Like I.D. (Sussex), in the sixties I attended a school where swimming sessions were done in the nude. The main differences being that: (a) the school was all-male and (b) it was absolutely compulsory for all boys to participate in swimming lessons. It wasn't deemed liberal or trendy but viewed as a way of knocking modesty out of shy, largely middle-class schoolboys – probably a hangover from the days of National Service.

Needless to say, this gave me my first real sight of a variety of cocks of all shapes and sizes. The larger they were, the more they were sniggered at. How naïve we were – now I bet most of us would give our eye-teeth for one that was as big as some (very lucky) lads possessed. But I was utterly fascinated by the boys who sported circumcised cocks. There was no desire to conform to the majority as these boys were in the minority. Nor was it a feeling of being in the 'elite', even though it became increasingly clear to me that these boys largely came from well-educated, reasonably affluent families. It was the working class pupils, like myself, who still were intact. I felt no envy for their social status at all, but just longed to be circumcised. If you think it was simple snobbery, this was definitely not the case. To me, a circumcised cock has always looked overwhelmingly more attractive than an uncut one.

The intensity of my yearning grew and I longed to have permanently the bare glans of my circumcised brethren. I became so disenchanted with my hated foreskin that I made no attempt whatsoever to involve myself in any sort of sexual relationship even when I was at University in the seventies. I so hated the foreskin I was still attached to, I couldn't bear anyone to see it. Sex became a solo effort with any attempt I could make to keep my cock-head uncovered for as long as possible. I couldn't even talk about my hang-up with anyone, particularly my parents who would have found my enthusiasm for circumcision quite beyond their comprehension.

With my father's death when I was twenty-three, I suddenly became the 'man of the house'. Now I decided that I had to act like a man and stop being so apprehensive of the thought of an adult circumcision. I realised there was no hope of getting it done on the NHS, but found an advert for a private clinic about 12 miles from home. I rang them and found that they would do the operation, under local anaesthetic, in a couple of days' time. I booked a date and was told that if I didn't turn up, I would still be charged. With this thought there was little chance of not going.

It still took some courage to make my way to the clinic that afternoon. As keen as I was, I was a little worried about how painful it might be afterwards.

But once I arrived, everything went through very quickly. I was pleased to be circumcised under a local, though I wasn't brave enough to watch. I just lay back and thought of England. The sense of relief when it was over was overwhelming. It was like a huge weight off my mind. The next couple of weeks were going to be uncomfortable, but I didn't care – I had done it!

Once the wound had healed and my cock assumed its new shape, I couldn't wait to try it out. I'd been told to wait for four weeks after the op before trying any form of sexual activity. This wait was absolute torture – even walking to the station in the morning would give me a raging hard-on. But when the four weeks were up, that night I began a very tentative jack-off session. Once I could see there was going to be no opening up of the scar I carried on with vigorous abandon. My first postoperative orgasm was an event I will remember for the rest of my days. I think the expression is 'fan-bloody-tastic'.

Admittedly, a few months later, I did have a secondary op or 'trimming' as the same surgeon who did the first, called it. This included the removal of most of my frenulum. This tightening up procedure made things even better as a taut shaft gives greatly enhanced sexual pleasure.

Like R.F.W., my fascination with circumcision has never abated over the twenty years since I was cut. My best friend was also circumcised in his twenties and we have often discussed how we feel about it and both agree that although in the minority in this country, we are very lucky that we are roundheads. My pleasure for sex is still undimmed since that night four weeks after I was circumcised. The enjoyment of the erotic head-rub every time I have an erection has never diminished. Similarly to R.F.W., I also have to sneak a peak at other men in sports changing rooms, to see if any are as fortunate as I am. I never say anything to those who are, but deep down I always feel a kind of kinship to them.

Although I was not as fortunate to be well-circumcised like the guys cut in infancy I feel that at least most of my adult life has been spent with my 'true' status. It may not be the greatest circumcision in the world, but God do I love it!

Should anyone wish to contact me, the Society had my address and email address. I would be pleased to hear from anyone else.

Peter

Kiwi Confidante

I feel I ought to report a recent, interesting conversation I had with a young New Zealand man in a London sauna. My Kiwi confidante remarked that his definitive opinion on Britain was the positive plethora of prepuces present! He was uncircumcised and thought that 'general' circumcision was ended around 20 years ago but he did state categorically that most Antipodean men remain in favour of a tightly-cut penis. He was plainly happy to have kept his long foreskin but applauded the pendulous foreskins of his British compatriots. I, as an admirer of circumcised penises, still felt (wrongly) that Aussies and New Zealander men were 'cut'. My illusions have been shattered...

K.G. – London

Have You Ever Wondered?

At the age of 7 or 8 I was fascinated by the difference of appearance of the circumcised penis to the foreskinned version, observed from playing the nurses and doctors games of childhood.

As I grew up the subject of circumcision was still of keen interest as I continued to learn and read more from as many sources as could be found, and during all this period I wanted desperately to be circumcised.

However, I was not to achieve this until I was 35, with a revision at 38 – but that is another story.

The question I have pondered all these years, and am no closer to finding an answer “Why and who first thought of performing this operation on the male appendage?”

We read that the practice probably pre-dated Egyptian times and was possibly performed in other parts of Africa in prehistory.

The Jewish people adopted the practice from the time Abraham was commanded by God to circumcise his son and all the males of the tribe. The Muslims also look upon Abraham as one of the great prophets, and perhaps they took up the practice from the same time. I assume this, but must say that I am no historian, religious or otherwise, nor do I claim to have any academic qualification in human studies or anthropology.

My point is, why cut off the foreskin, as a 'badge' or mark of belonging to a group or clan, when that mark is not likely to be seen beneath clothing? Why this permanent and final act, rather than do something that can be seen and recognised by all?

Was the foreskin seen as something that could be removed without altering the function of the person/penis? (I know this comment will provoke some indignation.) Why not snip off the ear lobe; file the teeth; put a bone through the nose or lip, all of which would mark the person with his 'badge' of clan for all to see?

It occurs to me that the practice was never a medical procedure, but has its roots in self adornment/mutilation – dependent on your point of view.

Yet it does not answer the long pondered question – “why and when was circumcision first performed?”

I do not expect the question will ever be answered and I shall just go on wondering (and enjoying my cut cock and the sight of others!)

E.T. – Essex

Second Instalment

I am writing to complete the second instalment of my first letter (third time lucky?) from the last issue. In that one I explained how I came to be circumcised, the operations and the results. This time I'm going to relate some of the most circy-interesting experiences.

However, before I start I'd just like to say how comforting it is to find letters from other people with a similar interest in circumcision, and how easy it was to identify with R.F.W. – Surrey and his "life long compulsion to be circumcised.". And I thought I was the only one!

So, back to the post-op stories. After I'd been cut the second time, the glans was bared except on top where a roll of skin just lipped annoyingly over the rim. I couldn't wait to try it out with females, hoping they would notice. I went to some massage parlours for an 'intimate massage', but the 3 girls who wanked me off hadn't got a clue about circumcision, and I don't think they even knew what it was. I was pretty disappointed, and longed either for one to say how sexy she found my naked knob, or to be even more tightly circumcised so that there would be no doubt.

Then I started going out with quite a voluptuous sexpot, and surprise surprise she absolutely loved the circumcision. The third time we screwed we were lying in bed and she gently ran her finger along my cock and over the knob. She said, "Do you mind if I ask you a personal question?... Have you been operated on?" She was delighted as I proudly showed her the scar and explained how the operation had been done. She really got off on it, but unfortunately has been the only Spanish girl to have "been in to it" or recognized it. Maybe because the rate of circumcision is so low. A quick check and knob count around the changing rooms of a sports club I go to gives me anything in the region of 10%-15%, which I find rather high, and maybe due to the unrepresentative sample. The typical circumcision leaves a very thin band of pink inner skin just behind the glans. (Tight) Cocks with the cuff of inner skin pulled back are few and far between.

After finally getting my third cut, my cock definitely looked more like a roundhead although it falls in line with the typically circumcised Spanish cock described above. Despite the closer cut, I've had no more accurate 'sightings' from either 'massage' girls or girlfriends, although many of the call-girls tend to whip out the creams without asking, so they must notice something. One of the nicest wanks I got was from one who applied baby oil and rubbed her thumb up and down on the frenulum while simultaneously gently 'squeezing' the skin up and down which was nice.

One of the problems I have is that when the skin is pulled up to its maximum, (about half way up the knob), the skin over the right hand testicle is pulled so tight that it is painful. When I come, the testicle almost seems to 'disappear' into the shaft of my cock. This happens especially in cold weather. Have any other tightly circumcised members had similar problems.

Anyway, after being frustrated with girls' reactions I finally had to know what it was like to wank another guy's cut cock. Girls on USA porn films never seem to do it right, always sucking and never giving the cut cock a good jerking with the skin. (My particular interest is how far the skin can be pulled up the circumcised cock when erect. I'd appreciate members adding this info in their letters.)

So, I eventually found a 'sauna' specialising in transvestites (I couldn't face a 'real' man!). I was nervous, but finally felt I was sure enough about my sexuality to accept what I was going to do. Sitting in a bedroom a procession of 'girls' were sent in one by one. I asked each one if he was cut, and in most cases they didn't know what I meant. Out of about 9 or 10, 2 admitted to being circed. I picked one and we went into a bedroom complete with gay porno vids on a TV. As soon as he pulled down his knickers I knew I made the right choice. It was one of the most beautiful cocks I'd ever seen; so clearly circumcised. We both got undressed and got on the bed. I made an immediate inspection. The cock was about average size, and when flaccid there was about 2 inches of inner skin pulled back down the shaft. There was no hint of a scar or 'thread' of frenulum. And despite being so cut the glans didn't have a particularly prominent rim. Asking for the method, he was reportedly circumcised by his mother when he was 4 years old (he was Brazilian), and according to him this is quite common. I find it hard to believe, but may be plausible in poor working class families who couldn't pay for the operation. Still, hats off to mum who did a clean job, and left an object of envy for circers everywhere.

He let me wank him and I was surprised how supple the skin was, and fully erect I was able to pull the skin just over the rim of the cock. He said he didn't have any sensitive spots but seemed to enjoy the baby-oil wank and the twisting wrist method over the knob. I wasn't allowed to bring him off since he had to 'last' through the night, which was a shame, however he politely brought me off. My 'technical' interest must have shown since he said "you prefer women don't you." I said I did, but my 'fetish' is now undeniably confirmed. I haven't felt like going back (my curiosity was satisfied thankfully), but I'm glad I had the experience I 'missed' when I was growing up.

Now alone and single again, I'm weighing up the 4th and definitive tight circ. I know I'm obsessed, but at least I now know I'm not the only one.

Circumcision Problems

After reading the article 'Growing Up with and Acroposthion' Issue 2/2000 it brought to mind a number of points that I have found disturbing concerning circumcision.

Why is it that in conversation many people find circumcision a humorous subject and enjoy making fun of the procedure and to some extent the men who have been circumcised. I know many of the jokes relate to the Jews who bear the brunt of the humour like the Irish and Polish do in other areas. However it never ceases to amaze me how many people find the whole topic funny even when the procedure is carried out for other than religious reasons. Is it because circumcision is considered a subject of ridicule in many circles that many men who are circumcised tend not to discuss it and it has this 'not to be talked about' stigma? I know from experience that a lot of women find the idea of circumcision a real laugh and this can cause embarrassment if you are singled out in a group in a pub or other venue for some 'cutting' comments and sniggers. It seems strange that other operations: eg tonsillectomy, appendectomy etc are accepted with little or no comment while circumcision always raises a laugh; consider the number of comedians on the television and some of the comedy soap type programmes that look for a laugh when someone has been circumcised or is to be circumcised.

When I was born in 1948 it was a 50/50 chance you would be circumcised; it was 'fashionable' and found favour with many parents although there was frequently no medical reason for it. I was only a few weeks old when I was circumcised; not a very good job and I decided in later life, because my semi-circumcised state was causing problems, to get the job done properly. There was little ridicule at my school as around 40% to 50% of the boys in my year were circumcised and although boys were classed as roundheads or cavaliers it did not amount to much and problems concerning the state of your penis were few.

I went to a mixed secondary school before the big comprehensive schools were formed. Consequently there were a lot of smallish schools which meant there were numerous inter-school competitions; football, athletics, cricket etc. I was particularly good at athletics (100yds, 220yds, long jump etc) which meant I was always in the school athletics team. There was one large borough meeting a year but there were numerous inter-school meets between my school and one of the many others. It was at one of these small events against a minor public school when I first noticed that problems could be encountered by boys depending upon their circumcised state. After the athletics match was over we went back into the changing rooms; our school changing rooms were divided into two pads and it was usual for each team to change etc on separate sides; but the showers were shared and both sides met up in them. All the boys from the public school were circumcised except one who was slightly younger than the majority but was reasonably good at his event. He had a particularly long foreskin and was constantly picked on (I suppose it was bullying) by the other boys in his team and it was obvious from the things that were said and the antics his penis was subjected to that his cavalier status was the problem. I must say we met that school on a number of occasions and although he came in for considerable ragging he remained a cavalier and I assume he still is. That was the position 40 years ago.

Moving on to the present the boot is now on the other foot. When my daughter was six she went to a local Friday club for children aged 5 to 9. Eventually as I had to travel some distance to the club and I ferried a number of other children to it I was roped in to help. One evening the lady group leader mentioned that a few of the boys were missing and had been gone for a little while longer than was usual. We soon discovered the boys were in the toilets. The club was held in an old building and as is common with this type of building the toilets were outside the back in a small block. When I entered the toilet block I found one small boy had been debagged and was being tormented by the other boys who were laughing at and poking fun at his circumcised penis. It was obvious that the boy had only recently been circumcised as his penis looked quite red and sore. I was to learn later that this boy and another lad who also came to the club had gone into hospital at the same time; the tormented boy had had what I can only say looked like a fairly radical circumcision that is his glans was totally exposed as the foreskin had been cut back hard and the cut line (it was not really a scar at this time) was well up the penis shaft; the other boy, whose father was absolutely against him being circumcised, had just had his foreskin stretched and been given instructions to frequently work the foreskin back and forth over the glans to keep it loose. I suppose as this boy did not look any different he was not considered worth bullying although he was actually less robust than the other boy. As far as I am aware the stretching exercise was a success as I never heard that this boy needed any additional treatment. The boy who had been circumcised was the only boy in the small primary school to have had the operation and although I understand the teasing etc reduced I am sure it made him very self conscious.

Another instance when a circumcised boy came in for some bullying was told to me by a mother who worked with me. She had had a few of days off work because her son of 11 had to go into hospital for a circumcision; I understand this was considered to be necessary on medical grounds. From the somewhat graphic detail the mother went into concerning the result of the operation it appears that rather more skin was removed than was perhaps prudent as the wound was taking longer to heal than she thought would be the case and the boy had to see the GP/nurse on a couple of occasions after discharge from hospital. From the way she was speaking I believe the GP had given her to understand that only a slight nip at the end of the foreskin would be necessary whereas the hospital doctor, so it seems, had removed considerably more and left the lad with a totally exposed glans and very tight shaft skin. She did say that she was very surprised at the extent of the operation but she assumed it was for the best. Anyway back at school the boy came in for some nasty teasing which lasted for sometime and he is still the brunt of some ragging although I believe this has subsided somewhat. Again this boy is also one of very few in the school who has had the operation.

I understand that these days circumcision is now only carried out on 1% to 2% of boys as today's thinking considers the foreskin should be retained. I am sure, in the majority of cases, any tightness of the foreskin is restricted to the tip; why is it then that instead of just the tip being removed or perhaps a slit being made in the tip, surgeons still insist on removing the skin right back behind the helmet and frequently some way up the shaft. I know I had problems with my penis requiring further attention but I am sure I am in the minority and most men would not need further surgery.

It would be interesting to read/hear from others whether they have any views on my comments, particularly the younger ones born say in the 1960s onwards.

Disadvantage Of 'Muslim' Style Of Circumcision

Your correspondents P.T. and R.F.W. both extol the delights of what they call the 'Muslim' style of circumcision with the inside of the foreskin stretched up the shaft of the penis so that the scar line is well back from the glans. I cannot comment on whether this is really typical of Muslim cuts (the only one of which I've seen close up was not like that but had a faint scar just behind the glans) but I do think your readers should be made aware of a major potential disadvantage of this style of cut.

As Vernon correctly pointed out in the same issue, there is increasing evidence that circumcision offers partial (and I emphasise partial) protection against HIV transmission. In fact there are now dozens of studies that have consistently found that men without foreskins are less likely to contract the virus than those with. So compelling is the evidence that even the BBC documentary programme Horizon devoted an episode to the topic recently. It has become clear that one of the main mechanisms by which the virus gains entry to a man from a woman is through the inner surface of the foreskin. This surface lacks the protective layer of keratin found on the outer surface of the foreskin, and on the shaft and glans (whether circumcised or not) of the penis. In addition, the inner surface of the foreskin is rich in Langerhans' cells which are especially prone to HIV infection. These cells are not present elsewhere on the penis. The frenulum is another vulnerable point as it is susceptible to minute tears.

As it is now apparent that the inner foreskin is the Achilles heel of the penis it would seem prudent to remove as much of it (and the frenulum) as possible during a circumcision leaving the scar line as close to the glans as possible. A circumcision that left the inner foreskin intact, but spread out along the shaft, would seem unlikely to confer as much benefit with respect to reducing viral transmission. Indeed, differing styles of circumcision may even explain why studies have found so much variation in the effectiveness of the procedure at reducing HIV infection.

I might add that, in my experience, (circumcised by choice aged 30, scar 1 cm behind the glans) the small bit of remaining inner foreskin is rather prone to friction burns in the event of over-enthusiastic masturbation. I certainly would not want any more of it to have been kept. Nevertheless, like every man I know who's been cut as an adult for whatever reason, I am thrilled with the result and would not want my foreskin back even if it were possible.

I appreciate that HIV prevention may not have been the primary intention of your correspondents when they had their operations (and I wish them years of safe joy with their redesigned organs) but should certainly be borne in mind by anyone considering a circumcision for themselves, or their children.

Finally, I am not a medical doctor but the above does seem self-evident. The comments of your medically qualified readers would be most welcome.

Prince Albert?

Any remarks on 'Another Prince Albert'? Yes, once and for all, Prince Albert did not have his cock pierced and neither did any other member of the royal family called Prince Albert. Queen Victoria's consort wore a watch chain, which became known as an 'Albert'. The word is in the dictionary and is used by many Victorian and Edwardian writers including H.G. Wells. The ridiculous story that Prince Albert had his cock tethered to his leg by a chain is of very recent origin.

Response To 'Prince Albert?'

It would be very strange for a penis ring to be called a 'Prince Albert' without some connection to one of the many Royal personages bearing that name. One story, purporting to be true, was recounted way back in Issue 4/88 by John McC. Another plausible theory relates to using the ring to hold the penis down the trouser leg by linking it to a garter so as to prevent unwanted erections from showing in the tight trousers fashionable at the time.

Book Review

Circumcision: A History of the World's Most Controversial Surgery by David L Gollaher.

Over the years there have been many publications, some old others more recent, mentioned in the pages of the Acorn magazine and in some ways connected with the topic of Circumcision. These have all approached the subject either by medical, sexual, ritual or customary ways. However, this last Christmas, I received a copy of this book as a gift from an American pen-pal, (he is also a member of Acorn).
